PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 91st CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, March 23, 1970

The House met as 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

All the paths of the Lord are stedfast love and faithfulness for those who keep His covenant and His testimonies.—Psalm 25: 10.

O God, our Father, whose power is without measure and whose judgments are true and righteous altogether, from the busy world about us and at the beginning of another day we would quiet our hearts in Thy presence and wait for Thy still, small voice.

Grant unto us the wisdom to know what we should do and the strength to do it Thy way. Undergird our lives that we may make decisions wisely, walk the high road of noble purpose faithfully, and with outreaching sympathy seek to heal the wounds of our human family.

We may move along an unknown path but we go forward with a firm faith in the reality of goodness, truth, and love and with the abiding assurance that Thou art with us.

In the name of the Master of men we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, March 19, 1970, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Arrington, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 158) entitled "A joint resolution to authorize the minting of clad silver dollars bearing the likeness of the late President of the United States, Dwight David Eisenhower," with amendments in which concurrence of the House is requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S.J. Res. 162. Joint resolution in recognition of the Fifth International Conference on Water Pollution Research.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 11959) entitled "An act to amend chapters 31, 34, and 35 of title 38, United States Code, in order to increase the rates of vocational rehabilitation, educational assistance, and special training allowance paid to eligible veterans and persons under such chapters."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT REFORM AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE ACT OF 1970

[Pursuant to the order of the House on Thursday, March 19, 1970, the proceedings by which the provisions of H.R. 16196 were substituted for the provisions of S. 2601 and the bill passed, are printed herewith, as follows:]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 881, the Committee on the District of Columbia is discharged from further consideration of the bill, S. 2601.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. M'MILLAN

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion offered by Mr. McMILLAN: Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill S. 2601, to reorganize the courts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and insert in lieu thereof the provisions of H.R. 16196, as passed, as follows:

That this Act may be cited as the "District of Columbia Court Reform and Criminal Procedure Act of 1970".

"Chapter 1.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"Sec.
"11–101. Judicial power.
"11–102. Status of District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"§ 11–101. Judicial power

"The judicial power in the District of Columbia is vested in the following courts:

"(1) The following Federal courts established pursuant to article III of the Constitution:

"(A) The Supreme Court of the United States.

"(B) The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

"(C) The United States District for the District of Columbia.

"(2) The following District of Columbia courts established pursuant to article I of the Constitution:

"(A) The District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"(B) The Superior Court of the District of Columbia.

"§ 11–102. Status of District of Columbia Court of Appeals

"The highest court of the District of Columbia is the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. Final judgments and decrees of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals are reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States in accordance with section 1257 of title 28 of the United States Code.

"Chapter 3.—UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

"Sec.
"11–301. Jurisdiction of appeals from the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"§ 11–301. Jurisdiction of appeals from the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"In addition to its jurisdiction as a United States court of appeals and any other jurisdiction conferred on it by law, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has jurisdiction of appeals from judgments of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals—

"(1) with respect to violations of criminal laws of the United States which are not applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia if a petition for the allowance of an appeal from that judgment is filed within ten days after its entry; or

"(2) entered before the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970 in any other case if a petition for the allowance of an appeal from that judgment is filed within ten days after its entry.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—AUDITOR

"11–521. Appointment of auditor.

"SUBCHAPTER I.—JURISDICTION

"§ 11–501. Civil jurisdiction

"In addition to its jurisdiction as a United States district court and any other jurisdiction conferred on it by law, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia has jurisdiction of the following:

"(1) Any civil action or other matter begun in the court before the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reroganization Act of 1970 other than any matter over which the Superior Court of the District of Columbia takes jurisdiction under section 11–921(a)(4)(B).

"(2) Any civil action begun in the court during the eighteen-month period beginning on such effective date under—

"(A) chapter 3 of title 21 (relating to gifts to minors);

"(B) chapter 5 of title 21 (relating to hospitalization of the mentally ill);

"(C) chapter 7 of title 21 (relating to property of the mentally ill);

"(D) chapter 11 of title 21 (relating to commitment and maintenance of mentally retarded persons);

"(E) chapter 13 of title 21 (relating to appointment of committees for alcoholics and addicts);

"(F) chapter 15 of title 21 (relating to appointment of conservators); or

"(G) chapter 29 of title 16 (relating to partition of property and assignment of dower).

"(3) Any civil action or other matter filed in the court during the eighteen-month period beginning on such effective date—

"(A) which would have been within the jurisdiction of the Orphans Court of Washington County, District of Columbia, before June 21, 1870;

"(B) relating to the execution or validity of wills devising real property within the District of Columbia, and of wills and testaments properly presented for probate in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, and the admission to probate and recording those wills;

"(C) relating to the proof of wills of either personal or real property and the revocation of probate of wills for cause;

"(D) involving the granting and revocation for cause of letters testamentary, letters of administration, letters and colligendum and letters of guardianship, and the appointment of successors to persons whose letters have been revoked;

"(E) involving the hearing, examination, and issuance of decrees upon accounts, claims, and demands existing between executors or administrators and legatees or persons entitled to a distributive share of an intestate estate, or between wards and their guardians;

"(F) involving the enforcement of the rendition of inventories and accounts by executors, administrators, collectors, guardians, and trustees required to account to the court;

"(G) involving the enforcement of distribution of estates by executors and administrators and the payment or delivery by guardians of money or property belonging to their wards; or

"(H) otherwise within the probate jurisdiction of the court on the day before such effective date.

"(4) Any civil action (other than a matter over which the Superior Court of the District of Columbia has jurisdiction under paragraph (3) or (4) of section 11–921(a)) begun in the court during the thirty-month period beginning on such effective date wherein the amount in controversy exceeds $50,000.

"§ 11–502. Criminal jurisdiction

"In addition to its jurisdiction as a United States district court or any other jurisdiction conferred on it by law, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia has original jurisdiction of the following:

"(1) Any criminal case began in the court by the return of an indictment or the filing of an information before the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970.

"(2) Any criminal case which is begun in the court by the return of an indictment or the filing of an information during the eighteen-month period beginning on such effective date and which—

"(A) involves a violation of any one of the following sections of the Act entitled 'An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia', approved March 3, 1901:

"(i) section 809 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–201) (relating to abortion),

"(ii) section 803 (D.C. Code, sec 22–501) (relating to assault with intent to kill, rob, rape, or poison),

"(iii) section 823(a) (D.C. Code, sec. 22–1801(a)) (relating to a burglary in the first degree),

"(iv) section 812 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2101) (relating to kidnaping),

"(v) sections 798 through 802 (D.C. Code, secs. 22–2401 through 22–2405) relating to murder and manslaughter),

"(vi) section 808 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2801) (relating to rape),

"(vii) section 810 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2901) (relating to robbery); or

"(B) involves any other offense under any law applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia which offense is joined in such information or indictment with any of offenses listed in subparagraph (A).

"(3) Any offense under any law applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia which offense is joined in the same information or indictment with any Federal offense.

"§ 11–503. Removal of cases from the Superior Court of the District of Columbia

"A civil action or criminal prosecution in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia is removable to the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in accordance with chapter 89 of title 28, United States Code.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—AUDITOR

"§ 11–521. Appointment of auditor

"For so long as the business of the court may require, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia may appoint an auditor for the court.

"Chapter 7.—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS

"SUBCHAPTER I.—CONTINUATION AND ORGANIZATION

"11–704. Oath of judges.

"11–705. Assignment of judges; divisions; hearings.

"11–706. Absence, disability, or disqualification of judges; vacancies; quorum.

"11–707. Assignment of judges to and from Superior Court.

"11–708. Clerks and secretaries for judges.

"11–709. Reports.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—JURISDICTION

"11–721. Orders and judgments of the Superior Court.

"11–741. Administrative orders and decisions.

"SUBCHAPTER III.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

"11–741. Contempt powers.

"11–742. Oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments.

"11–743. Rules of Court.

"SUBCHAPTER I.—CONTINUATION AND ORGANIZATION

"§ 11–701. Continuation of court; court of record; seal

"(a) The District of Columbia Court of Appeals (hereafter in this subchapter referred to as the 'court') shall continue as a court of record in the District of Columbia.

"(b) The Court shall have a seal.

"§ 11–702. Composition.

"The court shall consist of a chief judge and eight associate judges.

"§ 11–703. Judges; services; compensation

"(a) The chief judge and the judges of the court shall serve in accordance with chapter 15 of this title.

"(b) Judges of the court shall be compensated at the rate of $36,000 per annum. The chief judge, during his service in that position, shall receive an additional $500 per annum.

"§ 11–704. Oath of judges

"Each judge, when appointed, shall take the oath prescribed for judges of courts of the United States.

"§ 11–705. Assignment of judges; divisions; hearings

"(a) Judges of the court shall sit on the court and its divisions in such order and at such times as the chief judge directs.

"(b) Cases and controversies shall be heard and determined by divisions of the court unless a hearing or rehearing before the court in banc is ordered. Each division of the court shall consist of three judges.

"(c) A hearing before the court in banc may be ordered by a majority of the judges of the court in regular active service. The court in banc for a hearing shall consist of the judges of the court in regular active service.

"(d) A rehearing before the court in banc may be ordered by a majority of the judges of the court in regular active service. The court in banc for a rehearing shall consist of the judges of the court in regular active service, except that a retired judge may sit as a judge of the court in banc in the rehearing of a case or controversy if he sat on the court or a division of the court at the original hearing thereof.

"§ 11–706. Absence, disability, or disqualification of judges; vacancies; quorum

"(a) When the chief judge of the court is absent or disabled, his duties shall devolve upon and be performed by such associate judge as the chief judge may designate in writing. In the event that the chief judge is (1) disqualified or suspended, or (2) unable or fails to make such a designation, his duties shall devolve upon and be performed by the associate judge of the court next in seniority according to the date of his original commission.

"(b) A chief judge whose term as chief judge has expired shall continue to serve until redesignated or until his successor has been designated. When there is a vacancy in the position of chief judge, the position shall be filled temporarily as provided in subsection (a).

"(c) Two judges shall constitute a quorum of a division of the court, and six judges shall constitute a quorum of the court sitting in banc.

"§ 11–707. Assignment of judges to and from Superior Court

"(a) The chief judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals may designate and assign temporarily one or more judges of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia to sit upon the District of Columbia Court of Appeals or a division thereof whenever the business of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals so requires. Such designations or assignments shall be in conformity with the rules or orders of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"(b) Upon presentation of a certificate of necessity by the chief judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, the chief judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals may designate and assign temporarily one or more judges of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals to serve as a judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia.

"§ 11–708. Clerks and secretaries for judges

"Each judge may appoint and remove a personal law clerk and a personal secretary.

"§ 11–709. Reports

"Each judge shall submit to the chief judge such reports and data as the chief judge may request.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—JURISDICTION

"§ 11–721. Orders and judgments of the Superior Court

"(a) The District of Columbia Court of Appeals has jurisdiction of appeals from—

"(1) all final orders and judgments of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia—

"(2) interlocutory orders of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia—

"(A) granting, continuing, modifying, refusing, or dissolving or refusing to dissolve or modify injunctions;

"(B) appointing receivers, guardians, or conservators or refusing to wind up receiverships, guardianships, or the administration of conservators or to take steps to accomplish the purposes thereof; or

"(C) changing or affecting the possession of property; and

"(3) orders or rulings of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia appealed by the United States or the District of Columbia pursuant to section 23–104 or 23–111 (d)(2).

"(b) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, a party aggrieved by an order or judgment specified in subsection (a) of this section, may appeal therefrom as of right to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"(c) Review of judgments of the Small Claims and Conciliation Branch of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia and of judgments in the Criminal Division of that court where the penalty imposed is a fine of less than $50 for an offense punishable by imprisonment for one year or less, or by fine of not more than $1,000, or both, shall be by application for the allowance of an appeal, filed in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"(d) When a judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, in making in a civil or criminal case a ruling or order not otherwise appealable under this section, shall be of the opinion that the ruling or order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for a difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the ruling or order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation or case, he shall so state in writing in the ruling or order. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals may thereupon, in its discretion, permit an appeal to be taken from that ruling or order, if application is made to it within ten days after the issuance or entry of the ruling or order. An application for an appeal under this subsection shall not stay proceedings in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia unless that court or a judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals shall so order.

"(e) On the hearing of any appeal in any case, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals shall give judgment after an examination of the record without regard to errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties.

"§ 11–722. Administrative orders and decisions

"The District of Columbia Court of Appeals has jurisdiction to review orders and decisions of the Commissioner of the District of Columbia, the District of Columbia Council, and any agency (including the District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency, the Board of Zoning Adjustment of the District of Columbia, the Zoning Commission of the District of Columbia, and the Public Service Commission of the District of Columbia) in accordance with the District of Columbia Administrative Procedure Act (D.C. Code, secs. 1–1501—1–1510), or in the case of orders and decisions of the Public Service Commission of the District of Columbia under section 8 of the Act of March 4, 1913 (D.C. Code, title 43), in accordance with that section.

"§ 11–741. Contempt powers

"In addition to the powers conferred by section 402 of title 18, United States Code, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, or a judge thereof, may punish for disobedience of an order or for contempt committed in the presence of the court.

"§11–742. Oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments

"Each judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and each employee of the court authorized by the chief judge may administer oaths and affirmations and take acknowledgments.

"§ 11–743. Rules of court

"The District of Columbia Court of Appeals shall conduct its business according to the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure unless the court prescribes or adopts modifications of those Rules.

"Chapter 9.—SUPERIOR COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"11–922. Transfer of civil actions to Superior Court.
"11–923. Criminal jurisdiction; commitment.

"SUBCHAPTER III.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

"11–941. Issuance of warrants; record.
"11–942. Subpoenas.
"11–943. Process.
"11–944. Contempt powers.
"11–945. Oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments.
"11–946. Rules of court.

"SUBCHAPTER I.—CONTINUATION AND ORGANIZATION

"§ 11–901. Continuation of courts; court of record; seal

"The District of Columbia Court of General Sessions, the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, and the District of Columbia Tax Court are consolidated in a single court to be known as the Superior Court of the District of Columbia (hereafter in this title referred to as the 'Superior Court'). The Superior Court shall be a court of record in the District of Columbia and shall have a single seal.

"§ 11–902. Organization of the court

"The Superior Court shall consist of the following divisions: Criminal Division, Civil Division, Family Division, Tax Division, and Probate Division. The divisions of the Superior Court may be divided into such branches as the Superior Court may by rule prescribe.

"§ 11–903. Composition

"(a) On the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970 the Superior Court shall consist of a chief judge and thirty-six associate judges.

"(b) Eighteen months after such effective date, three additional associate judges shall be appointed to the Superior Court.

"§ 904. Judges; service; compensation

"(a) The chief judge and the judges of the Superior Court shall serve as provided in chapter 15 of this title.

"(b) Judges of the Superior Court shall be compensated at the rate of $34,000 per annum. The chief judge, during his service in that position, shall receive an additional $500 per annum.

"§ 11–905. Oath of judges

"Each judge of the Superior Court, when appointed, shall take the oath prescribed for judges of courts of the United States.

"§ 11–906. Administration by chief judge; discharge of duties

"(a) The chief judge shall administer and superintend the business of the Superior Court, as provided in chapter 17 of this title. He shall give his attention to the discharge of the duties especially pertaining to his office and to the performance of such additional judicial work as he is able to perform.

"(h) He shall, insofar as is consistent with this title, arrange and divide the business of the Superior Court and fix the time of sessions of the various divisions and branches of the Superior Court.

"§ 11–907. Absence, disability, or disqualification of chief judge

"(a) When the chief judge of the court is absent or disabled, his duties shall devolve upon and be performed by such associate judge as the chief judge may designate in writing. In the event that the chief judge is (1) disqualified or suspended, or (2) unable or fails to make such a designation, his duties shall devolve upon and be performed by the associate judge of the court next in seniority according to the date of his original commission.

"(b) A chief judge whose term as chief judge has expired shall continue to serve until redesignated or until his successor has been designated. When there is a vacancy in the position of chief judge, the position shall be filled temporarily as provided in subsection (a).

"§ 11–908. Designation and assignment of judges

"(a) The chief judge may designate the number of judges to serve in any division and branch of the Superior Court and may assign and reassign each judge to sit in any division and branch. When making assignments to the Family Division and Tax Division, the chief judge shall consider the qualifications and interest of the judges. Each associate judge shall attend and serve in the division and branch to which he is assigned.

"(b) When the business of the Superior Court requires, the chief judge may certify to the chief judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals the need for temporary assignment of an additional judge or judges as provided in section 11–707.

"§ 11–909. Meetings and reports

"(a) The judges of the Superior Court shall meet together at such times as may be specified in the rules of the Superior Court, and at the call of the chief judge, to consider matters relating to the business and operations of the Superior Court.

"(b) Each associate judge shall submit to the chief judge such reports and data as the chief judge may request,

"§ 11–910. Clerks and secretaries for judges

"Each judge of the Superior Court may appoint and remove a personal law clerk and a personal secretary.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—JURISDICTION

"§ 11–921. Civil jurisdiction

"(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the Superior Court shall have jurisdiction of any civil action or other matter (at law or in equity) brought in the District of Columbia. Such jurisdiction shall vest in the court as follows:

"(1) Beginning on the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970, the court shall have jurisdiction of any civil action or other matter begun before such effective date in the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions, the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, or the District of Columbia Tax Court.

"(2) Beginning on such effective date, the court shall have jurisdiction of any civil action or other matter, at law or in equity (other than a matter over which the United States District Court for the District of Columbia has jurisdiction under paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of section 11–501), which is begun in the Superior Court on or after such effective date and in which the amount in controversy does not exceed $50,000.

"(3) Beginning on such effective date, the court shall have jurisdiction (regardless of the amount in controversy) of any civil action or other matter, at law or in equity, which is begun in the court on or after such effective date and which—

"(A) is brought under—

"(i) subchapter I of chapter 11 of title 16 (relating to ejectment);

"(ii) subchapter II or III of chapter 13 of title 16 (relating to the condemnation of land on behalf of the District of Columbia);

"(iii) chapter 19 of title 16 (relating to writs of habeas corpus directed to persons other than Federal officers and employees).

"(iv) chapter 25 of title 16 (relating to change of name);

"(v) chapter 33 of title 16 (relating to quieting title to real property);

"(vi) subchapter II of chapter 35 of title 16 (relating to writ of quo warranto);

"(vii) chapter 37 of title 16 (relating to replevin of personal property);

"(viii) the Hospital Treatment for Drug Addicts Act for the District of Columbia (D.C. Code, secs. 24–601 through 24–611) (relating to commitment of narcotics users); or

"(ix) section 2 of the Act of August 3, 1968 (D.C. Code, sec. 1–804(b)) (relating to contractors bonds);

"(B) involves an appeal from or petition for review of any assessment of tax (or civil penalty thereon) made by the District of Columbia;

"(C) is brought under chapter 23 of title 16; or

"(D) is based upon personal injury or property damage (or both) if all the parties to such action are residents of the District of Columbia and the conduct giving rise to the action occurred in the District of Columbia.

"(4) Immediately following the expiration of the eighteen-month period beginning on such effective date, the court shall have jurisdiction (regardless of the amount in controversy)—

"(A) of any matter (at law or in equity)—

"(i) which would have been within the jurisdiction of the Orphans Court of Washington County, District of Columbia, before June 21, 1870;

"(ii) relating to the execution or validity of wills devising real property within the District of Columbia, and of wills and testaments properly presented for probate in the court, and the admission to probate and recording of those wills;

"(iii) relating to the proof of wills of either personal or real property and the revocation of probate of wills for cause;

"(iv) involving the granting and revocation for cause of letters testamentary, letters of administration, letters ad colligendum and letters of guardianship, and the appointment of successors to persons whose letters have been revoked;

"(v) involving the hearing, examination, and issuance of decrees upon accounts, claims, and demands existing between executors or administrators and legatees or persons entitled to a distributive share of an intestate estate, or between wards and their guardians;

"(vi) involving the enforcement of the rendition of inventories and accounts by executors, administrators, collectors, guardians, and trustees required to account to the court;

"(vii) involving the enforcement of distribution of estates by executors and administrators and the payment or delivery by guardians of money or property belonging to their wards; or

"(viii) otherwise within the probate jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia on the day before such effective date; and

"(B) any matter (at law or in equity) described in subparagraph (A) which was begun in the United States District for the District of Columbia.

"(5) Immediately following the expiration of the eighteen-month period beginning on such effective date, the court shall have jurisdiction (regardless of the amount in controversy) of any civil action or other matter, at law or in equity, brought under—

"(A) chapter 3 of title 21 (relating to gifts to minors);

"(B) chapter 5 of title 21 (relating to hospitalization of the mentally ill);

"(C) chapter 7 of title 21 (relating to property of the mentally ill);

"(D) chapter 11 of title 21 (relating to commitment and maintenance of mentally retarded persons);

"(E) chapter 13 of title 21 (relating to appointment of committee for alcoholics and addicts);

"(F) chapter 15 of title 21 (relating to appointment of conservators); or

"(G) chapter 29 of title 16 (relating to partition of property and assignment of dower).

"(6) Immediately following the expiration of the thirty-month period beginning on such effective date, the court shall have jurisdiction (regardless of the amount in controversy) of any civil action or other matter, at law or in equity, brought in the District of Columbia.

"(b) The Superior Court shall not have jurisdiction over any civil action or other matter (1) over which exclusive jurisdiction is vested in a Federal Court in the District of Columbia, or (2) over which jurisdiction is vested in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia under section 11–501 (relating to civil actions or other matters begun in such court before the expiration of the thirty-month period beginning on the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970).

"(c) For purposes of subsection (a)(3)(D) and section 11–922(b)(1)(B) the term 'resident of the District of Columbia' shall not include (1) any elective officer of the Government of the United States, (2) any employee on the staff of an elected officer if such employee is a bona fide domiciliary of the State of residence of such elected officer, (3) any officer of the executive branch of the Government whose appointment to the office held by him was by the President of the United States and subject to confirmation by the Senate of the United States and whose tenure of office is at the pleasure of the President if such officer is a bona fide domiciliary of a State of the United States, or (4) any officer of a foreign government or any employee of a foreign government or international organization or association if such person is a bona fide domiciliary of a foreign country.

"§ 11–922. Transfer of civil actions to Superior Court

"(a) In a civil action begun in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia before the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970 (other than an action for equitable relief), where it appears to the satisfaction of the court at or subsequent to any pretrial hearing but before trial thereof that the action will not justify a judgment in excess of $10,000 and does not otherwise invoke the jurisdiction of the court, the court may certify the action to the Superior Court for trial.

"(b) In a civil action begun in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia during the thirty-month period beginning on the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970, the court may certify the action to the Superior Court if it appears to the satisfaction of the United States District Court at or subsequent to any pretrial hearing, but before the trial thereof that—

"(1) the action—

"(A) will not justify a judgment in excess of $50,000; or

"(B) is based upon personal injury or property damage (or both), all parties thereto are residents of the District of Columbia, and the conduct on which the action is based occurred in the District of Columbia; and

"(2) the action does not otherwise invoke the jurisdiction of the court.

"(c) When an action is transferred under this section, the pleadings in the action, together with a copy of the docket entries and copies of any orders entered therein, and the deposit for costs, shall be sent to the Superior Court. The Superior Court shall thereafter treat the case as though it had been filed originally in that court, except that the jurisdiction of the court shall extend to the amount claimed in the action even though it exceeds the applicable jurisdictional limitation.

"§ 11–923. Criminal jurisdiction; commitment

"(a) The Superior Court has jurisdiction over all criminal cases pending in the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions before the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970.

"(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the Superior Court has jurisdiction of any criminal case under any law applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia.

"(2) The Superior Court shall not have jurisdiction of any criminal case under any law applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia begun in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia under section 11–502(2) by the return of an indictment or the filing of an information during the eighteen-month period beginning on such effective date.

"(c)(1) With respect to any criminal case over which the Superior Court has jurisdiction, that court may make preliminary examinations and commit offenders either for trial or for further examination, and may release or detain offenders in accordance with chapter 13 of title 23.

"(2) With respect to any criminal case over which the United States District Court for the District of Columbia has jurisdiction, the Superior Court (A) may make preliminary examinations and commit offenders, either for trial or for further examination, but only during the eighteen-month period beginning on the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970, and (B) may release or detain offenders in accordance with chapter 13 of title 23.

"SUBCHAPTER III.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

"§ 11–941. Issuance of warrants; record

"Judge of the Superior Court may, at any time, including Sundays and legal holidays, on complaint or application under oath or actual view, issue warrants for arrest, search or seizure, or electronic surveillance in connection with crimes and offenses committed within the District of Columbia, or for administrative inspections in connection with laws relating to the public health, safety, and welfare. Each proceeding respecting a warrant shall be recorded as prescribed by the court. Warrants shall be issued free of charge.

"§ 11–942. Subpenas

"(a) The Superior Court may compel the attendance of witnesses by attachment. At the request of any party, subpenas for attendance at a hearing or trial in the Superior Court shall be issued by the clerk of the court. A subpena may be served at any place within the District of Columbia, or at any place without the District of Columbia that is within twenty-five miles of the place of the hearing or trial specified in the subpena. The form, issuance, and manner of service of the subpena shall be as prescribed by rule of the court.

"(b) A subpena in a criminal case in which a felony is charged may be served at any place within the United States upon order of a judge of the court.

"§ 11–943. Process

"(a) All process other than a subpena may be served at any place within the District of Columbia, and, when authorized by statute, by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, at any place without the District of Columbia.

"(b) Service upon a third-party defendant, upon a person whose joinder is needed for just adjudication, and upon persons required to respond to any order of commitment for civil contempt may be served at all places outside the District of Columbia that are not more than one hundred miles from the place of hearing or trial specified.

"(c) The form, issuance, and manner of service of process shall be as prescribed by rule of the court.

"§ 11–944. Contempt power

"In addition to the powers conferred by section 402 of title 18, United States Code, the Superior Court, or a judge thereof, may punish for disobedience of an order or for contempt committed in the presence of the court.

"§ 11–945. Oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments

"Each judge and each employee of the Superior Court authorized by the chief judge may administer oaths and affirmations and take acknowledgments.

"§ 11–946 Rules of court

"The Superior Court shall conduct its business according to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure (except as otherwise provided in title 23) unless it prescribes or adopts modifications of those Rules. Modifications of the Federal Rules shall be submitted for the approval of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, and they shall not take effect until approved by that court. The Superior Court may adopt and enforce other rules as it may deem necessary without the approval of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals if such rules do not modify the Federal Rules.

"Chapter 11.—FAMILY DIVISION OF THE SUPERIOR COURT

"'Sec.

"11–1101. Exclusive jurisdiction.

"§ 11–1101. Exclusive jurisdiction

"The Family Division of the Superior Court shall be assigned exclusive jurisdiction of—

"(1) actions for divorce from the bond of marriage and legal separation from bed and board, including proceedings incidental thereto for alimony, pendente lite and permanent, and for support and custody of minor children;

"(2) applications for revocation of divorce from bed and board;

"(3) actions to enforce support of any person as required by law;

"(4) actions seeking custody of minor children, including petitions for writs of habeas corpus;

"(5) actions to declare marriages void;

"(6) actions to declare marriages valid;

"(7) actions for annulments of marriage;

"(8) determinations and adjudications of property rights, both real and personal, in any action referred to in this subsection, irrespective of any jurisdictional limitation imposed on the Superior Court;

"(9) proceedings in adoption;

"(10) proceedings under the Act of July 10, 1957 (D.C. Code, secs. 30-301 to 30-324);

"(11) proceedings to determine paternity of any child born out of wedlock;

"(12) civil proceedings for protection involving intrafamily offenses, instituted pursuant to chapter 10 of title 16;

"(13) proceedings in which a child, as defined in section 16-2301, is alleged to be delinquent, neglected, or in need of supervision;

"(14) proceedings under chapter 5 of title 21 relating to the commitment of the mentally ill; and

"(15) proceedings under chapter 11 of title 21 relating to the commitment of the mentally retarded.

"Sec.
"11-1201. Exclusive jurisdiction.
"11-1202. Abolition of other remedies.
"11-1203. Rules and regulations.

"§ 11-1201. Exclusive jurisdiction

"The Tax Division of the Superior Court shall be assigned exclusive jurisdiction of—

"(1) all appeals from and petitions for review of assessments of tax and civil penalties thereon made by the District of Columbia; and

"(2) all proceedings brought by the District of Columbia for the imposition of criminal penalties pursuant to the provisions of the statutes relating to taxes levied by or in behalf of the District of Columbia.

"§ 11-1202. Abolition of other remedies

"Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the jurisdiction of the Tax Division of the Superior Court to review the validity and amount of all assessments of tax made by the District of Columbia is exclusive. Effective on and after the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970, any common-law remedy with respect to assessments of tax in the District of Columbia and any equitable action to enjoin such assessments available in a court other than the former District of Columbia Tax Court is abolished. Actions properly filed before the effective date of that Act are not affected by this section and the court in which any such action has been filed may retain jurisdiction until its disposition.

"§ 11-1203. Rules and regulations

"The Superior Court may make such rules and regulations for conducting business in the Tax Division, consistent with the statutes applicable to such business and with the Superior Court's general rules of practice and procedure, as it may deem necessary and proper. Rules and regulations for the Tax Division shall, insofar as possible, assure the prompt disposition of matters before the Tax Division to the end that the taxing statutes of the District of Columbia shall be fairly and efficiently enforced.

"SUBCHAPTER I.—CONTINUATION AND SESSIONS

"§ 11-1301. Continuation of Branch

"The Small Claims and Conciliation Branch shall continue as a branch of the Civil Division in the Superior Court.

"§ 11-1302. Sessions

"The Small Claims and Conciliation Branch, with a judge in attendance, shall be open for the transaction of business on every day of the year except Saturday afternoons, Sundays, and legal holidays, and shall hold evening sessions whenever necessary.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—JURISDICTION AND PROCEDURES

"§ 11-1321. Exclusive jurisdiction of small claims

"The Small Claims and Conciliation Branch has jurisdiction over all cases within the jurisdiction of the Superior Court in which the amount of the plaintiff's claim or the claimed value of personal property in controversy does not exceed $500, exclusive of interest, attorney fees, protest fees, and costs.

"§ 11-1322. Arbitration and conciliation

"In order to effect the speedy settlement of controversies, and with the consent of the parties thereto, the Small Claims and Conciliation Branch may settle cases, irrespective of the amount involved, by the methods of arbitration and conciliation. The judges sitting in the Branch may act as referees or arbitrators, either alone or in conjunction with other persons, as provided by rule of the court. A judge, officer, or employee of the Superior Court may not accept any fee or compensation in addition to his salary for services performed pursuant to this section.

"§ 11-1323. Certification of cases by Superior Court judges; recertification

"When the interests of justice seem to require and all parties consent thereto, a judge of the Superior Court may certify a case to the Small Claims and Conciliation Branch for conciliation, or to endeavor to obtain a complete or partial agreed statement of facts or stipulation, which will simplify and expedite the ultimate trial of the case. With the consent of all parties, the trial of the case may be completed in the Branch. In the absence of consent, the case shall be recertified to another judge of the Civil Division for trial.

"SUBCHAPTER I.—APPOINTMENT; QUALIFICATIONS; SERVICE OF JUDGES

"§11-1501. Appointment and qualifications of judges

"(a) The President of the United States shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint all judges of the District of Columbia courts. He shall have power to fill all vacancies that may occur in those courts during a recess of the Senate, by granting commission which shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate.

"(b) A person may not be appointed a judge of a District of Columbia court unless he—

"(1) is a citizen of the United States;

"(2) (A) is a member of the bar of the District of Columbia, and (B) (i) has been a member of such bar for a period of at least five years, or (ii) in the case of a professor of law in a law school in the District of Columbia or of an attorney employed in the District of Columbia by the United States or the District of Columbia, has been eligible for membership in the bar of the District of Columbia for at least five years prior to his appointment; and

"(3) has been actively engaged, for at least five of the ten years immediately prior to his appointment, as an attorney in the practice of law in the District of Columbia, as a judge of a District of Columbia court, as a professor of law in a law school in the District of Columbia, or as an attorney employed in the District of Columbia by the United States or the District of Columbia.

During his term of service and for one year after the termination thereof, no member of the District of Columbia Commission on Judicial Disability and Tenure shall be eligible for nomination or appointment to a District of Columbia court.

"Subject to the provisions of subchapters II and III of this chapter, a judge of a District of Columbia court shall serve for a term of ten years, and upon completion of such term, such judge shall continue to serve until his successor is appointed and qualifies.

"§ 11-1503. Designation of Chief Judge

"(a) The chief judge of a District of Columbia court shall be designated by the President of the United States from among the judges of the court in regular active service, and shall serve for a term of four years or until his successor is designated. He shall be eligible for redesignation. A judge may relinquish his position as chief judge, after giving notice to the President.

"(b) If a chief judge is not redesignated, or relinquishes the office of chief judge, he shall continue as an associate judge.

"§ 11-1504. Service of retired judges

"A judge retired for reasons other than disability may perform, upon designation of a chief judge, those judicial duties which he is willing and able to undertake.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMISSION ON JUDICIAL DISABILITIES AND TENURE

"§ 11-1521. Establishment of Commission

"There shall be a District of Columbia Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure (hereafter in this subchapter referred to as the 'Commission'). The Commission shall have power to suspend, retire, or remove a judge of a District of Columbia court, as provided in this subchapter.

"§ 11–1522. Membership

"(a) The Commission shall consist of seven members appointed by the President as follows:

"(1) Two members shall be appointed from active or retired Federal judges serving in the District of Columbia.

"(2) Two members shall be appointed from members of the bar of the District of Columbia who are actively engaged in the practice of law in the District of Columbia.

"(3) Three members shall be appointed from residents of the District of Columbia, at least two of whom are not members of the bar of the District of Columbia.

The Chairman of the Commission shall be designated by the concurrence of at least four members. The term of the Chairman shall be two years.

"(b) There shall be four alternate members of the Commission appointed by the President as follows:

"(1) One alternate member shall be appointed from active or retired Federal judges serving in the District of Columbia.

"(2) Two alternate members shall be appointed from members of the bar of the District of Columbia who are actively engaged in the practice of law in the District of Columbia.

"(3) One alternate member shall be appointed from residents of the District of Columbia who are not members of the bar of the District of Columbia.

"(c) No member or alternate member (other than a Federal judge appointed under subsection (a) or (b)) shall be an officer or employee of an executive or military department of the Government of the United States (listed in section 101 or 102 of title 5 of the United States Code), an officer or employee of the United States employed in the legislative or judicial branch of the Government of the United States, or an officer or employee of the District of Columbia government.

"§ 11–1523. Term of office—members; vacancy; continuation of service by a member; term of office—alternates

"(a)(1) The terms of office for the members of the Commission shall be six years, except that upon appointment of the first members; two members shall serve for two years; two for four years; two for six years; and one for three years, as designated by the President at the time of appointment. A member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term of his predecessor shall serve only for the remainder of that term. Any vacancy in the Commission shall be filled pursuant to section 11–1522.

"(2) If approved by the Commission, a member may serve after the expiration of his term for purposes of participating until conclusion in a matter, relating to the suspension, retirement, or removal of a judge, begun before the expiration of his term. A member's successor may be appointed without regard to the member's continuation in service, but his successor may not participate in the matter for which the member's continuation in service was approved.

"(b) The terms of office for the alternate members of the Commission shall be six years. An alternate member shall serve as a member pursuant to rules adopted by the Commission.

"§ 11–1524. Compensation

"Any member or alternate who is an officer or employee of the United States shall serve without compensation. Other members or alternate members shall receive the daily equivalent of the rate provided for GS–18 of the General Schedule contained in section 5332 of title 5, United States Code when actually engaged in service for the Commission.

"§ 11–1525. Operations; personnel; administrative services

"(a) The Commission may make such rules and regulations for its operations as it may deem necessary, and such rules and regulations shall be effective on the date specified by the Commission. The District of Columbia Administrative Procedure Act (D.C. Code, secs. 1–1501 to 1510) shall be applicable to the Commission only as provided by this subsection. For the purposes of the publication of rules and regulations, judicial notice, and the filing and compilation of rules, sections 5, 7, and 8 of that Act (D.C. Code, secs. 1–1504, 1–1506, and 1–1507), insofar as consistent with this subchapter, shall be applicable to the Commission; and for purposes of those sections, the Commission shall be deemed an independent agency as defined in section 3(5) of that Act (D.C. Code, sec. 1–1502). Nothing contained herein shall be construed to require prior public notice and hearings on the subject of rules adopted by the Commission.

"(b) The Commission is authorized, without regard to the provisions governing appointment and classification of District of Columbia employees, to appoint and fix the compensation of, or to contract for, such officers, assistants, reporters, counsel, and other persons as may be necessary for the performance of its duties. It is authorized to obtain the services of medical and other experts in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, but at rates not to exceed the daily equivalent of the rate provided for GS–18 of the General Schedule.

"(c) The District of Columbia is authorized to detail, on a reimbursable basis, any of its personnel to assist in carrying out the duties of the Commission.

"(d) Financial and administrative services (including those related to budgeting and accounting, financial reporting, personnel, and procurement) shall be provided to the Commission by the District of Columbia, for which payment shall be made in advance, or by reimbursement, from funds of the Commission in such amounts as may be agreed upon by the Chairman of the Commission and the District of Columbia government. Regulations of the District of Columbia for the administrative control of funds shall apply to funds appropriated to the Commission.

"§ 11–1526. Removal; involuntary retirement; proceedings

"(a)(1) A judge of a District of Columbia court shall be removed from office upon the filing in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals by the Commission of an order of removal certifying the entry, in any court within the United States, of a final judgment of conviction of a crime which is punishable as a felony under Federal law or which would be a felony in the District of Columbia.

"(2) A judge of a District of Columbia court shall also be removed from office upon affirmance of an appeal from an order of removal filed in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals by the Commission (or upon expiration of the time within which such an appeal may be taken) after a determination by the Commission of—

"(A) willful misconduct in office,

"(B) willful and persistent failure to perform judicial duties, or

"(C) any other conduct which is prejudicial to the administration of justice or which brings the judicial office into disrepute.

"(b) A judge of a District of Columbia court shall be involuntarily retired from office when (1) the Commission determines that the judge suffers from a mental or physical disability (including habitual intemperance) which is or is likely to become permanent and which prevents, or seriously interferes with, the proper performance of his judicial duties, and (2) the Commission files in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals an order of involuntary retirement and the order is affirmed on appeal or the time within which an appeal may be taken from the order has expired.

"(c)(1) A judge of a District of Columbia court shall be suspended, without salary—

"(A) upon—

"(i) proof of his conviction of a crime referred to in subsection (a)(1) which has not become final, or

"(ii) the filing of an order of removal under subsection (a)(2) which has not become final; and

"(B) upon the filing by the Commission of an order of suspension in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

Suspension under this paragraph shall continue until termination of all appeals. If the conviction is reversed or the order of removal is set aside, the judge shall be reinstated and shall recover his salary and all other rights and privileges of his office.

"(2) A judge of a District of Columbia court shall be suspended from all judicial duties, with such retirement salary as he may be entitled to pursuant to subchapter III of this chapter, upon the filing by the Commission of an order of involuntary retirement under subsection (b) in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. Suspension shall continue until termination of all appeals. If the order of involuntary retirement is set aside, the judge shall be reinstated and shall recover his judicial salary less any retirement salary received and shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of his office.

"(3) A judge of a District of Columbia court shall be suspended from all or part of his judicial duties, with salary, if the Commission (A) upon the concurrence of four members, orders a hearing for the removal or retirement of the judge and determines that his suspension is in the interest of the administration of justice, and (B) files an order of suspension in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. The duration of the suspension shall be specified in the order but may be modified, as appropriate, by the Commission.

"(a)(1) On its own initiative, or upon complaint or report of any person, formal or informal, the Commission may undertake an investigation of the conduct or health of any judge. After such investigation as it deems adequate, the Commission may terminate the investigation or it may order a hearing concerning the health or conduct of the judge. Nothing in this subchapter shall preclude any informal contacts with the judge, or the chief judge of his court, by the Commission, whether before or after a hearing is ordered, to discuss any matter related to its investigation.

"(2) A judge whose conduct or health is to be the subject of a hearing by the Commission shall be given notice of such hearing and of the nature of the matters under inquiry not less than thirty days before the date on which the hearing is to be held. He shall be admitted to such hearing and to every subsequent hearing regarding his conduct or health. He may be represented by counsel, offer evidence in his own behalf, and confront and cross-examine witnesses against him.

"(3) Within ninety days after the adjournment of hearings, the Commission shall make findings of fact and a determination regarding the conduct or health of a judge who was the subject of the hearing. The concurrence of at least five members shall be required for a determination of grounds for removal or retirement. Upon a determination of grounds for removal or retirement, the Commission shall file an appropriate order pursuant to subsections (a) and (b) of section 11–1526. On or before the date the order is filed, the Commission shall notify the judge, the chief judge of his court, and the President of the United States.

"(b) The Commission shall keep a record of any hearing on the conduct or health of a judge and one copy of such record shall be provided to the judge at the expense of the Commission.

"(c) (1) In the conduct of investigations and hearings under this section the Commission may administer oaths, order and otherwise provide for the inspection of books and records, and issue subpenas for attendance of witnesses and the production of papers, books, accounts, documents, and testimony relevant to any such investigation or hearing. It may order a judge whose health is in issue to submit to a medical examination by a duly licensed physician designated by the Commission.

"(2) Whenever a witness before the Commission refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce books, papers, documents, records, recordings, or other materials, and the Commission determines that the testimony or production of evidence is necessary to the conduct of its proceedings, it may order the witness to testify or produce the evidence. The Commission may issue the order no earlier than ten days after the day on which it served the Attorney General with notice of its intention to issue the order. The witness may not refuse to comply with the order on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, but no testimony or other information compelled under the order (or any information directly or indirectly derived from the testimony or production of evidence) may be used against the witness in any criminal case, nor may it be used as a basis for subjecting the witness to any penalty or forfeiture contrary to constitutional right or privilege. No witness shall be exempt under this subsection from prosecution for perjury committed while giving testimony or producing evidence under compulsion as provided in this subsection.

"(3) If any person refuses to attend, testify, or produce any writing or things required by a subpena issued by the Commission, the Commission may petition the United States district court for the district in which the person may be found for an order compelling him to attend and testify or produce the writings or things required by subpena. The court shall order the person to appear before it at a specified time and place and then and there shall consider why he has not attended, testified, or produced writings or things as required. A copy of the order shall be served upon him. If it appears to the court that the subpena was regularly issued, the court shall order the person to appear before the Commission at the time or place fixed in the order and to testify or produce the required writings or things. Failure to obey the order shall be punishable as contempt of court.

"(4) In pending investigations or proceedings before it, the Commission may order the deposition of any person to be taken in such form and subject to such limitation as may be prescribed in the order. The Commission may file in the Superior Court a petition, stating generally, without identifying the judge, the nature of the pending matter, the name and residence of the person whose testimony is desired, and directions, if any, of the Commission requesting an order requiring the person to appear and testify before a designated officer. Upon the filing of the petition the Superior Court may order the person to appear and testify. A subpena for such deposition shall be issued by the clerk of the Superior Court and the deposition shall be taken and returned in the manner prescribed by law for civil actions.

"(d) It shall be the duty of the United States marshals upon the request of the Commission to serve process and to execute all lawful orders of the Commission.

"(e) Each witness, other than an officer or employee of the United States or the District of Columbia, shall receive for his attendance the same fees, and all witnesses shall receive the allowances, prescribed by section 15–714 for witnesses in civil cases. The amount shall be paid by the Commission from funds appropriated to it.

"§ 11–1528. Privilege; confidentiality

"(a) The filing of papers with and the giving of testimony before the Commission shall be privileged. Unless otherwise authorized by the judge whose conduct or health is the subject of the proceedings under section 11–1527(a), the hearings before the Commission, the record thereof, and all papers filed in connection with such hearings shall be confidential. But on prosecution of a witness for perjury or on review of a decision of the Commission, the record of hearings before the Commission and all papers filed in connection therewith shall be disclosed to the extent required for the prosecution or review.

"(b) If the Commission determines that no grounds for removal or involuntary retirement exist it shall notify the judge and inquire whether he desires the Commission to make available to the public information pertaining to the nature of its investigation, its hearings, findings, determinations, or any other fact related to its proceedings regarding his health or conduct. Upon receipt of such request in writing from the judge, the Commission shall make such information available to the public.

"§ 11–1529 Judicial review

"(a) A judge aggrieved by an order of removal or retirement filed by the Commission pursuant to subsection (a) or (b) of section 11–1526 may seek judicial review thereof by filing notice of appeal with the Chief Justice of the United States. Notice of appeal shall be filed within thirty days of the filing of the order of the Commission in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"(b) Upon receipt of notice of appeal from an order of the Commission, the Chief Justice shall convene a special court consisting of three Federal judges designated from among active or retired judges of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

"(c) The special court shall review the order of the Commission appealed from and, to the extent necessary to decision and when presented, shall decide all relevant questions of law and interpret constitutional and statutory provisions. It shall affirm or reverse the order of the Commission or remand the matter to the Commission for further proceedings.

"(d) The special court shall hold unlawful and set aside a Commission order or determination found to be—

"(1) arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law;

"(2) contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity;

"(3) in excess of statutory jurisdiction, authority, or limitations, or short of statutory right;

"(4) without observance of procedure required by law; or

"(5) unsupported by substantial evidence. In making the foregoing determinations, the special court shall review the whole record or those parts of it cited by the judge or the Commission, and shall take due account of the rule of prejudicial error.

"(e) As appropriate and to the extent consistent with this chapter, the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure governing appeals in civil cases shall apply to appeals taken under this section.

"(f) Decisions of the special court shall be final and conclusive.

"SUBCHAPTER III.—RETIREMENT

"§ 11–1561. Definitions

"For purposes of this subchapter—

"(1) The term 'judge' means any judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals or the Superior Court or any person with judicial service as described in paragraph (2) of this section.

"(2) The term 'judicial service' means service as a judge in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, the Superior Court, or the former Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, District of Columbia Tax Court, police court, municipal court, or District of Columbia Court of General Sessions.

"(3) The terms 'retire' and 'retirement' include retirement, resignation, or failure to be recommissioned or reappointed upon the expiration of a commission.

"(4) The term 'fund' means the District of Columbia Judicial Retirement and Survivors Annuity Fund as provided in section 11–1570.

"(5) The term 'widow' means a surviving wife of a judge who has either (A) been married to the judge for at least two years preceding his death or (B) is the mother of issue by the marriage and has not remarried.

"(6) The term 'widower' means a surviving husband of a judge who has either (A) been married to the judge for at least two years preceding her death or (B) is the father of issue by the marriage and has not remarried.

"(7) The term 'Commissioner' means the Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

"(8) The term 'child' means—

"(A) an unmarried child under eighteen years of age, including (i) an adopted child, and (ii) a stepchild or recognized natural child who lived with the judge in a regular parent-child relationship;

"(B) such unmarried child regardless of age who is incapable of self-support because of mental or physical disability incurred before age eighteen; or

"(C) such unmarried child between eighteen and twenty-two years of age who is a student regularly pursuing a full-time course of study or training in residence in a high school, trade school, technical or vocational institute, junior college, college, university or comparable recognized educational institution. For the purpose of this paragraph, a child whose twenty-second birthday occurs before July 1 or after August 31 of a calendar year, and while he is regularly pursuing such a course of study or training, is deemed to have become twenty-two years of age on the first day of July after that birthday. A child who is a student is deemed not to have ceased to be a student during an interim between school years if the interim is not more than five months and if he shows to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that he has a bona fide intention of continuing to pursue a course of study or training in the same or different school during the school semester (or other period into which the school year is divided) immediately after the interim.

"(9) The term 'lump-sum credit for retirement' means the unrefunded amount consisting of—

"(A) retirement deductions made from the basic salary of a judge;

"(B) amounts deposited covering earlier judicial and nonjudicial service; and

"(C) interest on the deductions and deposits at 4 per centum a year to December 31, 1947, and 3 per centum a year thereafter compounded annually to December 31, 1956, or, in the case of a judge separated or transferred to a position not within the purview of this section before he has completed five years of service, to the date of the separation or transfer;

but the term 'lump-sum credit for retirement' does not include interest—

"(i) if the service covered thereby aggregates one year or less; or

"(ii) for the fractional part of a month in the total service.

"(10) The term 'lump-sum credit for survivor annuity' means the unrefunded amount consisting of—

"(A) survivor annuity deductions made from the salary of a judge;

"(B) amounts deposited for survivor annuity covering earlier judicial and nonjudicial service; and

"(C) interest on the deductions and deposits at 4 per centum a year to December 31, 1947, and 3 per centum a year thereafter compounded annually to December 31, 1956, or, in the case of a judge separated or transferred to a position not within the purview of this section before he has completed five years of service, to the date of the separation or transfer;

but the term 'lump-sum credit for survivor annuity' does not include interest—

"(i) if the service covered thereby aggregates one year or less; or

"(ii) for the fractional part of a month in the total service.

"§ 11–1562. Eligibility for retirement

"(a) A judge is eligible for retirement under this subchapter when he has completed ten years of judicial service, whether continuous or not, or upon mandatory retirement as provided in section 11–1502.

"(b) The retirement salary of a judge who retires shall commence as follows:

"(1) With twenty or more years of judicial service, at age fifty.

"(2) With less than twenty years of judicial service, at age sixty, unless he elects to receive a reduced salary beginning at age fifty-five or at the date of retirement if subsequent to that age.

"(c) A judge with five years or more of judicial service, including civilian service performed by the judge which is creditable under section 8332 of title 5, United States Code, may voluntarily retire for a mental or physical disability which is or is likely to become permanent and which prevents, or seriously interferes with, the proper performance of judicial duties. Such disability shall be established by furnishing to the Commission a certificate of disability signed by a duly licensed physician, approved by the Surgeon General of the United States, and containing such information and conclusions as the Commissioner by regulation may require consistent with this subsection.

"(d) A judge involuntarily retired for permanent disability pursuant to subchapter II of this chapter shall be eligible for retirement salary if he has five years or more of service, judicial or judicial and civilian, performed by the judge which is allowable under section 8332 of title 5, United States Code. The retirement salary of a judge who retires under this subsection shall commence upon the date his retirement becomes effective.

"§ 11–1563. Withholding of retirement payments; lump sum credit

"(a) There shall be deducted and withheld from the basic salary of each judge appointed after October 31, 1964, and each judge appointed before November 1, 1964, who has elected to come within the provisions of this subchapter an amount equal to 3½ per centum of his basic salary. Amounts so deducted and withheld shall be deposited in the fund in accordance with procedures established by the Commissioner. Each judge subject to this section shall be deemed to consent and agree to such deductions from basic salary, and payment less such deductions shall constitute a full and complete discharge and acquittance of all claims and demands whatsoever for all regular service during the period covered by such payment, except the right to the benefits to which he shall be entitled under this subsection, notwithstanding any law, rule, or regulation affecting the Judge's salary.

"(b) If he has not previously so deposited, each judge subject to this section shall deposit in the fund, with interest at 4 per centum per annum to December 31, 1947, and 3 per centum per annum thereafter, compounded on December 31 of each year, a sum equal to 3½ per centum of his basic salary received for judicial service performed by him as a judge prior to the date he became subject to the District of Columbia Judges Retirement Act of 1964. Each judge may elect to make such deposits in installments during the continuance of his judicial service in such amounts as may be determined in each instance by the Commissioner. Notwithstanding the failure of any judge to make such deposits, credit shall be allowed for the service rendered by the retirement pay for such judge shall be reduced by 10 per centum of such deposit remaining unpaid unless the judge shall elect to eliminate the service involved for purposes of retirement salary computation, except as provided in section 11–1564(d).

"(c) If any judge who is subject to this section is removed, resigns, or fails to be recommissioned or reappointed, he is entitled to be paid his lump-sum credit for retirement if application for payment is filed with the Commissioner at least thirty-one days before the commencing date of any retirement salary for which he is eligible. The receipt of the lump-sum credit for retirement by the judge voids all retirement salary rights under this subchapter, until he is reemployed in judicial service subject to this subchapter.

"(d) If a judge who has not elected to bring himself within the survivor annuity provisions of this subchapter dies while in regular active service, the lump-sum credit for retirement shall be paid, upon the establishment of a valid claim therefor, to the person or persons surviving him in the order of precedence established in section 11–1569 (b). Such payments shall be a bar to recovery by any other person.

"§ 11–1564. Computation of retirement salary; election to credit other service

"(a) The retirement salary of a judge who retires pursuant to section 11–1562 (a) and (b) shall be paid annually in equal monthly installments during the remainder of his life and shall bear the same ratio to his basic salary immediately prior to the date of his retirement as the total of his aggregate years of service bears to the period of thirty years. A judge who elects to receive a reduced retirement salary pursuant to section 11–1562 (b) (2) shall have his retirement salary reduced by one-twelfth of 1 per centum for each month or fraction of a month he is under the age of sixty at the time of the commencement of his reduced retirement salary. In no event shall the retirement salary of a judge exceed 80 per centum of his basic salary immediately prior to the date of his retirement.

"(b) The retirement salary of a judge retired for disability pursuant to section 11–1562 (c) or (d) shall be paid annually in equal monthly installments during the remainder of his life and shall be computed as provided in subsection (a). If a judge is retired for disability, his retirement salary shall not be reduced because of his age at the time of retirement. In no event shall the retirement salary of a judge retired for disability be less than 50 per centum or exceed 80 per centum of his basic salary immediately prior to the date of his retirement.

"(c) In computing the retirement salary of a judge retiring under section 11–1562, the judge shall be entitled, if he so elects during the continuance of his judicial service or at the time of his retirement, to receive, in addition to the amount provided for in subsection (a) of this section, an amount (payable annually in equal monthly installments during the remainder of his life) based on military and civilian service performed by the judge which is creditable under section 8332 of title 5, United State Code, computed in accordance with section 8339 (a), (b), (c), (d), (g), and (h) of that title, as applicable, subject to the provisions of section 8334 (c) and (d) of that title and the provisions of subsection (d) of this section; except that average pay for the purpose of the computation shall be deemed to be the basic salary of the judge immediately prior to the date of his retirement under section 11–1562.

"(d)(1) The crediting of service with respect to any judge under subsection (c) of this section shall be made on the standard basis of a deposit in a sum equal to 3½ per centum of his basic salary, pay, or compensation for civilian service creditable under section 8332 of title 5, United States Code, with interest as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2) Interest on deposits under this subsection is computed from the midpoint of each service period included in the computation to the date of deposit or the commencing date of the retirement salary of the judge, whichever date is the earlier. Interest is computed at the rate of 4 per centum a year to December 31, 1947, and 3 per centum a year thereafter, compounded annually. Interest may not be charged for a period of separation from the service which began before October 31, 1956.

"(3) Deposit under this subsection may not be required for—

"(A) service before August 1, 1920;

"(B) military service; or

"(C) service for the Panama Railroad Company before January 1, 1924.

"(4) If a judge elects to be credited with service under subsection (c) of this section, his lump-sum credit, or any remaining balance thereof, in the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund or in the retirement fund of any other retirement system for civilian employees of the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia, shall be transferred to the District of Columbia Judicial Retirement and Survivors Annuity Fund. The judge shall be deemed to consent to the transfer. The transfer shall be a complete discharge and acquittance of all claims and demands against the retirement system from which the funds were transferred on account of the service so credited.

"(5) A judge whose lump-sum credit is transferred to the fund under paragraph (4) of this subsection is not required to make deposits in addition to the amount transferred for periods of service for which full contributions were made to the retirement system from which the transfer was made.

"(6) In the case of a judge whose lump-sum credit has been transferred to the fund under paragraph (4) of this subsection and who has not elected a survivor annuity under section 11–1566, or prior corresponding provision of law, the Commissioner shall refund to the judge any amount which the Commissioner determines to be in excess of the amount of the deposit required by this subsection. In the case of a judge whose lump-sum credit has been transferred to the fund under paragraph (4) of this subsection and who, prior to the effective date of this section, had elected a survivor annuity and made deposits to the fund for survivor annuity purposes, the Commissioner shall refund to the judge any amount which the Commissioner determines in excess of the amount of the deposit required by section 11–1567.

"(7) If any civilian service performed by the judge which is creditable under section 8332 of title 5, United States Code, is not covered by the amount of the lump-sum credit transferred under paragraph (4) of this subsection, the judge may make deposit, on the standard basis prescribed by paragraph (1) of this subsection, with interest as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, in accordance with and subject to the applicable provisions of section 8334 (c) and (4) of that title, of the amount or amounts necessary for him to receive full credit for that service for the purposes of subsection (c) of this section. The deposit may be made, as the judge may elect, in installments, during the continuance of his judicial service, in such amounts as the Commissioner may determine in each instance, or in a lump sum prior to or at the time of his retirement under section 11–1562. A judge electing to make installment deposits shall not be given full credit for the service until the total required deposit is made.

"(8) For the purpose of survivor annuity, deposits authorized by this subsection also may be made by the survivor of a judge.

"(e) Nothing in this subchapter shall prevent a judge eligible therefor from simultaneously receiving his retirement salary under this section and any annuity or retired pay to which he would otherwise be entitled under any other law without regard to this subchapter. However, in computing the retirement salary of a judge under this section, service used in the computation of such other annuity shall not be credited.

"§ 11–1565. Service by retired judges

"Any retired judge performing full-time judicial duties on the District of Columbia Court of Appeals or the Superior Court shall be entitled, during the period for which he serves, to receive the salary of the office in which he performs such duties, but there shall be deducted from such salary an amount equal to his retirement salary for that period. No deduction shall be withheld for health benefits, Federal employees' life insurance, or retirement purposes from the salary paid to a retired judge during judicial service. The performance of such judicial service shall not create an additional retirement, change a retirement, or create or in any manner affect a survivor annuity.

"§ 11–1566. Survivor annuity; election; relinquishment

"(a) Any judge, whether or not subject to sections 11–1562 to 11–1565, may, by written election filed with the Commissioner within six months after the date on which he takes office or is reappointed or recommissioned, or within six months after he marries, bring himself within the survivor annuity provisions of this subchapter.

"(b) Any judge in regular active service or any retired judge, who shall have elected survivor annuity, and who after that election is unmarried and does not have a dependent child, may elect—

"(1) to terminate the deductions and withholdings from his salary under section 11–1567(a) and any installment payments elected to be made under the section 11–1567 (b); and

"(2) to have paid to him the lump-sum credit for survivor annuity.

Any election under this subsection shall be made in writing and filed with the Commissioner.

"(c) If any judge who shall have elected survivor annuity resigns from office otherwise than under the provisions of this subchapter or is removed, he shall be entitled to be paid the lump-sum credit for survivor annuity.

"(d) Payment of the lump-sum credit for survivor annuity as provided in this section shall extinguish all claims with respect to survivor annuity.

"§ 11–1567. Survivor annuity; payments to fund

"(a) There shall be deducted and withheld from the salary (whether basic or retirement) of each judge who has elected survivor annuity a sum equal to 3 per centum of that salary. The amounts so deducted and withheld shall, in accordance with such procedures as may be prescribed by the Commissioner, be deposited in the fund. Every judge who elects survivor annuity shall be deemed thereby to consent and agree to the deductions from his salary as provided in this subsection, and payment less such deductions shall constitute a full and complete discharge and acquittance of all claims and demands whatever for all judicial services rendered by such judge during the period covered by such payment, except the right to the benefits to which he or his survivors shall be entitled under the survivor annuity provisions of this subchapter.

"(b) If he has not previously so deposited, each judge who has elected survivor annuity shall deposit to the fund, with interest at 4 per centum per annum to December 31, 1947, and 3 per centum per annum thereafter, compounded on December 31 of each year, a sum equal to 3 per centum of his salary received for judicial service and of retirement salary (but excluding salary for judicial service under section 11–1565); and a sum equal to 3 per centum of his basic salary, pay, or compensation for civilian service creditable under section 8332 of title 5, United States Code, with interest as provided in section 11–1564(d). Except to the extent that the Commissioner has made refund to the judge under section 11–1564 (d)(6), deposit is not required with respect to that portion of the service of the judge covered by the transfer, under section 11–1564(d)(4), of his lump-sum credit to the fund. In addition, deposit may not be required for the types of service described in section 11–1564(d)(3). Each judge may elect to make deposits under this subsection in installments during the continuance of his judicial service in such amounts as may be determined in each instance by the Commissioner. Deposits under this subsection also may be made by the survivor of a judge.

"(c) If a judge or survivor fails to make such deposits, credit shall be allowed for the service, but the annuity of the widow or widower of such judge shall be reduced by an amount equal to 10 per centum of the deposit required by this section, computed as of the date of the death of the judge, unless the widow or widower elects to eliminate the service not covered by deposit entirely from credit for computation purposes except as provided in section 11–1564(d)(3).

"§ 11–1568. Survivor annuity; entitlement; computation

"(a) The service of a judge for the purpose of computing a survivor annuity includes his judicial service (and retired service for which deductions are made) and, subject to section 8334(d) of title 5, United States Code, his military and civilian service which is creditable under section 8332 of that title.

"(b) Nothing in this subchapter shall prevent a widow or widower eligible therefor from simultaneously receiving a survivor annuity under this subchapter and any other annuity (survivor or otherwise) or retired pay to which he or she would otherwise be entitled under any other law without regard to this subchapter. However, in computing the surivor annuity of that widow or widower under this subchapter, service used in the computation of such other survivor annuity shall not be credited.

"(c) If a judge who has elected a survivor annuity dies in regular active service or after having retired from such service with at least five years of allowable service under this section for which payments have been withheld or deposits made, the survivor annuity shall be paid as follows:

"(1) If the judge is survived by a widow or widower but no child, the widow or widower shall receive, beginning on the day after the judge dies, an amount computed as provided in subsection (e); or

"(2) If the judge is survived by a widow or widower and one or more children—

"(A) the widow or widower shall receive an immediate annuity in the amount computed as provided in subsection (e); and

"(B) there also shall be paid to or on behalf of each such child an immediate annuity equal to one-half the amount of the annuity of such widow or widower, but not to exceed the lesser of (i) $2,700 per year divided by the number of such children or (ii) $900 per child per year; or

"(3) If the judge leaves no surviving widow or widower but leaves a surviving child or children, there shall be paid to or on behalf of each such child an immediate annuity equal to the amount of the annuity to which the widow or widower would have been entitled under paragraph (1) of this subsection had he or she survived, but not to exceed the lesser of (A) $3,240 per year divided by the number of children or (B) $1,080 per child per year.

An annuity payable to a widow or widower under this section shall be terminable upon death or remarriage. The annuity payable to a child shall be terminable upon his death or marriage or his ceasing to be a child as defined in section 11–1561(8). In case of the death of a widow or widower of a judge leaving a child or children of the judge surviving, the annuity of such child or children shall be recomputed and paid as provided in paragraph (3) of this subsection. In any case in which the annuity of a child is terminated, the annuities of any remaining child or children, based upon the service of the same judge, shall be recomputed and paid as though the child whose annuity was terminated had not survived the judge.

"(d) Questions of disability or other eligibility requirements of a child under this section shall be determined by the Commissioner who may order such medical or other examinations at any time as he deems necessary with respect to determining the facts concerning the disability of a child receiving or applying for an annuity under this subchapter. An annuity may be denied or suspended for failure to submit to examination.

"(e) The annuity of a widow or widower of a judge electing survivor annuity shall be an amount equal to the sum of—

"(1) 1¼ per centum of the average annual salary received for service allowable under subsection (a) during the last three years of such service prior to death or retirement multiplied by the sum of his years of judicial service and his Member, congressional employee, and his military service allowable under subsection (a); and

"(2) three-fourths of 1 per centum of such average annual salary multiplied by his years of all other civilian service allowable under subsection (a).

A survivor annuity shall not exceed 44 percentum of the average annual salary described in paragraph (1) of this subsection and shall be subject to reduction as provided in section 11–1567(c).

"§ 11–1569. Survivor annuity; payment; order of precedence

"(a) Survivor annuities shall accrue monthly and shall be due and payable in monthly installments on the first business day of the month following the month or other period for which the annuity shall have accrued.

"(b) In any case in which—

"(1) a judge who has elected survivor annuity shall die (A) while in regular active service after having rendered five years of allowable service as provided in section 11–1568(a) or while receiving retirement salary under this subchapter but without a survivor or survivors entitled to annuity under section 11–1568(c) or (B) while in regular active service but before having rendered five years of allowable service; or

"(2) the right of all persons entitled to an annuity under section 11–1568(c) based on the service of the judge shall terminate before a valid claim therefor shall have been established; the lump-sum credit shall be paid, upon the establishment of a valid claim therefor, to the person or persons surviving at the date title to the payment arises, in the following order of precedence, and such payment shall be a bar to recovery by any other person:

"First, to the beneficiary or beneficiaries whom the judge may have designated in writing to the Commissioner prior to the judge's death;

"Second, if there be no such beneficiary, to the widow or widower of the judge;

"Third, if none of the above, to the child or children of the judge and the descendants of any deceased children by representation;

"Fourth, if none of the above, to the parents of the judge or the survivor of them;

"Fifth, if none of the above, to the duly appointed executor or administrator of the estate of such judge;

"Sixth, if none of the above, to such other next of kin of the judge as may be determined by the Commissioner to be entitled under the laws of the domicile of the judge at the time of his death.

Determination as to the widow, widower, or child of a judge for purposes of this subsection shall be made by the Commissioner without regard to the definitions in section 11–1561.

"(c) In any case in which the annuities of all persons entitled to annuity based upon the service of a judge shall terminate before the aggregate amount of annuity paid (together with any amounts received by the judge as retirement salary) equals the total amount credited to the individual account of the judge, with interest at 4 per centum per annum to December 31, 1947, and 3 per centum per annum thereafter, compounded on December 31 of each year, to the date of the death of such judge, the difference shall be paid upon establishment of a valid claim therefor, in the order of precedence prescribed in subsection (b).

"(d) Any accrued annuity remaining unpaid upon the termination (other than by reason of death) of the annuity of any person based upon the service of a judge shall be paid to such person. Any accrued annuity remaining unpaid upon the death of any person receiving an annuity based upon the service of a judge shall be paid, upon establishment of a valid claim therefor, in the following order of precedence:

"First, to the duly appointed executor or administrator of the estate of the annuitant;

"Second, if there is no such executor or administrator, payment may be made, after the expiration of thirty days from the date of death of the annuitant, to such person or persons as may appear in the judgment of the Commissioner to be legally entitled thereto, and such payments shall be to a bar to recovery by any other person.

"(e) Where any payment under sections 11–1566 to 11–1569 is to be made to a minor or to a person mentally incompetent or under other legal disability adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, such payment may be made to the person who is constituted guardian or other fiduciary by the law of the jurisdiction wherein the claimant resides or is otherwise legally vested with the care of the claimant or his estate. Where no guardian or other fiduciary of the person under legal disability has been appointed under the laws of the jurisdiction wherein the claimant resides, payment may be made to any person who, in the judgment of the Commissioner, is responsible for the care of the claimant, and the payment bars recovery by any other person.

"§ 11–1570. Retirement and annuity fund

"(a) The District of Columbia Judicial Retirement and Survivors Annuity Fund is hereby continued in the Treasury and appropriated for the payment of retirement salaries, annuities, refunds, and allowances as provided in this subchapter. If at any time the balance of the fund is insufficient to pay current obligations arising under this subchapter, there is authorized to be appropriated to the funds, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to pay current obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare the estimates of the annual appropriations required to be made to the fund, and shall make actuarial evaluations of the fund at intervals of five years or more if deemed necessary by the Secretary.

"(b) The Secretary shall invest, from time to time, in interest-bearing securities of the United States or Federal farm loan bonds, any portions of such funds as in his judgment may not be immediately required for payments from the fund and the income derived from such investments shall constitute a part of the fund.

"(c) All amounts deposited by, or deducted and withheld from the salary of, any judge for credit to the fund shall, under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner, be credited to an individual account of the judge.

"(d) None of the moneys mentioned in this subchapter shall be assignable, either in law or in equity, or be subject to execution, levy, attachment, garnishment, or other legal process.

"§ 11–1571. Periodic increases; existing rights

"(a) The retirement salary of any judge, or the annuity of any person based upon the service of a judge, who, on the effective date of any increase which, after the effective date of this section, becomes payable under the provisions of section 8340(b) of title 5, United States Code, is receiving such salary or annuity (1) under the provisions of this subchapter, or (2) under the provisions of section 11–1701, as in effect prior to the effective date of this section, and its predecessor laws, shall be increased on the effective date of the increase by a percentage equal to the percentage of such increase under section 8340 of title 5, United States Code.

"(b) Nothing in this subchapter shall defeat or diminish rights acquired under section 11–1701, as in effect prior to the effective date of this section, and its predecessor laws, except on the election and with the consent of the judge, annuitant, or other person affected.

"SUBCHAPTER 1.—COURT ADMINISTRATION

"§ 11–1701. Administration of District of Columbia court system

"(a) There shall be a Joint Committee on Judicial Administration in the District of Columbia (hereafter in this chapter referred to as the 'Joint Committee') consisting of: The Chief Judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, who shall serve as Chairman, an associate judge of that court elected annually by the judges thereof, the Chief Judge of the Superior Court, and two associate judges of that court elected annually by the judges thereof.

"(b) The Joint Committee shall have responsibility within the District of Columbia court system for the following matters:

"(1) General personnel policies, including those for recruitment, removal, compensation, and training.

"(2) Accounts and auditing.

"(3) Procurement and disbursement.

"(4) Submission of the annual budget requests of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and the Superior Court to the Commissioner of the District of Columbia as the integrated budget of the District of Columbia court system, except that such requests may be modified upon the concurrence of four of the five members of the Joint Committee.

"(5) Approval of the bonds of fiduciary employees within the District of Columbia court system.

"(6) Formulation and enforcement of standards for outside activities of and receipt of compensation by the judges of the District of Columbia court system.

"(7) Development and coordination of statistical and management information systems and reports supporting the annual report of the District of Columbia court system.

"(8) Liaison between the District of Columbia court system and the court systems of other jurisdictions, including the Judicial Conference of the United States, the Judicial Conference of the District of Columbia Circuit, and the Federal Judicial Center.

"(9) With the concurrence of the respective chief judges of the District of Columbia courts, other policies and practices of the District of Columbia court system and resolution of other matters which may be of joint and mutual concern of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and the Superior Court.

"(c) The Joint Committee, with the assistance of the Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts, shall—

"(1) consider and evaluate the business of the courts and means of improving the administration of justice within the District of Columbia court system and shall report thereon in its annual report;

"(2) prepare and publish an annual report of the District of Columbia court system regarding the work of the courts, the performance of the duties enumerated in this chapter, and of any recommendations relating to the courts;

"(3) recommend from time to time to the Congress changes in the organization, jurisdiction, operation, and procedures of the courts which are appropriate for legislative action, and institute such changes, pursuant to the responsibilities enumerated in subsection (b), in the methods of administering judicial business in the court system as would improve the administration of justice; and

"(4) arrange for such training seminars, and other related services, as are desirable and feasible for judges and other court personnel, including services from the Federal Judicial Center on a reimbursable basis.

"(d) The Joint Committee shall have authority to issue all orders and directives necessary to implement the responsibilities and duties enumerated in this section.

"§ 11–1702. Responsibilities of chief judges in the respective courts

"(a) The Chief Judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, in addition to the authority conferred on him by chapter 7 of this title, shall supervise the internal administration of that court—

"(1) including all administrative matters other than those within the responsibility enumerated in section 11–1701(b), and

"(2) including the implementation in that court of the matters enumerated in section 11–1701(b), consistent with the general policies and directives of the Joint Committee.

"(b) The Chief Judge of the Superior Court, in addition to the authority conferred on him by chapter 9 of this title, shall supervise the internal administration of that court—

"(1) including all administrative matters other than those within the responsibility enumerated in section 11–1701(b), and

"(2) including the implementation in that court of the matters enumerated in section 11–1701(b), consistent with the general policies and directives of the Joint Committee.

"§ 11–1703. Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts; appointment; compensation

"(a) There shall be an Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts (hereafter in this chapter referred to as the 'Executive Officer'). He shall be responsible for the administration of the District of Columbia court system subject to the supervision of the Joint Committee and the chief judges of the respective courts as provided in this chapter. He shall be subject to the supervision of the Joint Committee regarding administrative matters that are enumerated in section 11–1701(b). He shall be subject to the supervision of the chief judges in their respective courts: (1) regarding all administrative matters other than those within the responsibility enumerated in section 11–1701(b), and (2) regarding the implementation in the respective courts of the matters enumerated in section 11–1701(b), consistent with the general policies and directives of the Joint Committee.

"(b) The Executive Officer shall be selected by, and subject to removal by the President.

"(c) The Executive Officer shall receive the same compensation as an associated judge of the Superior Court.

"§ 11–704. Oath and bond of the Executive Officer

"(a) The Executive Officer shall take an oath or affirmation for the faithful and impartial discharge of the duties of his office.

"(b) The Executive Officer shall give bond, with two or more sureties, to be approved by the Joint Committee, in an amount prescribed by the Joint Committee, faithfully to discharge the duties of his office.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—COURT PERSONNEL

"§ 11–1721. Clerks of courts

"The District of Columbia Court of Appeals and the Superior Court shall each have a clerk who shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him.

"§ 11–1722. Director of Social Services

"(a) There shall be a Director of Social Services in the Superior Court who shall have charge of all social services for the Superior Court, subject to the supervision of the Executive Officer. With respect to adults, he shall provide probation services, intake procedures, marital and family counseling, social casework, rehabilitation and training programs, and such other services as the court shall prescribe. With respect to juveniles, he shall provide intake procedures, counseling, education and training programs, probation services, and such other service as the court shall prescribe.

"(b) To the maximum extent feasible, the Director shall coordinate with and utilize the services of appropriate public and private agencies within the District of Columbia, and shall coordinate and provide administrative services to volunteers utilized by the Superior Court or any divisions thereof.

"(c) As directed by the Executive Officer, the Director shall conduct studies and make reports relating to the utilization of social services as an adjunct to the Superior Court.

"(d) The Director shall make recommendations with respect to the consolidation or disposition of causes before the court relating to members of the same family or household.

"§ 11–1723. Fiscal Officer; Auditor, bond

"(a) (1) There shall be a Fiscal Officer in the District of Columbia court system who shall be responsible for the budget of the court system and for the accounts of the courts, subject to the supervision of the Executive Officer.

"(2) The Fiscal Officer shall receive, safeguard, and account for all fees, costs, payments, and deposits of money or other items, and shall be responsible for depositing in the Treasury of the United States all fines, forfeitures, fees, unclaimed deposits, and other moneys.

"(3) The Fiscal Officer shall be responsible for the approval of vouchers and the internal auditing of the accounts of the courts and shall arrange for an annual independent audit of the accounts of the courts by the District of Columbia government.

"(b) There shall be an Auditor in the District of Columbia court system who shall be responsible for the auditing of accounts filed in actions and matters before the District of Columbia courts. He shall be subject to the supervision of the Executive Officer.

"(c) The Fiscal Officer and the Auditor shall each give bond with two or more sureties, to be approved by the Joint Committee, in an amount prescribed by the Joint Committee, faithfully to discharge the duties of his respective office.

"§ 11–1724. Appointment of nonjudicial personnel

"(a) Subject to the approval of the Joint Committee, the Executive Officer shall appoint, and may remove, the Fiscal Officer, and such other personnel whose principal function is to perform duties for both District of Columbia courts.

"(b) The Executive Officer shall appoint, and may remove, the Director of Social Services, the clerks of the courts, the Auditor, and all other nonjudicial personnel for the courts as may be necessary (except the personal law clerks and secretaries of the judges) subject to—

"(1) regulations approved by the Joint Committee; and

"(2) the approval of the chief judge of the court to which the personnel are or will be assigned.

Appointments and removals of court personnel shall not be subject to the laws, rules, and limitations applicable to the District of Columbia employees, except as otherwise specified in the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970.

"§ 11–1725. Compensation

"(a) The Executive Officer shall fix the compensation of all nonjudicial employees of the courts without regard to chapter 51, and subchapter III of chapter 53, of title 5, United States Code. He may fix compensation for one position at a rate not to exceed the maximum rate for GS–17 of the General Schedule; and three positions at a rate not to exceed the maximum rate for GS–16 of the General Schedule. He shall be guided, in fixing the rates of compensation of all other nonjudicial employees, by the rates of compensation fixed for other Federal or District of Columbia employees in the judiciary or the executive in the same or similar positions or in positions of similar responsibility, duty, and difficulty.

"§ 11–1726. Court reporters

"(a) The Executive Officer shall appoint reporters who shall be full-time employees of the courts. When necessary, the Executive Officer may contract for additional temporary reporting services. Nothing in this section shall be construed to preclude the Superior Court of the District of Columbia from providing by rule for the sound recording of proceedings in lieu of mechanical (audio or manual) transcription in any branch, division or courtroom of the court. Court reporters shall, in addition to being subject to the general supervision of the Executive Officer, be subject to the supervision of the chief judges of the courts and of the other District of Columbia judges for whom they perform services, regarding the performance of their duties in the respective courts.

"(b) In addition to their annual salaries, court reporters may charge and collect from parties, including the United States and the District of Columbia, who request transcripts of the original records of proceedings, only such fees as may be prescribed from time to time by the Executive Officer. The reporters shall furnish all supplies at their own expense. The Executive Officer shall prescribe such rules, practice, and procedure pertaining to fees for transcripts as he deems necessary, conforming as nearly as practicable to the rules, practice, and procedure established for the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. A fee may not be charged or taxed for a copy of a transcript delivered to a judge at his request or for copies of a transcript delivered to the clerk of a court for the records of the court. Except as to transcripts that are to be paid for by the United States or the District of Columbia, the reporters may require a party requesting a transcript to prepay the estimated fee therefor in advance of delivery of the transcript.

"§ 11–1727. Recruitment and training of personnel

"The Executive Officer shall be responsible for recruiting such qualified personnel as may be necessary for the District of Columbia courts and for providing in-service training for court personnel.

"§ 11–1728. Service of United States marshal

"The United States Marshal for the District of Columbia shall continue to serve the courts of the District of Columbia, subject to the supervision of the Attorney General of the United States.

"§ 11–1729. Reports of court personnel

"(a) Judges of the courts shall furnish time and attendance records to the respective chief judges, with a copy to the Executive Officer.

"(b) All nonjudicial personnel of the courts shall furnish such reports and information to the Executive Officer as he shall request.

"§ 11–1730. Reports of other personnel

"The Executive Officer or the chief judge may request such reports as may be necessary to the efficient administration of the courts from—

"(1) the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia.

"(2) the Corporation Counsel,

"(3) the United States Marshal for the District of Columbia,

"(4) the Commissioner of the District of Columbia,

"(5) the superintendent of any hospitals or institutions to which persons have been committed by the Superior Court,

"(6) the District of Columbia Public Defender Service,

"(7) the District of Columbia Bail Agency,

"(8) the District of Columbia Department of Corrections,

"(9) the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department,

"(10) the District of Columbia Department of Public Health, and

"(11) the District of Columbia Department of Public Welfare.

These officials, agencies, and departments shall furnish such reports and information as may be requested pursuant to this section.

"SUBCHAPTER III.—DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES

"§ 11–1741. Court operations and organizations

"Within the respective District of Columbia courts, and subject to the supervision of the chief judges thereof, the Executive Officer shall—

"(1) supervise, analyze, and improve case assignments, calendars, and dockets;

"(2) provide improved services and introduce new methods to better utilize the time of and accommodate government and other witnesses;

"(3) supervise, analyze, and improve the management of jurors;

"(4) recommend changes and improvements in court rules and procedures affecting his administrative responsibilities;

"(5) report periodically to the appropriate chief judge with respect to case volumes, backlogs, length of time cases have been pending, number and identity of incarcerated defendants awaiting trial, and such other information as the respective chief judges may request;

"(6) mechanize and computerize court operations and services where feasible and desirable, and carry on continuing studies and evaluations of increased and innovative uses of mechanization and computerization;

"(7) conduct studies and research with respect to court operations on his own initiative or on request of the respective chief judges; and

"(8) perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by a chief judge.

"§ 11–1742. Property and disbursement

"(a) The Executive Officer shall be responsible, subject to the supervision of the Joint Committee, for arranging with the appropriate Federal or District of Columbia agencies for the operation, maintenance and repair of such buildings and space as may be assigned to the courts. The allocation of space therein shall be vested in the chief judges of the District of Columbia courts.

"(b) The Executive Officer shall be responsible for the procurement of necessary equipment, supplies, and services for the courts and shall have power, subject to applicable law, to reimburse the District of Columbia government for services provided and to contract for such equipment, supplies, and services as may be necessary.

"(c) The Executive Officer shall serve as disbursing officer and payroll officer of the District of Columbia courts and shall assign and distribute necessary equipment and supplies.

"§ 11–1743. Annual budget

"(a) The Joint Committee shall prepare and submit to the Commissioner of the District of Columbia annual estimates of the expenditures and appropriations necessary for the maintenance and operations of the District of Columbia court system.

"(b) All such estimates shall be forwarded to the Bureau of the Budget by the District of Columbia without revision, but subject to the recommendations of the District of Columbia. Similarly, all estimates shall be included in the budget without revision by the President but subject to his recommendations.

"§ 11–1744. Information and liaison services

"The Executive Officer shall be responsible for—

"(1) collecting and compiling statistical information with respect to the volume and disposition of the work of the courts and the personnel of the courts;

"(2) printing and distribution of court rules;

"(3) keeping the courts advised of pending legislative and executive actions relating to the courts;

"(4) serving as the public information officer of the courts; and

"(5) performing such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Joint Committee and the chief judges in their respective courts.

"§ 11–1745. Reports and records

"(a) The Executive Officer shall prepare and publish, subject to the approval of the Joint Committee, the annual report of the District of Columbia court system of the work of the courts and their operations during the preceding year together with any recommendations relating to the courts. Nothing in this chapter shall prevent the respective chief judges from preparing and publishing any other reports as they may wish.

"(b) The Executive Officer shall be responsible for maintaining and safeguarding the records of the courts. Except for those records required by law to be kept under court seal, he shall make the records available at all reasonable times to—

"(1) the United States Department of Justice,

"(2) the Commissioner of the District of Columbia,

"(3) the District of Columbia Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure, and

"(4) such other agencies as the Joint Committee may specify.

"§ 11–1746. Certification of copies of papers or documents filed in District of Columbia courts

"The Executive Officer shall provide that if any person filing any paper or document in a District of Columbia court requests a certification of such filing, a copy of such paper or document provided by such person shall be appropriately marked for such person to show the time and date of such filing and the identity of the individual with whom such paper or document was filed. Such certified copy shall be prima facie evidence in any proceeding that the original of such paper or document was filed as shown by the certification.

"§ 11–1747. Delegation of authority

"The Executive Officer and court officers appointed by him may delegate to their subordinates authority and responsibility to perform the functions vested in them by law.

"Chapter 19.—JURIES AND JURORS

"Sec.
"11–1901. Qualifications of jurors.
"11–1902. Single jury selection system.
"11–1903. Grand jury; additional grand jury.
"11–1904. Assignment of jury panels.
"11–1905. Length of service.
"11–1906. Fees of jurors.

"§ 11–1901. Qualifications of jurors

"Jurors serving within the District of Columbia shall have the same qualifications as provided for jurors in Federal courts.

"§ 11–1902. Single jury selection system

"There shall be a single system in the District of Columbia for the selection of jurors for both Federal and District of Columbia courts. The selection system shall be that prescribed by Federal law and executed in accordance therewith as provided by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

"§ 11–1903. Grand jury; additional grand jury

"(a) A grand jury serving in the District of Columbia may take cognizance of all matters brought before it regardless of whether an indictment is returnable in the Federal or District of Columbia courts.

"(b) If the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia certifies in writing to the chief judge of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, or the chief judge of the Superior Court, that the exigencies of the public service require it, the judge may, in his discretion, order an additional grand jury summoned, which shall be drawn at such time as he designates. Unless sooner discharged by order of the judge, the additional grand jury shall serve until the end of the term for which it is drawn.

"§ 11–1904. Assignment of jury panels

"The names of persons to serve as jurors in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia and the Superior Court shall be drawn from time to time as may be required, and such persons shall be assigned to jury panels within those courts as the courts may decide.

"§ 11–1905. Length of service

"Petit jurors summoned for service in the District of Columbia shall serve for such period of time and at such sessions as the particular court shall direct, but, unless actually engaged as a trial juror in a particular case, may not be required to serve in the court for more than one month in any twelve consecutive months.

"§ 11–1906. Fees of jurors

"Jurors serving in the Superior Court shall receive the same fees as jurors serving in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

"§ 11–2101. Continuation of office

"The Office of the Register of Wills shall continue as an office in the Probate Division of the Superior Court.

"§ 11–2102. Appointment; oath; bond

"The Superior Court shall appoint the Register of Wills. The Register of Wills shall—

"(1) take an oath for the faithful and impartial discharge of the duties of his office; and

"(2) give bond, with two or more sureties, to be approved by the chief judge of the Superior Court, in the amount designated by the court, faithfully to discharge the duties of his office, and seasonably to record (A) the decrees and orders of the court in any matters over which the court exercises probate jurisdiction or powers, (B) all wills proved before him or the court, and (C) all other matters directed to be recorded in the court or in his office.

The bond shall be entered in full upon the minutes of the Superior Court and the original filed with records of the Superior Court.

"§ 11–2103. Services as clerk

"With respect to the Probate Division of the Superior Court, the Register of Wills shall perform such duties as clerk as the chief judge of the Superior Court may assign.

"§ 11–2104. Powers and duties; restrictions; penalties

"(a) The Register of Wills may—

"(1) receive inventories and accounts of sales, examine vouchers, and state accounts of executors, administrators, collectors, and guardians, subject to final approval of the court;

"(2) take the probate of claims against the estates of deceased persons that are properly brought before him, and approve or reject claims not exceeding $300; and

"(3) take the probate of wills and accept the bonds of executors, administrators, collectors, and guardians, subject to approval of the court.

"(b) In matters over which the Superior Court has probate jurisdiction or power, the Register of Wills shall—

"(1) make full and fair entries, in separate records, of the proceedings of the court;

"(2) make fair record in strong bound books of all wills proved before him or the court, keeping separate books for wills within the jurisdiction of the court;

"(3) make fair and separate record of other matters required by law to be recorded in the court;

"(4) lodge in places of safetv, designated by the court, original papers filed with him;

"(5) make out and issue every summons, process and order of the court;

"(6) make fair and uniform tables of his fees, and post them in a conspicuous place in his office for the inspection of persons having business therein;

"(7) prepare and submit such reports as may be required to the Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts; and

"(8) in every respect, act under the control and direction of the court.

"(c) The Register of Wills may not—

"(1) practice law in any court of the District of Columbia or of the United States; or

"(2) demand or receive any fee, gratuity, gift, or reward for giving his advice in any matter relating to his office.

"(d) The Register of Wills shall forfeit to the court the sum of $50 for each day that the tables referred to in subsection (b)(6) are missing through his neglect, which may be recovered as other debts for the same amount are recoverable.

"(e) If the Register of Wills or a person acting for him takes a greater fee than the fee provided for by law, he shall pay the party injured $100, which may be recovered as other debts for the same amount are recoverable.

"§ 11–2105. Deputies and other employees

"The Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts shall appoint and remove such personnel as may be needed by the Register of Wills, pursuant to chapter 17 of this title.

"§ 11–2106. Accounts

"All fees, costs, and other moneys, except uncollected fees not required by law to be prepaid, collected by the Register of Wills with respect to matters within the jurisdiction of the Superior Court shall be turned over to the Fiscal Officer of the District of Columbia courts.

"Chapter 23.—MEDICAL EXAMINER

"Sec.

"11–2031. Medical Examiner; Deputies; appointment, qualifications, and compensation.

"11–2302. Supporting services and facilities.

"11–2303. Former duties of coroner; oaths; teaching.

"11–2304. Deaths to be investigated; notification and investigation of deaths.

"11–2305. Possession of evidence and property.

"11–2306. Further investigation; autopsy.

"11–2307. Autopsy by pathologist other than Medical Examiner.

"11–2308. Delivery of body; expenses.

"11–2309. Records; reports, fees for other services.

"11–2310. Records as evidence.

"11–2311. Autopsies performed by court order.

"11–2312. Tissue transplants.

"§ 11–2301. Medical Examiner; Deputies; appointment, qualifications, and compensation

"(a) The Commissioner of the District of Columbia shall designate or appoint a Chief Medical Examiner and such Deputy Medical Examiners for the District of Columbia as may be necessary.

"(b) The Chief Medical Examiner and his deputies shall be physicians licensed in the District of Columbia. The Chief Medical Examiner and at least one deputy shall be certified in anatomic pathology by the American Board of Pathology or be board eligible. They may be designated from among physicians practicing in the District of Columbia Department of Public Health.

"(c) The Commissioner shall fix the compensation of the Chief Medical Examiner and his deputies at a rate or rates not in excess of the per diem equivalent of the maximum rate for GS–18 of the General Schedule contained in section 5332 of title 5 of the United States Code.

"§ 11–2302. Supporting services and facilities

"The Commissioner shall furnish or make available such investigative, technical, and clerical personnel, facilities, and equipment as the medical examiners shall require, or he may arrange or contract for such services, equipment, and facilities with the United States Government or universities and hospitals in the District of Columbia.

"§ 11–2303. Former duties of Coroner; oaths; teaching

"(a) The Chief Medical Examiner shall be responsible for all the medical functions formerly performed by the coroner in the District of Columbia, consistent with the provisions of this chapter, and the Chief Medical Examiner and his deputies may administer oaths and affirmations and take affidavits in connection with the performance of their duties.

"(b) The Chief Medical Examiner and his deputies may be authorized by the Commissioner of the District of Columbia to teach medical and law school classes, to conduct special classes for law enforcement personnel, and to engage in other activities related to their work.

"§ 11–2304. Deaths to be investigated; notification and investigation of deaths

"(a) Under regulations established by the Chief Medical Examiner, the following types of human deaths occurring in the District of Columbia shall be investigated:

"(1) Violent deaths, whether apparently homicidal, suicidal, or accidental, including deaths due to thermal, chemical, electrical, or radiational injury, and deaths due to criminal abortion, whether apparently self-induced or not.

"(2) Sudden deaths not caused by readily recognizable disease.

"(3) Deaths under suspicious circumstances.

"(4) Deaths of persons whose bodies are to be cremated, dissected, buried at sea, or otherwise disposed of so as to be thereafter unavailable for examination.

"(5) Deaths related to disease resulting from employment or to accident while employed.

"(6) Deaths related to disease which might constitute a threat to public health.

"(b) All law enforcement officers, physicians, undertakers, embalmers, and other persons shall promptly notify a medical examiner of the occurrence of all deaths coming to their attention which are subject to investigation under subsection (a) of this section and shall assist in making dead bodies and related evidence available to the medical examiner for investigation and autopsy.

"(c) Any physician, undertaker, or embalmer who willfully fails to comply with this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000.

"(d) The Chief Medical Examiner shall by regulation prescribe procedures for taking possession of a body following a death subject to investigation under subsection (a) of this section and for obtaining all essential facts concerning the medical causes of death and the names and addresses of as many witnesses as it is practicable to obtain.

"§ 11–2305. Possession of evidence and property

"(a) At the scene of any death subject to investigation under section 11–2304, a law enforcement officer or the medical examiner shall take possession of any objects or articles useful in establishing the cause of death and shall hold them as evidence.

"(b) In the absence of the next of kin, a police officer or the medical examiner may take possession of all property of value found on or in the custody of the deceased. If possession is taken of the property, the police officer or medical examiner shall make an exact inventory of it, and deliver the property to the property clerk of the Metropolitan Police Department.

"§ 11–2306. Further investigation; autopsy

"(a) If, in the opinion of the medical examiner, the cause of death is established with reasonable medical certainty, he shall complete a report thereon.

"(b) If, in the opinion of the Chief Medical Examiner, or the United States attorney, further investigation as to the cause of death is required or the public interest so requires, a medical examiner shall either perform, or arrange for a qualified pathologist to perform, an autopsy on the body of the deceased. No consent of next of kin shall be required for an autopsy performed pursuant to this section.

"(c) The medical examiner shall make a complete record of the findings of the autopsy and his conclusions with respect thereto and shall prepare a report, and, upon request, furnish a copy to the appropriate law enforcement agency.

"§ 11–2307. Autopsy by pathologist other than medical examiner

"(a) If an autopsy is performed by a pathologist other than a medical examiner by request of a medical examiner, the pathologist shall furnish to the medical examiner a complete record of the findings of the autopsy and his conclusions with respect thereto. The medical examiner shall thereupon prepare a report, indicating the name of the pathologist performing the autopsy and his findings and conclusions, and the medical examiner's own comments with respect thereto, if appropriate, and, upon request, shall furnish a copy thereof to the appropriate law enforcement agency.

"(b) A pathologist other than a medical examiner who performs an autopsy at the request of a medical examiner shall be compensated in accordance with a fee rate established by the Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

"§ 11–2308. Delivery of body; expenses

"(a) Following investigation or autopsy, the medical examiner shall release the body of the deceased to the person having the right to the body for purposes of burial pursuant to law. If there is no such person, he shall dispose of it according to law.

"(b) Expenses of transportation of a body by a medical examiner and of autopsies performed pursuant to this chapter shall be borne by the District of Columbia.

"§ 11–2309. Records; reports; fees for other services

"(a) The Chief Medical Examiner shall be responsible for maintaining full and complete records and files, properly indexed, giving the name, if known, of very person whose death is investigated, the place where the body was found, the date, cause, and manner of death, and all other relevant information and reports of the medical examiner concerning the death, and shall issue a death certificate.

"(b) The records and files maintained under the provisions of subsection (a) of this section shall be open to inspection by the Commissioner of the District of Columbia or his authorized representative, the United States attorney and his assistants, the Metropolitan Police Department, or any other law enforcement agency or official; and the medical examiner shall promptly deliver to such persons copies of all records relating to every death as to which further investigation may be advisable.

"(c) Any other person with a legitimate interest may obtain copies of records maintained under the provisions of subsection (a) upon such conditions and payment of such fees as may be prescribed by the Chief Medical Examiner. If such person fails to meet the prescribed conditions, he may obtain copies of such records pursuant to court order if the court is satisfied that he has a legitimate interest.

"(d) The Chief Medical Examiner shall prepare an annual report to the Commissioner of the District of Columbia containing information on the number of autopsies performed, statistics as to cause of death, and such other relevant information as the Commissioner of the District of Columbia shall require. The report shall be open to inspection by the public. The report shall not identify by name deceased persons examined.

"(e) Medical examiners may charge fees, at rates prescribed by the Chief Medical Examiner for completing insurance forms or performing similar services for private parties.

"§ 11–2310. Records as evidence

"The records maintained pursuant to section 11–2309, or reproductions thereof certified by the Chief Medical Examiner, are admissable in evidence in any court in the District of Columbia, except that statements made by witnesses or other persons and conclusions upon non-medical matters are not made admissible by this section.

"§ 11–2311. Autopsies performed by court order

"In the case of sudden, violent, or suspicious death when the body is buried without investigation, the United States attorney, on his own motion or on request of a medical examiner or the Metropolitan Police Department, may petition the appropriate court for an order to conduct an inquiry. The court may order the body exhumed and an autopsy performed. In such cases, records and reports shall be filed as if the autopsy were performed prior to burial except that a copy of the report shall be furnished directly to the court.

"§ 11–2312. Tissue transplants

"The medical examiner may allow the removal of tissue pursuant to section 9 of the District of Columbia Tissue Bank Act (D.C. Code, sec. 2–258).

"Chapter 25.—ATTORNEYS

"Sec.
"11–2501. Admission to bar; regulations; prior admission.
"11–2502. Censure, suspension, or disbarment for cause.
"11–2503. Disbarment upon conviction of crime; procedure for censure, suspension, or disbarment.
"11–2504. Censure, suspension, or disbarment by other courts.

"§ 11–2501. Admission to bar; regulations; prior admission

"(a) The District of Columbia Court of Appeals shall make such rules as it deems proper respecting the examination, qualification, and admission of persons to membership in its bar, and their censure, suspension, and expulsion.

"(b) Members of the bar of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals shall be eligible to practice in the District of Columbia courts.

"(c) Members of the bar of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in good standing on April 1, 1972, shall be automatically enrolled as members of the bar of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, and shall be subject to its disciplinary jurisdiction.

"§ 11–2502. Censure, suspension, or disbarment for cause

"The District of Columbia Court of Appeals may censure, suspend from practice, or expel a member of its bar for crime, misdemeanor, fraud, deceit, malpractice, professional misconduct, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. A fraudulent act or misrepresentation by an applicant in connection with his application or admission is sufficient cause for the revocation by the court of his admission.

"§ 11–2503. Disbarment upon conviction of crime; procedure for censure, suspension or disbarment

"(a) When a member of the bar of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals is convicted of an offense involving moral turpitude, and a certified copy of the conviction is presented to the court, the court shall, pending final determination of an appeal from the conviction, suspend the member of the bar from practice. Upon reversal of the conviction the court may vacate or modify the suspension. If a final judgment of conviction is certified to the court, the name of the member of the bar so convicted shall be struck from the roll of the members of the bar and he shall thereafter cease to be a member. Upon the granting of a pardon to a member so convicted, the court may vacate or modify the order of disbarment.

"(b) Except as provided in subsection (a), a member of the bar may not be censured, suspended, or expelled under this chapter until written charges, under oath, against him have been presented to the court, stating distinctly the grounds of complaint. The court may order the charges to be filed in the office of the clerk of the court and shall fix a time for hearing thereon. Thereupon a certified copy of the charges and order shall be served upon the member personally, or if it is established to the satisfaction of the court that personal service cannot be had, a certified copy of the charges and order shall be served upon him by mail, publication, or otherwise as the court directs. After the filing of the written charges, the court may suspend the person charged from practice at its bar pending the hearing thereof.

"§ 11–2504. Censure, suspension, or disbarment by other courts

"The Federal courts in the District of Columbia and the Superior Court may censure, suspend, or expel an attorney from practice at their respective bars, for a crime involving moral turpitude, or professional misconduct, or conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice. If an attorney is expelled from practice under this section, the court expelling him shall notify the other Federal courts in the District of Columbia and the District of Columbia Court of Appeals of the action taken."

"SUBCHAPTER I.—PROCEEDINGS REGARDING DELINQUENCY, NEGLECT, OR NEED OF SUPERVISION

"§ 16–2301. Definitions

"As used in this subchapter—

"(1) The term 'Division' means the Family Division of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia.

"(2) The term 'judge' means a judge assigned to the Family Division of the Superior Court.

"(3) The term 'child' means an individual who is under 18 years of age, except that the term 'child' does not include an individual who is—

"(A) sixteen years of age or older and who is charged by the United States attorney with (i) murder, manslaughter, rape, mayhem, arson, kidnaping, burglary, robbery, any assault with intent to commit any such offense, or assault with a dangerous weapon, or (ii) an offense listed in clause (i) and any other offense properly joinable with such an offense;

"(B) charged with an offense referred to in subparagraph (A) (i) and convicted by plea or verdict of a lesser included offense; or

"(C) sixteen years of age or older and who is charged with a traffic offense.

For purposes of this subchapter the term 'child' also includes a person under the age of twenty-one who is charged with an offense referred to in subparagraph (A) or (C) committed before he attained the age of sixteen, or a delinquent act committed before he attained the age of eighteen.

"(4) The term 'minor' means an individual who is under the age of twenty-one years.

"(5) The term 'adult' means an individual who is twenty-one years of age or older.

"(6) The term 'delinquent child' means a child who has committed a delinquent act and is in need of care or rehabilitation.

"(7) The term 'delinquent act' means an act designated as an offense under the law of the District of Columbia, or of a State if the act occurred in a State, or under Federal law. Traffic offenses shall not be deemed delinquent acts unless committed by an individual who is under the age of sixteen.

"(8) The term 'child in need of supervision' means a child who—

"(A) (i) being subject to compulsory school attendance, is habitually and without justification truant from school;

"(ii) has committed an offense not classified as criminal or is one applicable only to children; or

"(iii) is habitually disobedient of the reasonable and lawful commands of his parent, guardian, or other custodian and is ungovernable; and

"(B) is in need of care or rehabilitation.

"(9) The term 'neglected child' means a child—

"(A) who has been abandoned or abused by his parent, guardian, or other custodian;

"(B) who is without proper parental care or control, subsistence, education as required by law, or other care or control necessary for his physical, mental, or emotional health, and the deprivation is not due to the lack of financial means of his parent, guardian, or other custodian;

"(C) whose parent, guardian, or other custodian is unable to discharge his responsibilities to and for the child because of incarceration, hospitalization, or other physical or mental incapacity; or

"(D) who has been placed for care or adoption in violation of law.

No child who in good faith is under treatment solely by spiritual means through prayer in accordance with the tenets and practices of a recognized church or religious denomination by a duly accredited practitioner thereof shall, for that reason alone, be considered a neglected child for purposes of this subchapter.

"(10) The term 'mentally ill child' means a child who is mentally ill within the meaning of section 21–501.

"(11) The term 'mentally retarded child' means a child who is mentally retarded within the meaning of section 21–1101.

"(12) The term 'custodian' means a person or agency, other than a parent or legal guardian, to whom legal custody of a child has been given by court order and who is acting in loco parentis.

"(13) The term 'detention' means the temporary, secure custody of a child in facilities, designated by the Division, pending a final disposition of a petition.

"(14) The term 'shelter care' means the temporary care of a child in physically unrestricting facilities, designated by the Division, pending a final disposition of a petition.

"(15) The term 'detention or shelter care hearing' means a hearing to determine whether a child who is in custody should be placed or continued in detention or shelter care.

"(16) The term 'factfinding hearing' means a hearing to determine whether the allegations of a petition are true.

"(17) The term 'dispositional hearing' means a hearing, after a finding of fact, to determine—

"(A) whether the respondent in a delinquent or need of supervision case is in need of care or rehabilitation and, if so, what order of disposition should be made; or

"(B) what order of disposition should be made in a neglect case.

"(18) The term 'probation' means a legal status created by court order following an adjudication of delinquency or need of supervision, whereby a minor is permitted to remain in the community subject to appropriate supervision and return to the Division for violation of probation at any time during the period of probation.

"(19) The term 'protective supervision' means a legal status created by Division order in neglect cases whereby a minor is permitted to remain in his home under supervision, subject to return to the Division during the period of protective supervision.

"(20) The term 'guardianship of the person of a minor' means the duty and authority to make important decisions in matters having a permanent effect on the life and development of the minor, and concern with his general welfare. It includes (but is not limited to)—

"(A) authority to consent to marriage, enlistment in the armed forces of the United States, and major medical, surgical, or psychiatric treatment; to represent the minor in legal actions; and to make other decisions concerning the minor of substantive legal significance;

"(B) the authority and duty of reasonable visitation (except as limited by court order);

"(C) the right and responsibility of legal custody when guardianship of the person is exercised by the natural or adoptive parent (except where legal custody has been vested in another person or an agency or institution); and

"(D) the authority to exercise residual parental rights and responsibilities when the rights of his parents or only living parent have been judicially terminated or when both parents are dead.

"(21) The term 'legal custody' means a legal status created by court order which vests in a custodian the responsibility for the custody of a minor which includes—

"(A) physical custody or the determination of where and with whom the minor shall live;

"(B) the right and duty to protect, train, and discipline the minor; and

"(C) the responsibility to provide the minor with food, shelter, education, and ordinary medical care.

A court order of 'legal custody' is subordinate to the rights and responsibilities of the guardian of the person of the minor and any residual parental rights and responsibilities.

"(22) The term 'residual parental rights and responsibilities' means those rights and responsibilities remaining with the parent after transfer of legal custody or guardianship of the person, including (but not limited to) the right of visitation, consent to adoption, and determination of religious affiliation and the responsibility for support.

"§ 16–2302. Transfer of criminal matters to Family Division

"(a) If it appears to a court, during the pendency of a criminal charge and before the time when jeopardy would attach in the case of an adult, that a minor defendant was a child at the time of an alleged offense, the court shall forthwith transfer the charge against the defendant, together with all papers and documents connected therewith, to the Division. All action taken by the court prior to transfer of the case shall be deemed null and void unless the Division transfers the child for criminal prosecution under section 16–2307.

"(b) If at the time of an alleged offense, a minor defendant was a child but this fact was not discovered by the court until after jeopardy has attached, the court shall proceed to verdict. If judgment has not been entered, the court shall determine on the basis of the criteria in section 16–2307(e) whether to enter judgment or to refer the case to the Division for disposition. If judgment has been entered, it shall not be set aside on the ground of the defendant's age.

"(c) The court making a transfer shall order the minor to be taken forthwith to the Division or to a place of detention designated for children by the Superior Court. The Division shall then proceed as provided in this subchapter.

"(d) Nothing in this section shall affect the jurisdiction of a court over a person twenty-one years of age or older.

"§ 16–2303. Retention of jurisdiction

"For purposes of this subchapter, jurisdiction obtained by the Division in the case of a child shall be retained by it until the child becomes twenty-one years of age, unless jurisdiction is terminated before that time. This section does not affect the jurisdiction of other divisions of the Superior Court or other courts over offenses committed by a person after he ceases to be a child. If a minor already under the jurisdiction of the Division is convicted in the Criminal Division or another court of a crime committed after he ceases to be a child, the Family Division may, in appropriate cases terminate its jurisdiction.

"§ 16–2304. Right to counsel

"(a) A child alleged to be delinquent or in need of supervision is entitled to be represented by counsel at all critical stages of Division proceedings beginning at the time of admission or denial of allegations in the petition and at all subsequent stages. If the child and his parent, guardian, or custodian are financially unable to obtain adequate representation, the child shall be entitled to have counsel appointed for him in accordance with rules established by the Superior Court. In its discretion, the Division may appoint counsel for the child over the objection of the child, his parent, guardian, or other custodian.

"(b) When a child is alleged to be neglected, the parent, guardian, or custodian of the child named in the petition is entitled to be represented by counsel at all critical stages of the Division proceedings and, if financially unable to obtain adequate representation, to have counsel appointed in accordance with rules established by the Superior Court. The Division shall, where appropriate, appoint separate counsel to represent the child, as provided in section 16–918.

"§ 16–2305. Petition; contents; amendment

"(a) Complaints alleging delinquency, need of supervision, or neglect shall be referred to the Director of Social Services who shall conduct a preliminary inquiry to determine whether the best interests of the child or the public require that a petition be filed. If judicial action appears warranted, under intake criteria established by rule of the Superior Court, the Director shall recommend that a petition be filed. If the Director decides not to recommend the filing of a petition, the complainant in a delinquency or neglect case shall have a right to have that decision reviewed by the Corporation Counsel, and the Director shall notify the complainant of such right of review.

"(b) Petitions initiating judicial action may be signed by any person who has knowledge of the facts alleged or, being informed of them, believes they are true, except that petitions alleging need of supervision may only be signed by the Director of Social Services, a representative of a public agency or a nongovernmental agency licensed and authorized to care for children, a representative of a public or private agency providing social service for families, a school official, or a law enforcement officer. Petitions shall be verified and verification may be upon information or belief.

"(c) Each petition shall be prepared by the Corporation Counsel after an inquiry into the facts and a determination of the legal basis for the petition. If the Director of Social Services has refused to recommend filing of a delinquency or neglect petition, the Corporation Counsel, on request of the complainant, shall review the facts presented and shall prepare and file a petition if he believes such action is necessary to protect the community or the interests of the child. Any decision of the Corporation Counsel on whether to file a petition shall be final.

"(d) Petitions shall be filed by the Corporation Counsel within ten days after the complaint has been referred to the Director of Social Services, except as otherwise provided in section 16–2312. A petition shall set forth plainly and concisely the facts which give the Division jurisdiction of the child under section 11–1101(13) and in delinquency cases the petition shall state the specific statute or ordinance on which the charge is based; and, if delinquency or need of supervision is alleged, a statement that the child appears to be in need of care or rehabilitation. The petition shall contain such other facts and information as may be required by rules of the Superior Court.

"(e) A petition may be amended by leave of the Division on motion of the Corporation Counsel or counsel for the child, at any time prior to the conclusion of the factfinding hearing. The Division shall grant the Corporation Counsel, the child, and his parent, guardian, or custodian notice of the amendment and, where necessary, additional time to prepare.

"(f) The District of Columbia shall be a party to all proceedings under this subchapter.

"§ 16–2306. Service of summons and petition

"(a) When a petition is filed, the Division shall set a time for initial appearance and shall direct the issuance of summonses. If delinquency or need of supervision is alleged, a summons, together with a copy of the petition, shall be served upon the child and upon his spouse (if any) and his parent, guardian, or other custodian. If neglect is alleged, the summons, together with a copy of the petition, shall be served on the parent, guardian, or other custodian of the child named in the petition. Where appropriate to the proper disposition of the case, the Division may direct service of summonses upon other persons. A summons issued pursuant to this section shall advise the parties of the right to counsel as provided in section 16–2304.

"(b) Upon request of the Corporation Counsel, the Division may endorse upon the summons an order directing the parent, guardian, or other custodian of the child to appear personally at the hearing and directing the person having physical custody or control of the child to bring the child to the hearing.

"(c) If it appears, from information presented to the Division, that there are grounds to take the child into custody as provided in section 16–2309, or that the child may leave or be removed from the jurisdiction of the Superior Court or will not be brought to the hearing, notwithstanding service of the summons, the Division may endorse upon the summons an order that the officer serving the summons shall at once take the child into custody. If the child is taken into custody under this section, the provisions of sections 16–2309 to 16–2311 shall apply.

"§ 16–2307. Transfer for criminal prosecution

"(a) Within ten days of the filing of a delinquency petition, or later for good cause shown, and prior to a factfinding hearing on the petition, the Corporation Counsel, following consultation with the Director of Social Services, may file a motion, supported by a statement of facts, requesting transfer of the child for criminal prosecution, if—

"(1) the child was fifteen or more years of age at the time of the conduct charged, and is alleged to have committed an act which would constitute a felony if committed by an adult;

"(2) the child is sixteen or more years of age and is already under commitment to an agency or institution as a delinquent child; or

"(3) a minor eighteen years of age or older is alleged to have committed a delinquent act prior to having become eighteen years of age.

"(b) Following the filing of the motion by the Corporation Counsel, summonses shall be issued and served in conformity with the provisions of section 16–2306.

"(c) When there are grounds to believe the child is mentally retarded or mentally ill, the Division shall stay the proceedings for the purpose of obtaining an examination. After examination, the Division shall proceed to a determination under subsection (d) unless it determines that the child is incompetent to participate in the proceedings, in which event it shall order the child committed to a mental hospital pursuant to section 16–2315 or section 927 of the Act of March 3, 1901 (D.C. Code, sec. 24–301(a)).

"(d) The Division shall conduct a hearing on each transfer motion for the purpose of determining whether there are reasonable prospects of rehabilitating the child prior to his majority, unless a commitment pursuant to subsection (c) has intervened. Unless the Division finds that there are reasonable prospects for rehabilitating the child prior to his majority, it shall transfer the child for criminal prosecution and notify the United States attorney. Accompanying the order of transfer shall be a statement of the reasons, with respect to the five factors set forth in subsection (e) of this section, for transferring the child. This statement shall be available, upon request, to any court in which the transfer is challenged, but shall not be available to the trier of fact on the criminal charge prior to verdict.

"(e) Evidence of the following factors shall be considered in determining whether there are reasonable prospects for rehabilitating a child prior to his majority:

"(1) the child's age;

"(2) the nature of the present offense and the extent and nature of the child's prior delinquency record;

"(3) the child's mental condition;

"(4) the nature of past treatment efforts and the nature of the child's response to past treatment efforts; and

(5) the techniques, facilities, and personnel for rehabilitation available to the Division and to the court that would have jurisdiction after transfer.

The rules of evidence at transfer hearings shall be the same as those that govern disposition proceedings in delinquency cases, as set forth in section 16–2317. At a transfer hearing, only the propriety of eventual Division disposition shall be considered, and evidence bearing on probable cause or the likelihood that the child committed the act alleged shall not be admitted.

"(f) Prior to a transfer hearing, a study and report, in writing, relevant to the factors in subsection (e), shall be made by the Director of Social Services. This report and all social records that are to be made available to the judge at the transfer hearing shall be made available to counsel for the child and to the Corporation Counsel at least five days prior to the hearing.

"(g) A judge who conducts a hearing pursuant to this section shall not, over the objection of the child whose prospects for rehabilitation were at issue, participate in any subsequent factfinding proceedings relating to the offense.

"(h) Transfer of a child for criminal prosecution terminates the jurisdiction of the Division over the child with respect to any subsequent delinquent acts.

"§ 16–2308. Initial appearance

"At the time set forth in the summons, or at such later time as may be authorized by rule of the Superior Court, the child named in a delinquency or need of supervision petition or the parent, guardian, or custodian of a child named in a neglect petition shall appear before a judge assigned to the Division and shall be advised of the contents of the petition and of the right to counsel as provided in section 16–2304. At that time the child, or in neglect cases the parent, guardian, or custodian, may admit or deny the allegations in the petition, but it shall not be necessary at the initial appearance for the Corporation Counsel to establish probable cause to believe that the allegations in the petition are true. At the initial appearance, the judge may set the time for the factfinding hearing or continue the matter until a later time. This section shall not apply in any case where prior to or at the time of the initial appearance, a detention or shelter care hearing is required by section 16–2312.

"§ 16–2309. Taking into custody

"A child may be taken into custody—

"(1) pursuant to order of the Division under section 16–2306 or 16–2311;

"(2) by a law enforcement officer when he has reasonable grounds to believe that the child has committed a delinquent act;

"(3) by a law enforcement officer when he has reasonable grounds to believe that the child is suffering from illness or injury or is in immediate danger from his surroundings, and that his removal from his surroundings is necessary; or

"(4) by a law enforcement officer when he has reasonable grounds to believe that the child has run away from his parent, guardian, or other custodian.

§ 16–2310. Criteria for detaining children

"(a) A child shall not be placed in detention prior to a factfinding hearing or a dispositional hearing unless he is alleged to be delinquent or in need of supervision and unless it appears from available information that detention is required—

"(1) to protect the person or property of others or of the child, or

"(2) to secure the child's presence at the next court hearing.

"(b) A child shall not be placed in shelter care prior to a factfinding hearing of a dispositional hearing unless it appears from available information that shelter care is required—

"(1) to protect the person of the child, or

"(2) because the child has no parent, guardian, custodian, or other person or agency able to provide supervision and care for him, and the child appears unable to care for himself.

"(c) The criteria for detention and shelter care provided in this section, as implemented by rules of the Superior Court, shall govern the decisions of all persons responsible for determining whether detention or shelter care is warranted prior to the factfinding hearing.

"§ 16–2311. Release or delivery to Family Division

"(a) A person taking a child into custody shall with all reasonable speed—

"(1) release the child to his parent, guardian, or custodian upon a promise to bring the child before the Division when requested by the Division, unless the child's placement in detention or shelter care appears required as provided in section 16–2310; or

"(2) bring the child before the Director of Social Services, or to a medical facility if the child appears to require prompt treatment or to require prompt diagnosis for medical or evidentiary purposes.

Any person taking a child into custody shall give prompt notice to the Corporation Counsel and to the parent, guardian, or custodian (if known) together with the reasons for custody.

"(b) When a child is brought before the Director of Social Services, the Director shall in all cases review the need for detention or shelter care prior to the admission of the child to the place of detention or shelter care. The child shall be released to his parent, guardian, or custodian unless the Director of Social Services finds that detention or shelter care is required under section 16–2310.

"(c) If a parent, guardian, or custodian fails, when requested, to bring the child to the Division as provided in subsection (a)(1), the Division may issue a warrant directing that the child be taken into custody and brought before the Division.

"§ 16–2312. Detention or shelter care hearing; intermediate disposition

"(a) When a child is not released as provided in section 16–2311—

"(1) a detention or shelter care hearing shall be commenced not later than the next day (excluding Sundays) after the child has been taken into custody or transferred from another court as provided by section 16–2302; and

"(2) a petition shall be filed at or prior to the detention or shelter care hearing.

"(b) Prompt notice of the detention or shelter care hearing shall be given, if delinquency or need of supervision is alleged, to the child, or to his spouse (if any), parent, guardian, or custodian, if he can be found, or, if neglect is alleged, to the child, and to the parent, guardian, or custodian named in the petition if he can be found. Counsel for the child, and in neglect cases counsel for the parent, guardian, or custodian, shall be entitled to a copy of the petition prior to the hearing.

"(c) at the commencement of the hearing the judge shall advise the parties of the right to counsel, as provided in section 16–2304, and shall appoint counsel if required. He shall also inform them of the contents of the petition and shall afford the child, or in a neglect case, the parent, guardian, or custodian, an opportunity to admit or deny the allegations in the petition. He shall then hear from the Corporation Counsel to determine whether the child should be placed or continued in detention or shelter care under the criteria in section 16–2310. The child and his parent, guardian, or custodian shall have a right to be heard in their own behalf.

"(d) When a judge finds that a child's detention or shelter care is not required under the criteria in section 16–2310, he shall order the child's release, and may impose one or more of the following conditions:

"(1) Placement of the child in the custody of a parent, guardian, or custodian or under supervision of a person or organization agreeing to supervise him.

"(2) Placement of restrictions on the child's travel, activities, or place of abode during the period of release.

"(3) Any other condition reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the child at a factfinding hearing or his protection from harm, including a requirement that the child return to the physical custody of the parent, guardian, or custodian after specified hours.

"(e) When a judge finds that a child's detention or shelter care is required under the criteria of section 16–2310, he shall then hear evidence presented by the Corporation Counsel to determine whether there is probable cause to believe the allegations in the petition are true. The child, his parent, guardian or custodian may present evidence on the issues and be heard in their own behalf.

"(f) When a judge finds there is probable cause to believe the allegations in the petition are true, he shall order the child to be placed or continued in detention or shelter care and set forth his reasons. When a judge finds that there is no probable cause to believe the allegations in the petition are true, he shall order the child to be released.

"(g) For good cause shown, the Division may grant a continuance of the detention or shelter care hearing, or any part thereof, for a period not to exceed five days. During the period of the continuance, the Division may order the child to be placed or continued in detention or shelter care.

"(h) On motion by or on behalf of the child, a child in custody shall be released from custody if his detention or shelter care hearing is not commenced within the time set herein.

"(i) If a child is not released after his detention or shelter care hearing and the parent, guardian or custodian did not receive notice thereof, the Division may, in the interest of justice, conduct a new hearing in accordance with rules prescribed by the Superior Court.

"(j) Upon objection of the child or his parent, guardian or custodian, a judge who conducted a detention or shelter care hearing shall not conduct a factfinding hearing on the petition.

"§ 16–2313. Place of detention or shelter

"(a) A child who is alleged to be neglected and who is in custody may be placed at any time prior to disposition, only in—

"(1) a foster home;

"(2) a group home, youth shelter, or other appropriate home for nondelinquent children; or

"(3) another facility for shelter care designated by the division, including an appropriate facility operated by the District of Columbia.

No child alleged to be neglected may be placed in a facility described in paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section.

"(b) A child who is alleged to be in need of supervision or (except as provided in subsection (d) or (e)) is alleged to be delinquent and who is in custody may be detained at any time prior to disposition only in—

"(1) a foster home;

"(2) a group home, youth shelter, or other appropriate home for allegedly delinquent children; or

"(3) a detention home for allegedly delinquent children or children alleged to be in need of supervision, designated or operated by the District of Columbia.

Unless the Division shall by order so authorize, no child may be detained in a facility described in paragraph (3) if it would result in his commingling with children who have been adjudicated delinquent and committed by order of the Division.

"(c) A child in detention or shelter care may be temporarily transferred to a medical facility for physical care and may, on order of the Division pursuant to section 16–2315, be temporarily transferred to a facility for mental examination or treatment.

"(d) Except as provided in subsection (e), no child under eighteen years of age may be detained in a jail or other facility for the detention of adults, unless transferred as provided in section 16–2307. The appropriate official of a jail or other facility for the detention of adults shall inform the Superior Court immediately when a child under the age of eighteen years is received there (other than by transfer) and shall (1) deliver him to the Director of Social Services upon request, or (2) transfer him to a detention facility described in subsection (b)(3).

"(e) A child sixteen years of age or older who is alleged to be delinquent and who is in detention, whose conduct constitutes a menace to other children, and who cannot be controlled, may on order of the Division be transferred to a place of detention for adults, but shall be kept separate from adults.

"§ 16–2314. Consent decree

"(a) At any time after the filing of a delinquency or need of supervision petition and prior to adjudication at a factfinding hearing, the Division may, on motion of the Corporation Counsel or counsel for the child, suspend the proceedings and continue the child under supervision, without commitment, under terms and conditions established by rules of the Superior Court. Such a consent decree shall not be entered unless the child is represented by counsel and has been informed of the consequences of the decree nor shall it be entered over the objection of the child or of the Corporation Counsel.

"(b) A consent decree shall remain in force for six months unless the child is sooner discharged by the Director of Social Services. Upon application of the Director of Social Services or an agency supervising the child made prior to the expiration of the decree, a consent decree may, after notice and hearing, be extended for not more than six additional months by order of the Division.

"(c) If prior to the expiration of the decree or discharge by the Director of Social Services, the child fails to fulfill the express conditions of the decree or a new delinquency or need of supervision petition is filed concerning the child, the original petition under which the decree was filed may, in the discretion of the Corporation Counsel following consultation with the Director of Social Services, be reinstated. The child shall thereafter be held accountable on the original petition as if the consent decree had never been entered.

"(d) If a child completes the period of continuance under supervision in accordance with the consent decree or is sooner discharged by the Director of Social Services, the Division shall dismiss the original petition.

"§ 16–2315. Physical and mental examinations

"(a) At any time following the filing of a petition, on motion of the Corporation Counsel or counsel for the child, or on its own motion, the Division may order a child to be examined to aid in determining his physical or mental condition.

"(b) Wherever possible examinations shall be conducted on an outpatient basis, but the Division may, if it deems necessary, commit the child to a suitable medical facility or institution for the purpose of examination. Commitment for examination shall be for a period of not more than sixty days unless the Division, for good cause shown, shall extend the commitment for a further period not to exceed sixty days.

"(c)(1) If as a result of a mental examination the Division determines that a child alleged to be delinquent is incompetent to participate in proceedings under the petition by reason of mental illness or mental retardation, it shall, except as provided in subsection (2), suspend further proceedings and the Corporation Counsel shall initiate commitment proceedings pursuant to chapter 5 or 11 of title 21.

"(2) If a motion for transfer for criminal prosecution has been filed pursuant to section 16–2307 and the Division determines that a child alleged to be delinquent is incompetent to participate in the transfer proceedings by reason of mental illness, it shall suspend further proceedings and order the child confined to a suitable hospital or facility for the mentally ill until his competency is restored. If prior to the time the child reaches the age of 21 it appears that he will not regain his competency to participate in the proceedings, the Corporation Counsel shall initiate commitment proceedings pursuant to chapter 5 of title 21.

"(3) If, as a result of mental examination, the Division determines that a child alleged to be in need of supervision is incompetent to participate in proceedings under the petition by reason of mental illness or mental retardation, it shall suspend further proceedings. If proceedings are suspended, the Corporation Counsel may initiate commitment proceedings pursuant to chapter 5 or 11 of title 21.

"(d) The results of an examination under this section shall be admissible in a transfer hearing pursuant to section 16–2307, in a dispositional hearing under this subchapter, or in a commitment proceeding under chapter 5 or 11 of title 21. The results of examination may be admitted into evidence at a factfinding hearing to aid the Division in determining a material allegation of the petition relating to the child's mental or physical condition, but not for the purpose of establishing a defense of insanity.

"(e) Following an adjudication at a factfinding hearing that a child is neglected, the Division may order the mental or physical examination of the parent, guardian, or custodian of the child whose ability to care for the child is at issue. The results of the examination are admissible at a dispositional hearing on the petition alleging neglect.

"§ 16–2316. Conduct of hearings; evidence

"(a) The Division shall, without a jury, hear and adjudicate cases involving delinquency, need of supervision, or neglect. The Corporation Counsel shall present evidence in support of all petitions arising under this subchapter and otherwise represent the District of Columbia in all proceedings.

"(b) Evidence which is competent, material, and relevant shall be admissible at factfinding hearings. Evidence which is material and relevant shall be admissible at detention hearings, transfer hearings under section 16–2307, and dispositional hearings.

"(c) All hearings and proceedings under this subchapter shall be recorded by appropriate means. Except in hearings to declare a person in contempt of court, the general public shall be excluded from hearings arising under this subchapter. Only persons necessary to the proceedings shall be admitted, but the Division may, pursuant to rule of the Superior Court, admit such other persons (including members of the press) as have a proper interest in the case or the work of the court on condition that they refrain from divulging information identifying the child or members of his family involved in the proceedings.

"(d) If the Division finds that it is in the best interest of the child, it may temporarily exclude him from any proceeding except a factfinding hearing. If the petition alleges neglect, the child may also be temporarily excluded from a factfinding hearing. In any case, counsel for the child may not be excluded.

"§ 16–2317. Hearings, findings; dismissal

"(a) Except as otherwise provided by statute or court rule, all motions shall be heard at the time of the factfinding hearing.

"(b) After a factfinding hearing on the allegations in the petition, the Division shall make and file written findings in all cases as to the truth of the allegations, and in neglect cases, he shall also make and file written findings as to whether the child is neglected. If the Division finds that the allegations in the petition have not been established by the preponderance of the evidence it shall dismiss the petition and order the child released from any detention or shelter care.

"(c) If the Division finds on the basis of the preponderance of the evidence that a child alleged to be delinquent or in need of supervision committed the acts alleged in the petition, it may proceed immediately to hear evidence as to whether he is in need of care or rehabilitation or may postpone the proceedings to await a predisposition study and report. Material and relevant evidence shall be admissible to determine need for care or rehabilitation even though not competent at a factfinding hearing. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, a finding of the commission of an act which would constitute a criminal offense is sufficient to sustain a finding of need for care or rehabilitation.

"(d) If the Division finds that the child is not in need of care or rehabilitation it shall terminate the proceedings and discharge the child from detention, shelter care, or other restriction previously ordered. If it finds the child is in need of care or rehabilitation in a delinquency or need of supervision case, or that the child is neglected, the Division shall proceed immediately, or at a postponed hearing to make proper disposition of the case.

"(e) After a factfinding hearing if the proceedings are not terminated, the Division shall review the need for detention or shelter care of the child.

"§ 16–2318. Order of adjudication noncriminal

"A consent decree, order of adjudication, or order of disposition in a proceeding under this subchapter is not a conviction of crime and does not impose any civil disability ordinarily resulting from a conviction, nor does it operate to disqualify a child in any future civil service examination, appointment, or application for public service in either the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia.

"§ 16–2319. Predisposition study and report

"After a motion for transfer has been filed, or after the Division has made findings pursuant to subsection (b) of section 16–2317 sustaining the allegations of a petition and, in neglect cases, the conclusion that the child is neglected, the Division shall direct that a predisposition study and report to the Division be made by the Director of Social Services or a qualified agency designated by the Division concerning the child, his family, his environment, and other matters relevant to the need for treatment or disposition of the case. Except in connection with a hearing on a transfer motion, no predisposition study or report shall be furnished to or considered by the Division prior to completion of the factfinding hearing.

"§ 16–2320. Disposition of child who is neglected, delinquent, or in need of supervision

"(a) If a child is found to be neglected, the Division may order any of the following dispositions which will be in the best interest of the child:

"(1) Permit the child to remain with his parent, guardian, or other custodian, subject to such conditions and limitations as the Division may prescribe, including but not limited to medical, psychiatric, or other treatment at an appropriate facility on an outpatient basis.

"(2) Place the child under protective supervision.

"(3) Transfer legal custody to any of the following—

"(A) a public agency responsible for the care of neglected children;

"(B) a child placing agency or other private organization or facility which is licensed or otherwise authorized by law and is designated by the Commissioner of the District of Columbia to receive and provide care for the child; or

"(C) a relative or other individual who is found by the Division to be qualified to receive and care for the child.

"(4) Commitment of the child for medical, psychiatric, or other treatment at an appropriate facility on an in-patient basis if, at the dispositional hearing provided for in section 16–2317, the Division finds that confinement is necessary to the treatment of the child. A child for whom medical, psychiatric or other treatment is ordered may petition the Division for review of the order thirty days after treatment under the order has commenced, and, if, after a hearing for the purpose of such review, the original order is affirmed, the child may petition for review thereafter every six months.

"(5) Make such other disposition as may be provided by law and as the Division deems to be in the best interests of the child and the community.

"(b) Unless a child found neglected is also found to be delinquent, he shall not be committed to, or confined in, an institution for delinquent children.

"(c) If a child is found to be delinquent or in need of supervision, the Division may order any of the following dispositions for his supervision, care, and rehabilitation:

"(1) Any disposition authorized by subsection (a).

"(2) Transfer of legal custody to a public agency for the care of delinquent children.

"(3) Probation under such conditions and limitations as the Division may prescribe.

"(d) No child found in need of supervision, unless also found delinquent, shall be committed to or placed in an institution or facility for delinquent children, unless otherwise specified by the Division.

"(e) No delinquent child shall be committed to a penal or correctional institution for adult offenders, except that, on order of the Division, a child sixteen years of age or older who has been committed to another institution or other facility may be transferred after a hearing at which the child is present and represented by counsel and upon a finding by the Division that the child's conduct while in custody constitutes a menace to other children and cannot be controlled. The transfer shall be to a facility maintained by or available to the District of Columbia pursuant to the provisions of section 5025 of title 18, United States Code.

"§ 16–2321. Disposition of mentally ill or mentally retarded child.

"(a) If no previous examination has been made under section 16–2315 and the Division, after factfinding but before a dispositional hearing, has reason to believe that a child is mentally ill or mentally retarded, it may order an examination as provided in section 16–2315.

"(b) If as a result of the examination the child is found to be mentally ill or mentally retarded, the Division may, in lieu of other disposition, direct the appropriate authority to initiate commitment proceedings under chapter 5 or 11 of title 21. The Division may order the child detained in suitable facilities pending commitment proceedings.

"(c) If the examination does not indicate that commitment proceedings should be initiated or if the proceedings do not result in commitment, the Division shall proceed to disposition pursuant to this subchapter.

"§ 16–2322. Limitation of time on dispositional orders

"(a)(1) A dispositional order vesting legal custody of a child in a department, agency, or institution shall remain in force for an indeterminate period not exceeding two years. Unless the order specifies that release is permitted only by order of the Division, the department, agency, or institution may release the child at any time that it appears the purpose of the disposition order has been achieved.

"(2) An order vesting legal custody of a child in an individual other than his parent shall remain in force for two years unless sooner terminated by order of the Division.

"(3) An order of probation or a protective supervision order shall remain in force for a period not exceeding one year from the date entered, but the Director of Social Services or the agency providing supervision may terminate supervision at any time that it appears the purpose of the order has been achieved.

"(b) A dispositional order vesting legal custody of a child in a department, agency, or institution may be extended for additional periods of one year, upon motion of the department, agency, or institution to which the child was committed, if, after notice and hearing, the Division finds that—

"(1) in the case of a neglected child, the extension is necessary to safeguard his welfare; or

"(2) in the case of a child adjudicated delinquent or in need of supervision, the extension is necessary for his rehabilitation or the protection of the public interest.

"(c) Any other dispositional order may be extended for additional periods of one year, upon motion of the Director of Social Services, if, after notice and hearing, the Division finds that extension is necessary to protect the interest of the child.

"(d) A release or termination of an order prior to expiration of the order pursuant to subsection (a) (1) or (3), shall promptly be reported in writing to the Division.

"(e) Upon termination of a dispositional order a child shall be notified in writing of its termination. Upon termination of an of the Division under this subchapter in accordance with rules of the Superior Court, of his right to request the sealing of his records as provided in section 16–2334.

"(f) Unless sooner terminated, all orders of the Division under this subchapter in force with respect to a child terminate when he reaches twenty-one years of age.

"§ 16–2323. Modification, termination of orders

"(a) An order of the Division under this subchapter shall be set aside if—

"(1) it was obtained by fraud or mistake sufficient to set aside an order or judgment in a civil action;

"(2) the Division lacked jurisdiction; or

"(3) newly discovered evidence so requires.

"(b) A child who has been committed under this subchapter to the custody of an institution, agency, or person, or the parent or guardian of the child, may file a motion for modification or termination of the order of commitment on the ground that the child no longer is in need of commitment, if the child or his parent or guardian has applied to the institution or agency for release and the application was denied or not acted upon within a reasonable time.

"(c) The Director of Social Services shall conduct a preliminary review of motions filed under subsection (b) and shall prepare a report to the Division on the allegations contained therein. The Division may dismiss the motion if it concludes from the report that it is without substance. Otherwise, the Division, after notice, shall hear and determine the issues raised by the motion and deny the motion, or enter an appropriate order modifying or terminating the order of commitment, if it finds such action necessary to safeguard the welfare of the child or the interest of the public.

"(d) A motion may be filed under subsection (b) no more often than every six months.

"§ 16–2324. Support of committed child

"Whenever legal custody of a child is vested in any agency or individual other than the child's parent, after due notice to the parent or other persons legally obligated to care for and support the child and after hearing, the Division may, at the dispositional hearing or thereafter, order and decree that the parent or other legally obligated person shall pay, in such manner as the Division may direct, a reasonable sum that will cover in whole or in part the support and treatment of the child after the decree is entered. If the parent or other legally obligated person willfully fails or refuses to pay such sum, the Division may proceed against him for contempt, or the order may be filed and shall have the effect of a civil judgment.

"§ 16–2325. Court costs and expenses

"If, at the dispositional hearing or thereafter, the Division finds, after due notice and hearing, that the parent or other person legally obligated to care for and support a child subject to proceedings under this subchapter is financially able to pay, the Division may order him to pay all or part of the costs of—

"(1) physical and mental examinations and treatment of the child ordered by the Division; and

"(2) reasonable compensation for services and related expenses of counsel appointed by the court to represent the child, or, in neglect cases, himself.

Payment shall be made as prescribed by rules of the Superior Court.

"§ 16–2326. Probation revocation; disposition

"(a) If a child on probation incident to an adjudication of delinquency or need of supervision commits a probation violation he may be proceeded against in a probation revocation hearing.

"(b) A proceeding to revoke probation shall be commenced by the filing of a revocation petition by the Corporation Counsel. The petition shall be in such form as may be prescribed by rule of the Superior Court and shall be served together with a summons in the manner provided in section 16–2306.

"(c) Probation revocation proceedings shall be heard without a jury and shall require establishment of the facts alleged by a preponderance of the evidence. As nearly as may be appropriate, probation revocation proceedings shall conform to the procedures established by this subchapter for delinquency and need of supervision cases.

"(d) If a child is found to have violated the terms of his probation, the Division may modify the terms and conditions of the probation order, extend the period of probation, or enter any other order of disposition specified in section 16–2320 for a delinquent child.

"§ 16–2327. Interlocutory appeals

"(a) A child who has been ordered transferred for criminal prosecution under section 16–2307 or detained or placed in shelter care or subjected to conditions of release under section 16–2312, may, within three days of the date of entry of the Division's order, file a notice of interlocutory appeal.

"(b) Such appeals shall be given precedence over other cases and shall be expedited.

"(c) In cases involving transfer for criminal prosecution, the pendency of an interlocutory appeal shall act to stay criminal proceedings. Until the time for filing an interlocutory appeal has lapsed, or if an appeal is filed until its completion, no child who has been ordered transferred for criminal prosecution shall be removed to a place of adult detention, except as provided in section 16–2313, or otherwise treated as an adult.

"(d) The decision of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals shall be final.

"§ 16–2328. Finality of judgments; appeals; transcripts

"(a) Except as otherwise expressly provided by law, in all hearings and cases tried before the Division pursuant to this subchapter, the judgment of the Division is final.

"(b) In all appeals from decisions of the Division with respect to a child alleged to be neglected, delinquent, or in need of supervision, the child shall be identified only by initials in all transcripts, briefs, and other papers filed, and all necessary steps, as prescribed by rule of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, shall be taken to protect the identity of the child.

"(c) Upon the filing of a motion and supporting affidavit stating that he is financially unable to purchase a transcript, a party who has filed notice of appeal or of interlocutory appeal shall be furnished, at no cost or at such part of cost as he is able to pay, so much of the transcript as is necessary adequately to prepare and support the appeal.

"(d) An appeal does not operate to stay the order, judgment, or decree appealed from, but on application and hearing whenever the case is properly before the appellate court, that court may order otherwise if suitable provision is made for the care and custody of the child.

"§ 16–2329. Time computation

"(a) In all proceedings in the Division, time limitations shall be reasonably construed by the Division for the protection of the community and of the child.

"(b) The following periods shall be excluded in computing the time limits established for proceedings under this subchapter:

"(1) The period of delay resulting from a continuance granted, upon grounds constituting unusual circumstances, at the request or with the consent, in any case, of the child or his counsel, or, in neglect cases, also of the parent, guardian, or custodian.

"(2) The period of delay resulting from other proceedings concerning the child, including but not limited to an examination or hearing on mental health or retardation and a hearing on a transfer motion.

"(3) The period of delay resulting from a continuance granted at the request of the Corporation Counsel if the continuance is granted because of the unavailability of evidence material to the case, when the Corporation Counsel has exercised due diligence to obtain such evidence and there are reasonable grounds to believe that such evidence will be available at the later date; or if the continuance is granted to allow the Corporation Counsel additional time to prepare his case and additional time is required due to the exceptional circumstances of the case.

"(4) The period of delay resulting from the imposition of a consent decree.

"(5) The period of delay resulting from the absence of unavailability of the child.

"(6) A reasonable period of delay when the child is joined for a hearing with another child as to whom the time for a hearing has not run and there is good cause for not hearing the cases separately.

"§ 16–2330. Juvenile case records: confidentiality; inspection and disclosure

"(a) As used in this section, the term 'juvenile case records' refers to the following records of a case over which the Division has jurisdiction under section 11–1101(13):

"(1) Notices filed with the court by an arresting officer pursuant to this subchapter.

"(2) The docket of the court and entries therein.

"(3) Complaints, petitions, and other legal papers filed in the case.

"(4) Transcripts of proceedings before the court.

"(5) Findings, verdicts, judgments, orders, and decrees.

"(b) Juvenile case records shall be kept confidential and shall not be open to inspection; but, subject to the limitations of subsection (c), the inspection of those records shall be permitted to—

"(1) judges and professional staff of the Superior Court;

"(2) the Corporation Counsel and his assistants assigned to the Division;

"(3) the respondent, his parents or guardians, and their duly authorized attorneys;

"(4) any court or its probation staff, for purposes of sentencing the respondent as a defendant in a criminal case and the counsel for the defendant in that case;

"(5) public or private agencies or institutions providing supervision or treatment or having custody of the child, if supervision, treatment, or custody is under order of the Division;

"(6) the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, his assistants, and any other prosecuting attorneys involved in the investigation or trial of a criminal case arising out of the same transaction or occurrence as a case in which a child is alleged to be delinquent; and

"(7) other persons having a professional interest in the protection, welfare, treatment, and rehabilitation of the respondent or of a member of his family, or in the work of the Superior Court, if authorized by rule or special order of the court.

Records inspected may not be divulged to unauthorized persons; but the prosecuting attorney inspecting records pursuant to paragraph (6) of this subsection may divulge the contents to the extent required in the prosecution of a criminal case, and the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia and his assistants may inspect a transcript of the testimony of any witness and divulge the contents to the extent required by the prosecution of the witness for perjury, without, wherever possible, naming or otherwise revealing the identity of a child under the jurisdiction of the Division.

"(c) Notwithstanding subsection (b), the Superior Court may by rule or special order provide that particular items or classes of items in juvenile case records shall not be open to inspection except pursuant to rule or special order; but, in dispositional proceedings after an adjudication, no item considered by the judge (other than identification of the sources of confidential information) shall be withheld from inspection (1) in delinquency or need of supervision cases, by the attorney for the child, or (2) in neglect cases, by the attorney for the child and an attorney for the parent, guardian, or other custodian of the child.

"(d) The Superior Court may by rule or special order provide procedures for the inspection or copying of juvenile case records by persons entitled to inspect them. No person receiving any record or information pursuant to this section may publish or use it for any purpose other than that for which it was received without a special order of the court.

"(e) No person shall disclose, inspect, or use records in violation of this section.

"§ 16–2331. Juvenile social records; confidentiality; inspection and disclosure

"(a) As used in this section, the term 'juvenile social records' refers to all social records made with respect to a child in any proceedings over which the Division has jurisdiction under section 11–1101(13), including preliminary inquiries, predisposition studies, and examination reports.

"(b) Juvenile social records shall be kept confidential and shall not be open to inspection; but, subject to the limitations of subsection (c), the inspection of those records shall be permitted to—

"(1) judges and professional staff of the Superior Court and the Corporation Counsel and his assistants assigned to the Division;

"(2) the attorney for the child at any stage of a proceeding in the Division, including intake;

"(3) any court or its probation staff, for purposes of sentencing the child as a defendant in a criminal case, and, if and to the extent other presentence materials are disclosed to him, the counsel for the defendant in that case;

"(4) public or private agencies or institutions providing supervision or treatment, or having custody of the child, if the supervision, treatment, or custody is under order of the Division; and

"(5) other persons having a professional interest in the protection, welfare, treatment, and rehabilitation of the respondent or of a member of his family, or in the work of the Division, if authorized by rule or special order of the court.

Records inspected may not be divulged to unauthorized persons.

"(c) Notwithstanding subsection (b), the Superior Court may by rule or special order provide that particular items or classes of items in juvenile social records shall not be open to inspection except pursuant to rule or special order; but, in dispositional proceedings after an adjudication, no item considered by the judge (other than identification of the sources of confidential information) shall be withheld from inspection (1) in delinquency or need of supervision cases, by the attorney for the child, or (2) in neglect cases, by the attorney for the child and an attorney for the parent, guardian, or other custodian of the child.

"(d) The Superior Court may by rule or special order provide procedures for the inspection or copying of juvenile social records by persons entitled to inspect them. No person receiving any record or information pursuant to this section may publish or use it for any purpose other than that for which it was received without a special order of the court.

"(e) No person shall disclose, inspect, or use records in violation of this section.

"§ 16–2332. Police and other law enforcement records

"(a) Law enforcement records and files concerning a child shall not be open to public inspection or shall their contents or existence be disclosed to the public unless a charge of delinquency is transferred for criminal prosecution under section 16–2307, the interest of national security requires, or the court otherwise orders in the interest of the child.

"(b) Inspection of records and files is permitted by—

"(1) the Superior Court, having the child currently before it in any proceeding;

"(2) the officers of public and private institutions or agencies to which the child is currently committed, and those professional persons or agencies responsible for his supervision after release;

"(3) any other person, agency, or institution, by order of the court, having a professional interest in the child or in the work of the law enforcement department;

"(4) law enforcement officers of the United States, the District of Columbia, and other jurisdictions when necessary for the discharge of their current official duties;

"(5) a court in which a person is charged with a criminal offense for the purposes of determining conditions of release or bail;

"(6) a court in which a person is convicted of a criminal offense for the purpose of a presentence report or other dispositional proceeding, or by officials of penal institutions and other penal facilities to which he is committed, or by a parole board in considering his parole or discharge or in exercising supervision over him; and

"(7) the parent, guardian, or other custodian and counsel for the child.

"(c) Photographs may be displayed to potential witnesses for identification purposes, in accordance with the standards of fairness applicable to adults.

"(d) No person shall disclose, inspect, or use records or files in violation of this section.

"§ 16–2333. Fingerprint records

"(a) The contents or existence of law enforcement records and files of the fingerprints of a child shall not be disclosed by the custodians thereof, except—

"(1) to a law enforcement officer of the United States, the District of Columbia, or other jurisdiction for purposes of the investigation and trial of a criminal offense; or

"(2) pursuant to rule or special order of the court.

"(b) When a child is transferred for criminal prosecution under section 16–2307, law enforcement records and files of his fingerprints relating to any matter so transferred shall be deemed those of an adult.

"(c) No person shall disclose, inspect, or use records in violation of this section.

"§ 16–2334. Sealing of records

"(a) On request of a person who has been the subject of a petition filed pursuant to section 16–2305, or on the Division's own motion, the Division shall vacate its order and findings and shall order the sealing of the case and social records referred to in sections 16–2330 and 16–2331 and the law enforcement records and files referred to in section 16–2332, or those of any other agency active in the case if it finds that—

"(1) (A) a neglected child has reached his majority; or

"(B) two years have elapsed since the final discharge of the person from legal custody or supervision, or since the entry of any other Division order not involving custody or supervision; and

"(2) he has not been subsequently convicted of a crime, or adjudicated delinquent or in need of supervision prior to the filing of the motion, and no proceeding is pending seeking such conviction or adjudication. "(b) Reasonable notice of a motion shall be given to—

"(1) the person who is the subject of the petition;

"(2) the Corporation Counsel;

"(3) the authority granting the discharge, if the final discharge was from an institution parole, or probation; and

"(4) the law enforcement department having custody of the files and records specified in section 16–2332.

"(c) Upon the entry of the order, the proceedings in the case shall be treated as if they never occurred. All facts relating to the action including arrest, the filing of a petition, and the adjudication, filing, and disposition of the Division shall no longer exist as a matter of law. The Division, the law enforcement department, or any other department or agency that received notice under subsection (b) and was named in the order shall reply, and the person who is the subject matter of the records may reply, to any inquiry that no record exists with respect to such person.

"(d) Inspection of the files and records included in the order may thereafter be permitted by the Division only upon application by the person who is the subject of such records, and only to those persons named in the application; but the Division in its discretion may, by special order in an individual case, permit inspection by or release of information in the records to person having a professional interest in the protection, welfare, treatment, and rehabilitation of the person who is the subject of the petition or other members of his family.

"(e) Any adjudication of delinquency or need of supervision or conviction of a felony subsequent to sealing shall have the effect of nullifying the vacating and sealing order.

"(f) A person who has been the subject of a petition filed under this subchapter shall be notified of his rights under subsection (a) at the time a dispositional order is entered and again at the time of his final discharge from supervision, treatment, or custody.

"(g) No person shall disclose, receive, or use records in violation of this section.

"§ 16–2335. Unlawful disclosure of records; penalties

"Whoever wilfully discloses, receives, makes use of, or knowingly permits the use of information concerning a child or other person in violation of sections 16–2330 through 16–2334, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $250 or imprisoned not more than ninety days, or both. Violations of this section shall be prosecuted by the Corporation Counsel in the name of the District of Columbia.

"§ 16–2336. Additional powers of the Director of Social Services

"In addition to the powers and duties prescribed in section 11–1722, the Director of Social Services shall have power to take into custody and place in detention or shelter care, in accordance with this subchapter, children who are under his supervision as delinquent, in need of supervision, or neglected, or children who have run away from agencies or institutions to which they were committed under this subchapter.

"§ 16–2337. Emergency medical treatment

"Nothing in this subchapter shall prevent a public agency having custody of a child who is under the jurisdiction of the Division from providing the child with emergency medical treatment.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—PATERNITY PROCEEDINGS

"§ 16–2341. Representation

"(a) Where a public support burden has been incurred or is threatened, the Corporation Counsel, or any of his assistants, shall bring a civil action on behalf of any wife or child in the Family Division to enforce support of such wife or child, the Division having jurisdiction under paragraph (3), (4), (10), or (11) of section 11–1101.

"(b) In all cases over which the Division has jurisdiction under paragraphs (3), (4), (10) and (11) of section 11–1101, where the court deems it necessary and proper, an attorney shall be appointed by the court to represent the respondent.

"(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to interfere with the right of an individual to file a civil action over which the Division has jurisdiction under the paragraphs of section 11–1101 referred to in subsection (b).

"§ 16–2342. Time of bringing complaint

"Proceedings over which the Division has jurisdiction under paragraphs (3) and (11) of section 11–1101 to establish paternity and provide for the support of a child born out of wedlock may be instituted after four months of pregnancy or within two years after the birth of the child, or within one year after the putative father has ceased making contributions for the support of the child. The time during which the respondent is absent from the jurisdiction shall be excluded from the computation of the time within which a complaint may be filed.

"§ 16–2343. Blood tests

"When it is relevant to an action over which the Division has jurisdiction under section 11–1101, the court may direct that the mother, child, and the respondent submit to one or more blood tests to determine whether or not the respondent can be excluded as being the father of the child, but the results of the test may be admitted as evidence only in cases where the respondent does not object to its admissibility. Where the parties cannot afford the cost of a blood test, the court may direct the Department of Public Health to perform such tests without fee.

"§ 16–2344. Exclusion of public

"Upon trial or proceedings over which the Division has jurisdiction under paragraph (3), (4), (10), or (11) of section 11–1101, the court may exclude the general public and, at the request of either party, shall exclude the general public.

"§ 16–2345. New birth record upon marriage of natural parents

"When a certified copy of a marriage certificate is submitted to the Director of Public Health, establishing that the previously unwed parents of a child born out of wedlock have intermarried subsequent to the birth of the child, and the paternity of the child has been judicially determined or acknowledged by the husband before the Commissioner of the District of Columbia or his designated agent, or has been acknowledged in an affidavit sworn to by the husband before a judge or the clerk of a court of record, or before an officer of the armed forces of the United States authorized to administer oaths, and the affidavit is delivered to the Commissioner or his designated agent, a new certificate of birth bearing the original date of birth and the names of both parents shall be issued and substituted for the certificate of birth then on file. The original certificate of birth and all papers pertaining to the issuance of the new certificate shall be placed under seal and opened for inspection only upon order of the Family Division.

"§ 16–2346. Reports to Director of Public Health

"(a) Upon entry of a final judgment determining the paternity of a child born out of wedlock, the clerk of the court shall forward a certificate to the Director of Public Health of the District of Columbia, or his authorized representative in the jurisdiction in which the child was born, giving the name of the person adjudged to be the father of the child.

"(b) Upon receipt of the certificate provided for by subsection (a) of this section, the Director of Public Health or his authorized representative shall file it with the original birth record, and thereafter may issue a certificate of birth registration including thereon the name of the person adjudged to be the father of the child.

"§ 16–2347. Death of respondent; liability of estate

"If the respondent dies after paternity has been established and prior to the time the child reaches the age of 18 years, any sums due and unpaid under an order of the court at the time of his death shall constitute a valid claim against his estate.

"§ 16–2348. Paternity records; confidentiality; inspection and disclosure

"(a) Except on order of the Family Division, no records in a case over which the Division has jurisdiction under section 11–1101(11) shall be open to inspection by anyone other than the plaintiff, respondent, their attorneys of record, or authorized professional staff of the Superior Court. The Family Division, upon proper showing, may authorize the furnishing of certified copies of the records or portions thereof to the respondent, the mother, or custodian of the child, a party in interest, or their duly authorized attorneys. Certified copies of the records or portions thereof may be furnished, upon request, to the Corporation Counsel for use as evidence in nonsupport proceedings and to the Director of Public Health as provided by section 16–2346(a).

"(b) No person shall disclose, receive, or use records in violation of this section. Whoever willfully discloses, receives, makes use of, or knowingly permits the use of information in violation of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $250 or imprisoned not more than ninety days, or both. Violations of this section shall be prosecuted by the Corporation Counsel in the name of the District of Columbia."

(b) The item relating to chaper 23 in the analysis of title 16 of the District of Columbia Code is amended by striking out "Juvenile Court" and inserting in lieu thereof "Family Division".

PART C—INTRAFAMILY OFFENSES; JURISDICTION AND PROCESS OUTSIDE THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA; COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES

INTRAFAMILY OFFENSES

SEC. 131. (a) Title 16 of the District of Columbia Code is amended by inserting after chapter 9 the following new chapter:

"Chapter 10.—PROCEEDINGS REGARDING INTRAFAMILY OFFENSES

"Sec.
"16–1001. Intrafamily offense.
"16–1002. Complaint of criminal conduct; referrals to Family Division.
"16–1003. Petition for civil protection.
"16–1004. Petition; notice; temporary order.
"16–1005. Hearing; evidence; protection order.
"16–1006. Dismissal of petition; notice.

"§ 16–1001. Intrafamily offense

"(a) An intrafamily offense is an act, punishable as a criminal offense, committed—

"(1) by one spouse against the other;

"(2) by a parent, guardian, or other legal custodian against a child; or

"(3) by one person against another person with whom he shares a mutual residence and is in a close relationship rendering the application of this chapter appropriate.

"(b) For purposes of this chapter the terms 'complainant' or 'family member' include any individual in the relationship described in subsection (a).

"§ 16–1002. Complaint of criminal conduct; referrals to Family Division

"(a) If, upon the complaint of any person of criminal conduct by another or the arrest of a person charged with criminal conduct, it appears to the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia (hereafter in this chapter referred to as the 'United States attorney') that the conduct involves an intrafamily offense, he shall notify the Director of Social Services. The Director of Social Services may investigate the matter and make such recommendations to the United States attorney as the Director deems appropriate.

"(b) The United States attorney may also (1) file a criminal charge based upon the conduct and may consult with the Director of Social Services concerning appropriate recommendations for conditions of release taking into account the intrafamily nature of the offense; or (2) refer the matter to the Corporation Counsel for the filing of a petition for civil protection in the Family Division of the Superior Court (hereafter in this chapter referred to as the 'Family Division'). Prior to any such referral, the United States attorney shall consult with the Director of Social Services concerning the appropriateness of the referral. A referral to the Corporation Counsel by the United States attorney shall not preclude the United States attorney from subsequently filing a criminal charge based upon the conduct, if he deems it appropriate, but no criminal charge may be filed after the Family Division begins receiving evidence pursuant to section 16–1005.

"§ 16–1003. Petition for civil protection

"(a) Upon referral by the United States attorney, or upon application of any person or agency for a civil protection order with respect to an intrafamily offense committed or threatened, the Corporation Counsel may file a petition for a civil protection in the Family Division.

"(b) In any matter referred to the Corporation Counsel by the United States attorney in which the Corporation Counsel does not file a petition, he shall so notify the United States attorney.

"§ 16–1004. Petition; notice; temporary order

"(a) Upon a filing of a petition for civil protection by the Corporation Counsel, the Family Division shall set the matter for hearing, consolidating it, where appropriate, with other matters before the Family Division involving members of the same family.

"(b) The Family Division shall cause notice of the hearing to be served on the respondent, the complainant and, if appropriate, the family member endangered (or, if a child, the person then having physical custody of the child), the Director of Social Services, and the Corporation Counsel. The respondent shall be served with a copy of the petition together with the notice and shall be directed to appear at the hearing. The Family Division may also cause notice to be served on other members of the family whose presence at the hearing is necessary to the proper disposition of the matter.

"(c) If, upon the filing of the petition, the Division finds that the safety or welfare of a family member is immediately endangered by the respondent, it may, ex parte, issue a temporary protection order of not more than ten days duration and direct that the order be served along with the notice required by this section.

"§ 16–1005. Hearing; evidence; protection order

"(a) Members of the family receiving notice shall appear at the hearing. In addition to the parties, the Corporation Counsel and the Director of Social Services may present evidence at the hearing.

"(b) Notwithstanding section 14–306, in a hearing under this section, one spouse shall be a competent and compellable witness against the other and may testify as to confidential communications, but testimony compelled over a claim of a privilege conferred by such section shall be inadmissible in evidence in a criminal trial over the objection of a spouse entitled to claim that privilege.

"(c) If, after hearing, the Family Division finds that there is good cause to believe the respondent has committed or is threatening an intrafamily offense, it may issue a protection order—

"(1) directing the respondent to refrain from the conduct committed or threatened and to keep the peace toward the family member;

"(2) requiring the respondent, alone or in conjunction with any other member of the family before the court, to participate in psychiatric or medical treatment or appropriate counseling programs;

"(3) directing, where appropriate, that the respondent avoid the presence of the family member endangered;

"(4) directing the respondent to perform or refrain from other actions as may be appropriate to the effective resolution of the matter; or

"(5) combining two or more of the directions or requirements prescribed by the preceding paragraphs.

"(d) A protection order issued pursuant to this section shall be effective for such period up to one year as the Family Division may specify, but the Family Division may, upon motion of any party to the original proceeding, extend, rescind, or modify the order for good cause shown.

"(e) Any final order issued pursuant to this section and any order granting or denying extension, modification, or rescission of such order shall be appealable.

"(f) Violation of any temporary or permanent order issued under this chapter and failure to appear as provided in subsection (a) shall be punishable as contempt.

"§-16–1006. Dismissal of petition; notice

"(a) The Family Division may dismiss a petition if the matter is not appropriate for disposition in the Family Division.

"(b) If a petition dismissed under subsection (a) was originated by referral from the United States attorney, and the dismissal, was prior to the receipt of evidence pursuant to section 16–1005, the Family Division shall notify the United States attorney of the dismissal."

(b) The analysis of title 16 is amended by adding after the item relating to chapter 9 the following:

"10. Proceedings Regarding Intrafamily Offenses ..... 10–1001".

JURISDICTION AND PROCESS OUTSIDE THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SEC. 132. (a) Title 13 of the District of Columbia Code is amended by inserting after chapter 3 the following new chapter:

"Chapter 4.—CIVIL JURISDICTION AND SERVICE OUTSIDE THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"SUBCHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"Sec.
"13–401. Relation to other provisions of law.
"13–402. Uniformity of interpretation.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—BASES OF PERSONAL JURISDICTION OVER PERSONS OUTSIDE THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"13–421. Definition of person.
"13–422. Personal jurisdiction based upon enduring relationship.
"13–423. Personal jurisdiction based upon conduct.
"13–424. Service outside the District of Columbia.
"13–425. Inconvenient forum.

"SUBCHAPTER III.—SERVICE OUTSIDE THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"Sec.
"13–431. Manner and proof of service.
"13–432. Individuals eligible to make service.
"13–433. Individuals to be served; special cases.
"13–434. Assistance to tribunals and litigants outside the District of Columbia.

"SUBCHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"§ 13–401. Relation to other provisions of law

"Except in cases of irreconcilable conflict, this chapter shall be construed to augment, and not to repeal, any other law of the District of Columbia authorizing another basis of jurisdiction or permitting another procedure for service in civil proceedings in the District of Columbia courts.

"§13–402. Uniformity of interpretation

"When the statutory language so permits, this chapter shall be so interpreted and construed as to make uniform the laws of those jurisdictions which enact in comparable form the first two articles of the Uniform Interstate and International Procedure Act.

"§ 13–421. Definition of person

"As used in this subchapter, the term 'person' includes an individual, his executor, administrator, or other personal representative, or a corporation, partnership, association, or any other legal or commercial entity, whether or not a citizen or domiciliary of the District of Columbia and whether or not organized under the laws of the District of Columbia.

"§ 13–422. Personal jurisdiction based upon enduring relationship

"A District of Columbia court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a person domiciled in, organized under the laws of, or maintaining his or its principal place of business in, the District of Columbia as to any claim for relief.

"§ 13–423. Personal jurisdiction based upon conduct

"(a) A District of Columbia court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a person, who acts directly or by an agent, as to a claim for relief arising from the person's—

"(1) transacting any business in the District of Columbia;

"(2) contracting to supply services in the District of Columbia;

"(3) causing tortious injury in the District of Columbia by an act or omission in the District of Columbia;

"(4) causing tortious injury in the District of Columbia by an act or omission outside the District of Columbia if he regularly does or solicits business, engages in any other persistent course of conduct, or derives substantial revenue from services used or consumed, or services rendered, in the District of Columbia;

"(5) having an interest in, using, or possessing real property in the District of Columbia; or

"(6) contracting to insure or act as surety for or on any person, property, or risk, contract, obligation, or agreement located, executed, or to be performed within the District of Columbia at the time of contracting, unless the parties otherwise provide in writing.

"(b) When jurisdiction over a person is based solely upon this section, only a claim for relief arising from acts enumerated in this section may be asserted against him.

"§ 13–424. Service outside the District of Columbia

"When the exercise of personal jurisdiction is authorized by this subchapter, service may be made outside the District of Columbia.

"§ 13–425. Inconvenient forum

"When any District of Columbia court finds that in the interest of substantial justice the action should be heard in another forum, the court may stay or dismiss such civil action in whole or in part on any conditions that may be just.

"SUBCHAPTER III.—SERVICE OUTSIDE THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"§ 13–431. Manner and proof of service

"(a) When the law of the District of Columbia authorizes service outside the District of Columbia, the service, when reasonably calculated to give actual notice, may be made—

"(1) by personal delivery in the manner prescribed for service within the District of Columbia;

"(2) in the manner prescribed by the law of the place in which the service is made for service in that place in an action in any of its courts of general jurisdiction;

"(3) by any form of mail addressed to the person to be served and requiring a signed receipt; or

"(4) as directed by the foreign authority in response to a letter rogatory.

"(b) Proof of service outside the District of Columbia may be made by affidavit of the individual who made the service or in the manner prescribed by the law of the District of Columbia, the order pursuant to which the service is made, or the law of the place in which the service is made for proof of service in an action in any of its courts of general jurisdiction. When service is made by mail, proof of service shall include a receipt signed by the addressee or other evidence of personal delivery to the addressee satisfactory to the court.

"§ 13–432. Individuals eligible to make service

"Service outside the District of Columbia may be made by an individual who is permitted to make service of process under the law of the District of Columbia or under the law of the place in which the service is made or who is designated by a District of Columbia court.

"§ 13–433. Individuals to be served; special cases

"When the law of the District of Columbia requires that in order to effect service one or more designated individuals be served, service outside the District of Columbia under this article must be made upon such designated individual or individuals.

"§ 13–434. Assistance to tribunals and litigants outside the District of Columbia

"(a) A District of Columbia court may order service upon any person who is domiciled or can be found within the District of Columbia of any document issued in connection with a proceeding in a tribunal outside the District of Columbia. The order may be made upon application of any interested person or in response to a letter rogatory issued by a tribunal outside the District of Columbia and shall direct the manner of service.

"(b) Service in connection with a proceeding in a tribunal outside the District of Columbia may be made within the District of Columbia without an order of court.

"(c) Service under this section does not, of itself, require the recognition or enforcement of an order, judgment, or decree rendered outside the District of Columbia."

(b) The analysis of title 13 is amended by inserting after the item relating to chapter 3 the following new item:

"4. Civil Jurisdiction and Service Outside the District of Columbia ---------- 13–401".

COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES

SEC. 133. (a) Section 14–305 of the District of Columbia Code is amended to read as follows:

"§ 14–305. Competency of witnesses; impeachment by evidence of conviction of crime

"(a) No person is incompetent to testify, in either civil or criminal proceedings, by reason of his having been convicted of a criminal offense.

"(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), for the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness, evidence that the witness has been convicted of a criminal offense shall be admitted if offered, either upon the cross-examination of the witness or by evidence aliunde, but only if the criminal offense (A) was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which he was convicted, or (B) involved dishonesty or false statement (regardless of punishment). A party establishing conviction by means of cross-examination shall not be bound by the witness' answers as to matters relating to the conviction.

"(2)(A) Evidence of a conviction of a witness is inadmissible under this section if—

"(i) the conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, or other equivalent procedure granted or issued on the basis of innocence, or

"(ii) the conviction has been the subject of a certificate of rehabilitation or its equivalent and such witness has not been convicted for a subsequent criminal offense.

"(B) In addition, no evidence of any conviction of a witness is admissible under this section if a period of more than ten years has elapsed since the later of (i) the date of the release of the witness from confinement imposed for his most recent conviction of any criminal offense, or (ii) the expiration of the period of his parole, probation, or sentence granted or imposed with respect to his most recent conviction of any criminal offense.

"(c) For the purposes of this section, to prove conviction of crime it is not necessary to produce the whole record of the proceedings containing the conviction, but the certificate, under seal, of the clerk of the court wherein the proceedings were had, stating the fact of the conviction and for what cause, shall be sufficient.

"(d) The pendency of an appeal from a conviction does not render evidence of that conviction inadmissible under this section. Evidence of the pendency of such an appeal is admissible."

(b) The item relating to section 14–305 in the analysis of chapter 3 is amended to read as follows:

"14–305. Competency of witnesses; impeachment by evidence of conviction of crime."

"16–3546. Usurping corporate franchise; judgment.

"16–3547. Proceedings against corporate directors and trustees; judgment and order; enforcement.

"16–3548. Recovery of damages from usurper; limitation.

"SUBCHAPTER I.—ACTIONS AGAINST OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES

"§ 16–3501. Persons against whom issued; civil action

"A quo warranto may be issued from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in the name of the United States against a person who within the District of Columbia usurps, intrudes into, or unlawfully holds or exercises a franchise conferred by the United States or a public office of the United States, civil or military. The proceedings shall be deemed a civil action.

"§ 16–3502. Parties who may institute; ex rel. proceedings

"The Attorney General of the United States or the United States attorney may institute a proceeding pursuant to this subchapter on his own motion or on the relation of a third person. The writ may not be issued on the relation of a third person except by leave of the court, to be applied for by the relator, by a petition duly verified setting forth the grounds of the application, or until the relator files a bond with sufficient surety, to be approved by the clerk of the court, in such penalty as the court prescribes, conditioned on the payment by him of all costs incurred in the prosecution of the writ if costs are not recovered from and paid by the defendant.

"§ 16–3503. Refusal of Attorney General or United States attorney to act; procedure

"If the Attorney General or United States attorney refuses to institute a quo warranto proceeding on the request of a person interested, the interested person may apply to the court by certified petition for leave to have the writ issued. When, in the opinion of the court, the reasons set forth in the petition are sufficient in law, the writ shall be allowed to be issued by any attorney, in the name of the United States, on the relation of the interested person on his compliance with the condition prescribed by section 16–3502 as to security for costs.

"SUBCHAPTER II.—ACTIONS AGAINST OFFICERS OR CORPORATIONS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"§ 16–3521. Persons against whom issued; civil action

"A quo warranto may be issued from the Superior Court of the District of Columbia in the name of the District of Columbia against—

"(1) a person who within the District of Columbia usurps, intrudes into, or unlawfully holds or exercises, a franchise conferred by the District of Columbia, a public office of the District of Columbia, civil or military, or an office in a domestic corporation; or

"(2) one or more persons who act as a corporation within the District of Columbia without being duly authorized, or exercise within the District of Columbia corporate rights, privileges, or franchises not granted them by law in force in the District of Columbia.

The proceedings shall be deemed a civil action.

"§ 16–3522. Parties who may institute; ex rel. proceedings

"The United States attorney or the Corporation Counsel may institute a proceeding pursuant to this subchapter on his own motion, or on the relation of a third person. The writ may not be issued on the relation of a third person except by leave of the court, to be applied for by the relator, by a petition duly verified, setting forth the grounds of the application, or until the relator files a bond with sufficient surety, to be approved by the clerk of the court, in such penalty as the court prescribes, conditioned on the payment by him of all costs incurred in prosecution of the writ if costs are not recovered from and paid by the defendant.

"§ 16–3523. Refusal of United States attorney or Corporation Counsel to act; procedures

"If the United States attorney or Corporation Counsel refuses to institute a quo warranto proceeding on the request of a person interested, the interested person may apply to the court by certified petition for leave to have the writ issued. When, in the opinion of the court, the reasons set forth in the petition are sufficient in law, the writ shall be allowed to be issued by any attorney, in the name of the District of Columbia, on the relation of the interested person, on his compliance with the conditions prescribed by section 16–3522 as to security for costs.

"SUBCHAPTER III.—PROCEDURES AND JUDGMENTS

"§ 16–3541. Allegations in petition of relator claiming office

"When a quo warranto proceeding is against a person for usurping an office, on the relation of a person claiming the same office, the relator shall set forth in his petition the facts upon which he claims to be entitled to the office.

"§ 16–3542. Notice to defendant

"On the issuing of a writ of quo warranto the court may fix a time within which the defendant may appear and answer the writ. When the defendant cannot be found in the District of Columbia, the court may direct notice to be given to him by publication as in other cases of proceedings against nonresident defendants, and upon proof of publication, if the defendant does not appear, judgment may be rendered as if he had been personally served.

"§ 16–3543. Proceedings on default

"If the defendant does not appear as required by a writ of quo warranto, after being served, the court may proceed to hear proof in support of the writ and render judgment accordingly.

"In a quo warranto proceeding, the defendant may demur, plead specially, or plead "not guilty" as the general issue, and the United States or the District of Columbia, as the case may be, may reply as in other actions of a civil character. Issues of fact shall be tried by a jury if either party requests it. Otherwise they shall be determined by the court.

"§ 16–3545. Verdict and judgment

"Where a defendant in a quo warranto proceeding is found by the jury to have usurped, intruded into, or unlawfully held or exercised an office or franchise, the verdict shall be that he is guilty of the act or acts in question, and judgment shall be rendered that he be ousted and excluded therefrom and that the relator recover his costs.

"§ 16–3546. Usurping corporate franchise; judgment

"Where a quo warranto proceeding is against persons acting as a corporation without being legally incorporated, the judgment against the defendants shall be that they be perpetually restrained and enjoined from the commission or continuance of the acts complained of.

"§ 16–3547. Proceedings against corporate directors and trustees; judgment and order; enforcement

"Where a quo warranto proceeding is against a director or trustee of a corporation and the court finds that at his election either illegal votes were received or legal votes rejected, or both, sufficient to change the result if the error is corrected, the court may render judgment that the defendant be ousted, and that the relator, if entitled to be declared elected, be admitted to the office, and the court may issue an order to the proper parties, being officers or members of the corporation, to admit him to the office. The judgment may require the defendant to deliver to the relator all books, papers, and other things in his custody or control pertaining to the office, and obedience to judgment may be enforced by attachment.

"§ 16–3548. Recovery of damages from usurpér; limitation

"At any time within a year from a judgment in a quo warranto proceeding, the relator may bring an action against the party ousted and recover the damages sustained by the relator by reason of the ousted party's usurpation of the office to which the relator was entitled."

Such tissue removal shall not interfere with other functions of his Office. Any person who, in accordance with section 8, is entitled to the body for burial, shall first authorize the tissue removal."

AMENDMENTS RELATING TO THE REVENUE LAWS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SEC. 161. (a) The District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1937 is amended as follows:

(1) Section 1 of title IX of such Act (D.C. Code, sec. 47–2401) is amended—

(A) by striking out "The word 'Board', means the Board of Tax Appeals for the District of Columbia created by this title.", and

(B) by striking out "The word 'court' shall mean the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia." and inserting in lieu thereof "The word 'court' shall mean the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, unless the context indicates otherwise."

(3) Section 3 of title IX of such Act (D.C. Code, sec. 47–2403) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. Any person aggrieved by any assessment by the District of any personal-property, inheritance, estate, business-privilege, gross-receipts, gross-earnings, insurance premiums, or motor-vehicle-fuel tax or taxes, or penalties thereon, may within six months after payment of the tax, together with penalties and interest assessed thereon, appeal from the assessment to the Superior Court of the District of Columbia. The mailing to the taxpayer of a statement of taxes due shall be considered notice of assessment with respect to the taxes. The court shall hear and determine all questions arising on appeal and shall make separate findings of fact and conclusions of law, and shall render its decision in writing. The court may affirm, cancel, reduce, or increase the assessment."

(4) Section 4 of title IX of such Act (D.C. Code, sec. 47–2404) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. (a) Decisions of the Superior Court on civil tax cases are reviewable in the same manner as other decisions of the court in civil cases tried without a jury. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals has the power to affirm, modify, or reverse the decision of the Superior Court with or without remanding the case for hearing.

"(b) The decision of the Superior Court shall become final (1) upon the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for review, if no petition is filed within that time; (2) upon the expiration of time allowed for filing a petition for certiorari if the decision of the Superior Court has been affirmed on appeal, or the appeal has been dismissed, or no petition for certiorari has been filed; (3) upon denial of a petition for certiorari if the decision of the Superior Court has been affirmed on appeal, or the appeal has been dismissed; or (4) upon the expiration of thirty days from the date of issuance of the mandate of the Supreme Court, if that Court has affirmed the decision of the Superior Court or dismissed the petition for review.

"(c) If the Supreme Court directs that the decision of the Superior Court be modified or reversed, the decision rendered in accordance with the Supreme Court's mandate shall become final upon the expiration of thirty days from the time it was rendered unless within that time either the District or the taxpayer has instituted proceedings to have the decision corrected to accord with the mandate, in which event the decision of the Superior Court shall become final when so corrected.

"(d) If the decision of the Superior Court is modified or reversed by the Court of Appeals and if (1) the time allowed for filing a petition for certiorari has expired and no such petition has been filed, (2) the petition for certiorari has been denied, or (3) the decision of the Court of Appeals has been affirmed by the Supreme Court, then the decision of the Superior Court rendered in accordance with the mandate of the Court of Appeals shall become final upon the expiration of thirty days from the time the decision of the Superior Court was rendered, unless within that time either the District or the taxpayer has instituted proceedings to have the decision corrected so that it will accord with the mandate, in which event the decision of the Superior Court shall become final when corrected.

"(e) If the Supreme Court orders a rehearing, or if the case is remanded by the Court of Appeals for rehearing and if (1) the time allowed for filing of a petition for certiorari has expired and no petition has been filed; (2) the petition for certiorari has been denied; or (3) the decision of the Court of Appeals has been affirmed by the Supreme Court, then the Decision of the Superior Court rendered upon such rehearing shall become final in the same manner as though no prior decision had been rendered.

"(f) As used in this section the term 'mandate', in case a mandate has been recalled prior to the expiration of thirty days from the date of issuance, means the final mandate."

(5) Section 5 of title IX of such Act (D.C. Code, secs. 47–709, 47–710, 47–711, 47–712, 47–716 and 47–2405) is amended by striking out "ninety days" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "six months."

(6) Sections 6, 8, and 9 of title IX of such Act (D.C. Code, secs. 47–2406, 47–2408, and 47–2409) are repealed.

(7) Section 14 of title IX of such Act (D.C. Code, sec. 47–2413) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. (a) Where there has been an overpayment of any tax, the amount of the overpayment shall be refunded to the taxpayer. No refund (other than inheritance and estate taxes) shall be allowed unless the taxpayer files a claim before the expiration of that period. The amount of refund of taxes (other than inheritance and estate taxes) shall not exceed the portion of the tax paid during the two years immediately preceding the filing of the claim or, if no claim is filed, then the two years immediately preceding the allowance of the refund. No refund of inheritance and estate taxes shall be allowed after three years from the date the tax is paid unless the taxpayer files a claim before the expiration of that period. The amount of refund of inheritance and estate taxes shall not exceed the portion of the tax paid during the three years immediately preceding the filing of the claim or, if no claim is filed, then during the three years immediately preceding the allowance of the refund. Every claim for refund must be in writing under oath, must state the specific grounds on which it is founded, and must be filed with the Assessor. If the Assessor disallows all or any part of the refund claim, he shall notify the taxpayer by registered or certified mail. After receiving notice of disallowance, if the claim is acted upon within six months of filing, or after the expiration of six months from the date of filing if the claim is not acted upon, the taxpayer may appeal as provided in sections 3 and 4 of this title. This subsection does not apply to real estate tax nor does it apply to taxes imposed by the District of Columbia Income Tax Act; by the District of Columbia Income and Franchise Tax Act of 1947; or by titles I and II of the District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1949, refunds of which are otherwise provided by law.

"(b) In any proceeding under this title the Superior Court has jurisdiction to determine whether there has been any overpayment of tax and to order that any overpayment be credited or refunded to the taxpayer, if a timely refund claim has been filed.

"(c) Any other provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding, if it is determined by the Assessor or by the Superior Court that there has been an overpayment of any tax, whether as a deficiency or otherwise, interest shall be allowed and paid on the overpayment at the rate of 4 per centum per annum from the date the overpayment was paid until the date of refund, but with respect to that part of any overpayment which was not assessed and paid as a deficiency or as additional tax interest shall be allowed and paid only from the date of filing a claim for refund or a petition to the Superior Court as the case may be.

"(d) For purposes of this section, any interest or penalties paid by the taxpayer in connection with an overpayment of tax shall be deemed to be a part of the overpayment of tax."

(b) Section 34 of the District of Columbia Income Tax Act (D.C. Code, sec. 47–1534) is amended by striking out the last sentence.

(c) Section 34 of the District of Columbia Income Tax Act (D.C. Code, sec. 47–1534) is amended by striking out "ninety days" and inserting in lieu thereof "six months".

"(4) teachers, school officials, and employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columiba whose pay is fixed under Chapter 15 of title 31, District of Columbia Code; the chief judges and the associate judges of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia and the District of Columbia Court of Appeals; and nonjudicial employees of the District of Columbia court system whose pay is fixed under chapter 17 of title 11, District of Columbia Code;".

AMENDMENTS RELATING TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA'S SHARE OF EXPENSES OF THE FEDERAL COURTS

SEC. 173. (a)(1) All outstanding and future obligations of the Commissioner of the District of Columbia with respect to the District of Columbia's share of the cost of construction, operation, maintenance, and repair of the United States courthouse in the District of Columbia, as required by the Act of May 14, 1948 (62 Stat. 235), are canceled upon the effective date of this title.

(2) Beginning on the effective date of this title, the Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts shall reimburse to the United States from any funds in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia courts the amount determined by the administrator of General Services to be necessary to cover seventy-five per centum of the costs of operation, maintenance, and repair of space used by the United States attorney and the United States marshal for the District of Columbia.

(b) Section 7 of the Act of June 30, 1906 (D.C. Code, sec. 47–204), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. (a)(1) Until the day before the effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970, the Commissioner of the District of Columbia shall reimburse the United States for 60 per centum of the expenditures made on or before that day for the expenses of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that are described in paragraph (2). During the thirty-month period beginning on such effective date, the Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts shall reimburse the United States for expenditures made during that period for such expenses at the following rates of reimbursement:

"(A) 40 per centum for the first eighteen months of such period.

"(B) 20 per centum for the remainder of such period.

"(2) The expenses referred to in paragraph (1) are fees of witnesses, fees of jurors, pay of baliffs and criers (including salaries of deputy marshals who act as bailiffs or criers), and all other miscellaneous expenses of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

"(b) Beginning after the thirty-month period referred to in subsection (a), the Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts shall reimburse the United States for the District of Columbia's share of the cost for jury selection and grand jury expenses, as determined by the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Court. Estimates of the District of Columbia's share of such cost for each fiscal year shall be submitted to the Joint Committee on Judicial Administration of the District of Columbia courts for transmission with the annual estimate of the District of Columbia courts under section 11–1743 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code.

"(c) Reimbursement made under this section shall be made from funds in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia."

PART E—TRANSITION PROVISIONS; APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES; AND EFFECTIVE DATE

EXISTING RECORDS, FILES, PROPERTY, AND FUNDS

SEC. 191. (a) The files, records, property, and unexpended balances of appropriations and other funds of the former District of Columbia Court of General Sessions, the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, and the District of Columbia Tax Court are transferred to the Superior Court of the District of Columbia.

(b) The files, records, and property of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia with respect to its jurisdiction on the day before the effective date of this title under section 11–522 of title 11 and chapters 5, 7, 11, 13, and 15 of title 21, respectively, of the District of Columbia Code, as in effect on such day, are transferred to the Superior Court of the District of Columbia.

EXISTING PERSONNEL

SEC. 192. (a) The personnel of the former District of Columbia Court of General Sessions, the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, and the District of Columbia Tax Court shall be transferred to the Superior Court of the District of Columbia and shall, with respect to all rights, privileges, and benefits, be considered as continuous employees of that court without break in service. Personnel of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia performing functions incident to jurisdiction transferred under this Act to the Superior Court shall be entitled to transfer to the Superior Court, and upon such transfer shall retain all of their rights, privileges, and benefits, and shall be considered as continuous employees of the Superior Court without break in service.

(b) Nothing in this title shall affect the status of persons in the competitive civil service on the date of enactment of this Act, but such persons may be assigned within the District of Columbia court system without regard to such status.

RETIREMENT OF CERTAIN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA JUDGES

SEC. 193. (a) The person serving as judge of the District of Columbia Tax Court on the day prior to the effective date of this title may, within sixty days of such date, elect to retain retirement benefits under section 2 of title IX of the District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1937 (D.C. Code, sec. 47–2402), or relinquish such benefits and elect retirement benefits under chapter 15 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code, as amended by part A of ths title.

(b)(1) Any judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions, the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, or the former District of Columbia Municipal Court of Appeals or Municipal Court, who had retired prior to the effective date of this subsection, may elect to have his retirement salary recomputed and paid in accordance with this subsection. Such election may be made in writing within sixty days after such effective date and shall be filed with the Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

(2) The retirement salary of each judge making such election shall be recomputed in accordance with applicable law then in effect at the time of his retirement, except that, in the recomputation of such retirement salary, the salary of the corresponding judicial office on the day immediately following the effective date of this subsection shall be deemed to be the salary which such judge was receiving immediately prior to the date of his retirement.

(3) Each judge who elects recomputation of his retirement salary in accordance with this subsection shall—

(A) deposit in the District of Columbia Judicial Retirement and Survivors Annuity Fund an amount equal to 3½ per centum of his basic salary received for judicial service, with interest at 4 per centum per annum thereafter, compounded on December 31 of each year; or

(B) have his retirement salary, as recomputed in accordance with this subsection, reduced by 10 per centum of the amount of such deposit remaining unpaid.

(4) The retirement salary of any judge which is recomputed in accordance with this subsection shall be payable only with respect to those months beginning on and after the first day of the first month following the date of the election made by such judge under this subsection.

CONTINUATION OF SERVICE OF JUDGES OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURTS

SEC. 194. A judge of the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions, the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, or the District of Columbia Tax Court who is serving as a judge of such a court on the day before the effective date of this title under an appointment made before such date shall on such date continue to serve as a judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, but no amendment made by this title shall be construed to extend the term of such judge under such appointment. No amendment made by this title shall be construed to extend the term of office of a judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals appointed before the effective date of this title. The chief judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and the chief judge of the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions serving on the day before the effective date of this title shall, on and after such date, serve as chief judges of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals and the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, respectively, until their successors have been designated under section 11–1503 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code, as contained in the revision made by part A of this title.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES AND EXECUTIVE OFFICER OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURTS

SEC. 195. (a)(1) The President of the United States shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, three additional judges to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals who shall have the qualifications prescribed by section 11–1501 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code as contained in the revision made by part A of this title, and who shall, upon taking the oath required by law, enter into immediate service on that court.

(2) The President of the United States shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ten additional judges to the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions who shall have the qualifications prescribed by section 11–1501 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code as contained in the revision made by part A of this title, and who shall, upon taking the oath required by law, enter into immediate service on that court.

(b) The President shall appoint an Executive Officer of the District of Columbia courts. Until the effective date of this title, the Executive Officer shall receive the same compensation as is prescribed for an associate judge of the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions. The Executive Officer in office on the effective date of this title shall continue to serve in such office until his successor has been selected in accordance with subchapter 1 of chapter 17 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code, as contained in the revision made by part A of this title.

ASSIGNMENT OF JUDGES TO THE JUVENILE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SEC. 196. Notwithstanding the provisions of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code, as in effect on the date of enactment of this title, the chief judge of the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions may assign associate judges of that court to sit as judges of the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, under the supervision of the chief judge of the Juvenile Court, during the period beginning on the date of the enactment of this title and ending on the day before the effective date of this title.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 197. (a) The effective date of this title (and the amendments made by this title) shall be the first day of the seventh calendar month which begins after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) Notwithstanding subsection (a), the following provisions shall take effect as provided in the following paragraphs:

(1) The provisions of chapter 25 (relating to attorneys) of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code, as contained in the revision made by part A of this title, shall take effect on April 1, 1972. The provisions of chapter 21 (relating to attorneys) of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code, in effect on the day before the effective date of this title, shall remain in effect until April 1, 1972.

(2) The provisions of chapter 21 (relating to the Register of Wills) of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code, as contained in the revision made by part A of this title, shall take effect immediately following the expiration of the eighteen-month period beginning on the effective date of this title. The provisions of sections 11–504 through 11–506 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code (relating to the Register of Wills) in effect on the day before the effective date of this title, shall remain in effect until the expiration of such eighteen-month period.

(3) The amendments made by the following sections of this Act (relating to those matters over which the United States District Court for the District of Columbia retains temporary jurisdiction) shall take effect immediately following the expiration of the eighteen-month period beginning on the effective date of this title: Sections 144(10), 145(b)(2), 145(k)(1), 145(l), 147(1), 148(2), 149(2), 149(4), 149(6), 149(8), 150(a), 150(b)(1), 150(b)(3), 150(d), 150(e), 150(f)(3), 150(f)(4), 150(f)(8), 150(g), and 150(h)(1).

(4) Section 146(a)(1) (relating to the repeal of certain review provisions) shall not apply with respect to any appeal from the District of Columbia Court of Appeals over which the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has jurisdiction under section 11–301 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code as in effect immediately before the date of enactment of this Act.

(5) Section 11–722 of the District of Columbia Code, as contained in the revision made by part A of this title, shall take effect with respect to petitions filed after the effective date of this title for review of decisions or orders.

(6) The amendments made by subpart 2 of part D of this title to section 8 of the Act of March 4, 1913, shall not apply with respect to proceedings brought in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia on or before the effective date of this title.

(7) The amendments made by section 162 shall take effect with respect to petitions filed after the effective date of this title for review of decisions or orders.

(8) Sections 195 and 196 shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(c) For purposes of this title and any amendment made by this title, the term "effective date of the District of Columbia Court Reorganization Act of 1970" means the first day of the seventh calendar month which begins after the date of the enactment of this Act.

TITLE II—CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE

SENTENCING OF MULTIPLE OFFENDERS

SEC. 201. (a) Section 907 of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–104), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 907. Except as provided in section 907A(b), if any person—

"(1) is convicted of a criminal offense (other than a non-moving traffic offense) under a law applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia, and

"(2) was previously convicted of a criminal offense under any law of the United States or of a State or territory of the United States which offense, at the time of the conviction referred to in paragraph (1), is the same as, constitutes, or necessarily includes the offense referred to in that paragraph, such person may be sentenced to pay a fine in an amount not more than one and one-half times the maximum fine prescribed for the conviction referred to in paragraph (1) and sentenced to imprisonment for a term not more than one and one-half times the maximum term of imprisonment prescribed for that conviction. If such person was previously convicted more than once of an offense described in paragraph (2), he may be sentenced to pay a fine in an amount not more than three times the maximum fine prescribed for the conviction referred to in paragraph (1) and sentenced to imprisonment for a term not more than three times the maximum term of imprisonment prescribed for that conviction. No conviction with respect to which a person has been pardoned on the ground of innocence shall be taken into account in applying this section."

(b) Such Act is amended by adding after section 907 the following new section:

"SEC. 907A. (a)(1) Except as provided in subsection (b), if any person—

"(A) is convicted in the District of Columbia of a felony, and

"(B) before the commission of such felony, was convicted of at least two felonies, and the court is of the opinion that the history and character of such person and the nature and circumstances of his criminal conduct indicate that extended incarceration or lifetime supervision, or both, will best serve the public interest, the court may, in lieu of any sentence otherwise authorized for the felony referred to in subparagraph (A), impose such greater sentence as it deems necessary, including imprisonment for the natural life of such person.

"(2) For purposes of subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1)—

"(A) a person shall be considered as having been convicted of a felony if he was convicted (i) of a felony in a court of the District of Columbia or of the United States, or (ii) in any other jurisdiction of a crime classified as a felony under the laws of that jurisdiction or punishable by imprisonment for more than two years; and

"(B) a person shall be considered as having been convicted of two felonies if his initial sentencing under a conviction of one felony preceded the commission of the second felony for which he was convicted.

No conviction with respect to which a person has been pardoned on the ground of innocence shall be taken into account in applying this subsection.

"(b)(1) If any person—

"(A) is convicted in the District of Columbia of a violent crime, and

"(B) before the commission of such violent crime, was convicted of at least two violent crimes, the court shall (unless it imposes the death sentence) sentence him to imprisonment for his natural life, with eligibility for parole only after the expiration of twenty years from the date his imprisonment begins. Imposition or execution of sentence under this subsection shall not be suspended, probation shall not be granted, and chapter 402 of title 18 of the United States Code (Federal Youth Corrections Act) shall not apply.

"(2)(A) For purposes of this subsection, the term 'violent crime' means any violation of the laws of the United States (including laws applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia) or a State or territory of the United States, which violation would constitute under the laws applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia any of the following crimes: Murder, manslaughter, rape, arson, mayhem, maliciously disfiguring another, abduction, kidnaping, burglary in the first degree, robbery, housebreaking, indecent acts against children, assault with intent to kill, to commit rape, or to commit robbery, assault with a dangerous weapon, assault on a police or correctional officer, or assault with intent to commit any offense punishable by imprisonment for more than one year.

"(B) For purposes of this subsection, (i) a person shall be considered as having been convicted of two violent crimes if his initial sentencing under a conviction of one such crime preceded the commission of the second violent crime for which he was convicted, and (ii) no conviction with respect to which a person has been pardoned on the ground of innocence shall be taken into account in applying this subsection."

CONSPIRACY

SEC. 202. Such Act of March 3, 1901, is further amended by adding after section 908 the following new section:

"SEC. 908A. (a) If two or more persons conspire either to commit a criminal offense or to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose, each shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, except that if the object of the conspiracy is a criminal offense punishable by less than five years, the maximum penalty for the conspiracy shall not exceed the maximum penalty provided for that offense.

"(b) No person may be convicted of conspiracy unless an overt act is alleged and proved to have been committed by one of the conspirators pursuant to the conspiracy and to effect its purpose.

"(c) When the object of a conspiracy contrived within the District of Columbia is to engage in conduct in a jurisdiction outside the District of Columbia which would constitute a criminal offense under an Act of Congress applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia if performed therein, the conspiracy is a violation of this section if (1) such conduct would also constitute a crime under the laws of the other jurisdiction if performed therein, or (2) such conduct would constitute a criminal offense under an Act of Congress exclusively applicable to the District of Columbia even if performed outside the District of Columbia.

"(d) A conspiracy contrived in another jurisdiction to engage in conduct within the District of Columbia which would constitute a criminal offense under an Act of Congress exclusively applicable to the District of Columbia if performed within the District of Columbia is a violation of this section when an overt act pursuant to the conspiracy is committed within the District of Columbia. Under such circumstances, it is immaterial and no defense to a prosecution for conspiracy that the conduct which is the object of the conspiracy would not constitute a crime under the laws of the other jurisdiction."

SECOND DEGREE BURGLARY EXTENDED TO BREAKING AND ENTERING VENDING MACHINES AND SIMILAR DEVICES

SEC. 203. Section 823(b) of such Act of March 31, 1901 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–1801), is amended by inserting after "deposited and kept for the purpose of trade," the following: "or any parking meter, coin telephone, vending machine dispensing goods or services, money changer, or any other device designed to receive currency,".

PENALTY FOR RAPE

SEC. 204. Section 808 of such Act of March 31, 1901 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2801), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 808. Whoever has carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will or whoever carnally knows and abuses a female child under sixteen years of age, shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life."

COMMITTING CRIME OF VIOLENCE WHILE ARMED

SEC. 205. (a) Section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to control the possession, sale, transfer, and use of pistols and other dangerous weapons in the District of Columbia, to provide penalties, to prescribe rules of evidence, and for other purposes", approved July 8, 1932 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–3202), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. (a) If any person commits a crime of violence in the District of Columbia when armed with or having readily available any pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon (including a sawed-off shotgun, shotgun, machinegun, rifle, dirk, bowie knife, butcher knife, switchblade knife, razor, blackjack, billy, or metallic or other false knuckles) he shall, in addition to the punishment provided for the crime of violence—

"(1) if he is convicted for the first time of having so committed a crime of violence in the District of Columbia, be sentenced to a minimum period of imprisonment of not less than three years, and a maximum period of imprisonment which may not be less than three times the minimum sentence imposed and which may be up to life imprisonment.

"(2) if he is convicted more than once of having so committed a crime of violence in the District of Columbia, be sentenced to a minimum period of imprisonment of not less than ten years, and a maximum period of imprisonment which may not be less than three times the minimum sentence imposed and which may be up to life imprisonment.

"(b) Where the maximum sentence imposed under this section is life imprisonment, the minimum sentence imposed under subsection (a) may not exceed fifteen years' imprisonment.

"(c) Any person sentenced under this section may be released on parole in accordance with the Act of July 15, 1932 (chapter 2 of title 24 of the District of Columbia Code), at any time after having served the minimum sentence imposed under this section.

"(d)(1) Chapter 402 of title 18 of the United States Code (Federal Youth Corrections Act) shall not apply with respect to any person sentenced under paragraph (2) of subsection (a).

"(2) The execution or imposition of any term of imprisonment imposed under this section may not be suspended and probation may not be granted. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed as reducing any sentence otherwise imposed or authorized to be imposed.

"(e) No conviction with respect to which a person has been pardoned on the ground of innocence shall be taken into account in applying this section."

(b) Section 13 of such Act is amended by striking out "This" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Except as provided in section 2 and section 14(b) of this Act, this".

RESISTING ARREST

SEC. 206. Subsection (a) of section 432 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia (D.C. Code, sec. 22–505(a)) is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "It is neither justifiable nor excusable cause for a person to use force to resist an arrest when such arrest is made by an individual he has reason to believe is a law enforcement officer, whether or not such arrest is lawful."

INSANE CRIMINALS

SEC. 207. Section 927 of the Act of March 3, 1901 (D.C. Code, sec. 24–301), is amended—

(1) by striking out "Whenever a person is arrested" and all that follows down through "period of probation" in the first sentence of subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Whenever a person is arrested or indicted for, or charged by information with, an offense, or a child is the subject of a transfer motion in the Family Division of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia pursuant to section 16–2331 of the District of Columbia Code, and before the imposition of sentence, the expiration of any period of probation, or prior to hearing on the transfer motion, as the case may be,";

(2) by striking out the period at the end of the second sentence of subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "or to participate in transfer proceedings.";

(3) by inserting after "stand trial" in the third sentence of subsection (a) "or to participate in transfer proceedings";

(4) by inserting after "stand trial" in both places it appears in subsection (b) "or to participate in transfer proceedings";

(5) by amending subsection (d) to read as follows:

"(d) If any person tried upon an indictment or information for an offense raises the defense of insanity and is acquitted solely on the ground that he was insane at the time of its commission, he shall be committed to a hospital for the mentally ill until such time as he is eligible for release pursuant to subsection (e).";

(6) by adding at the end of subsection (j) the following sentence: "No person accused of an offense shall be acquitted on the ground that he was insane at the time of its commission unless his insanity, regardless of who raises the issue, is affirmatively established by a preponderance of the evidence."; and

(7) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(k)(1) A person in custody or conditionally released from custody, pursuant to the provisions of this section, claiming the right to be released from custody, the right to any change in the conditions of his release, or other relief concerning his custody, may move the court having jurisdiction to order his release, to release him from custody, to change the conditions of his release, or to grant other relief.

"(2) A motion for relief may be made at any time.

"(3) Unless the motion and the files and records of the case conclusively show that the person is entitled to no relief, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon the prosecuting authority, grant a prompt hearing thereon, determine the issues, and make findings of fact and conclusions of law with respect thereto. On all issues raised by his motion, the person shall have the burden of proof. If the court finds that the person is entitled to his release from custody, either conditional or unconditional, a change in the conditions of his release, or other relief, the court shall enter such order as may appear appropriate.

"(4) A court may entertain and determine the motion without requiring the production of the person at the hearing.

"(5) A court shall not be required to entertain a second or successive motion for relief under this section more often than once every six months. A court for good cause shown may in its discretion entertain such a motion more often than once every six months.

"(6) An appeal may be taken from an order entered under this section to the court having jurisdiction to review final judgments of the court entering the order.

"(7) An application for habeas corpus on behalf of a person who is authorized to apply for relief by motion pursuant to this section shall not be entertained if it appears that the applicant has failed to apply for relief, by motion, to the court having jurisdiction to entertain a motion pursuant to this section, unless it also appears that the remedy by motion is inadequate or ineffective to test the validity of his detention."

NARCOTIC DRUGS

SEC. 208. Section 23 of the Uniform Narcotic Drug Act (D.C. Code, sec. 33–423) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. (a) Except as hereinafter provided, a person violating any provision of this Act, or any regulation made by the Commissioner of the District of Columbia or the District of Columbia Council under authority of this Act, for which no specific penalty is otherwise provided, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

"(b) A person convicted of an offense punishable pursuant to this section, who shall have previously been convicted in the District of Columbia of such an offense, or who shall have previously been convicted, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, of a violation of the laws of the United States or of a State or subdivision thereof which would have been a violation of this Act and punishable pursuant to this section if committed in the District of Columbia and prosecuted pursuant to this Act, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than ten years, or both.

"(c) For additional penalties for two or more violations of this Act, see sections 907 and 907A of the Act of March 3, 1901 (as amended by title II of the District of Columbia Court Reform and Criminal Procedure Act of 1970)."

POSSESSION OF CERTAIN DESTRUCTIVE DEVICES

SEC. 208A. Section 14 of the Act of July 8, 1932 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–3214), is amended in subsection (c) by striking out "this section" and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (a) or (b) of this section" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) No person shall, without lawful authority, possess any incendiary device within the District of Columbia.

"(2) For the purpose of this subsection, the term 'incendiary device' means any flame producing—

"(A) bomb,

"(B) grenade,

"(C) mine, or

"(D) device similar to any of the devices described in the preceding clauses.

"(3) Whoever violates this subsection shall be imprisoned—

"(A) in the case of a first offense, for a period of not less than two years,

"(B) in the case of a second or subsequent offense, for a period of not less than ten years."

"(d) An indictment or information brought in the name of the United States may include, in addition to offenses prosecutable by the United States, offenses prosecutable by the District of Columbia, and such prosecution shall be conducted by the United States attorney in the name of the United States, if the written consent of the Corporation Counsel (or his assistant authorized to consent to such prosecution) is filed in such case.

"(e) Separate indictments or informations, or both, charging offenses prosecutable by the District of Columbia and by the United States may be joined for trial if the offenses charged therein could have been joined in the same indictment. Such prosecution may be conducted either solely by the Corporation Counsel or his assistants or solely by the United States attorney or his assistants if the other prosecuting authority consents.

"(f) If in any case any question shall arise as to whether, under this section, the prosecution should be conducted by the Corporation Counsel or by the United States attorney, the presiding judge shall forthwith, either on his own motion or upon suggestion of the Corporation Counsel or the United States attorney, certify the case to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, which court shall hear and determine the question in a summary way. In every such case the defendant or defendants shall have the right to be heard in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. The decision of such court shall be final.

"§ 23–102. Abandonment of prosecution; enlargement of time for taking action

"If any person charged with a criminal offense shall have been committed or held to bail to await the action of the grand jury and within nine months thereafter the grand jury shall not have taken action on the case, either by ignoring the charge or by returning an indictment, the prosecution of such charge shall be deemed to have been abandoned and the accused shall be set free or his bail discharged, as the case may be: but, the court having jurisdiction to try the offense for which the person has been committed, when practicable and upon good cause shown in writing and upon due notice to the accused, may from time to time enlarge the time for the taking action in such case by the grand jury.

"§ 23–103. Statements prior to sentence

"Before imposing sentence the court may disclose to the defendant's counsel and to the prosecuting attorney, but not to one and not the other, all or part of any pre-sentencing report submitted to the court in the case. The court also prior to imposing sentence shall afford counsel an opportunity to speak on behalf of the defendant and shall address the defendant personally and ask him if he wishes to make a statement in his own behalf and to present any information in mitigation of punishment. At any time when the defendant or his counsel addresses the court on the sentence to be imposed, the prosecuting attorney shall, if he wishes, have an equivalent opportunity to address the court and to make a recommendation to the court on the sentence to be imposed and to present information in support of his recommendation. Such information as the defendant or his counsel or the prosecuting attorney may present shall at all times be subject to the applicable rules of mutual discovery.

"§ 23–104. Appeals by United States and District of Columbia

"(a)(1) The United States or the District of Columbia may appeal an order, entered before the trial of a person charged with a criminal offense, which directs the return of seized property, suppresses evidence, or otherwise denies the prosecutor the use of evidence at trial, if the United States attorney or the Corporation Counsel conducting the prosecution for such violation certifies to the judge who granted such motion that the appeal is not taken for purpose of delay and the evidence is a substantial proof of the charge pending against the defendant.

"(2) A motion for return of seized property or to suppress evidence shall be made before trial unless opportunity therefor did not exist or the defendant was not aware of the grounds for the motion.

"(b) The United States or the District of Columbia may appeal a ruling made during the trial of a person charged with a criminal offense which suppresses or otherwise denies the prosecutor the use of evidence on the ground that it was invalidly obtained, if the United States attorney or the Corporation Counsel conducting the prosecution for such violation certifies to the judge that the appeal is not taken for purpose of delay and that the evidence is a substantial proof of the charge being tried against the defendant. The court shall either adjourn the trial until the appeal shall be resolved or declare a mistrial and continue the case until the appeal shall be resolved.

"(c) The United States or the District of Columbia may appeal an order dismissing an indictment or information or otherwise terminating a prosecution in favor of a defendant or defendants as to one or more counts thereof, except where there is an acquittal on the merits.

"(d) The United States or the District of Columbia may appeal any other ruling made during the trial of a person charged with an offense which the United States attorney or the Corporation Counsel certifies as involving a substantial and recurring question of law which requires appellate resolution. Such an appeal may be taken during a trial only with leave of the court, and upon allowing such an appeal during a trial the court shall adjourn the trial until the appeal shall be resolved or declare a mistrial and continue the case until the appeal shall be resolved. Such an appeal may be taken after trial, and the appellate court shall decide the question of law which has been certified as substantial and recurring, but a verdict in favor of the defendant shall not be set aside.

"(e) Any appeal taken pursuant to this section either during or prior to trial shall be expedited.

"(f) Pending the prosecution and determination of an appeal taken pursuant to this section, the defendant shall be detained or released in accordance with chapter 13 of this title or chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code.

"§ 23–105. Challenges to jurors

"(a) In a trial for an offense punishable by death, each side is entitled to twenty peremptory challenges. In a trial for an offense punishable by imprisonment for more than one year, each side is entitled to ten peremptory challenges. In all other criminal cases, each side is entitled to three peremptory challenges. If there is more than one defendant, or if a case is prosecuted both by the United States and by the District of Columbia, the court may allow additional peremptory challenges and permit them to be exercised separately or jointly, but in no event shall one side be entitled to more peremptory challenges than the other.

"(b) The court may direct that jurors in addition to the regular jury be called and impaneled to sit as alternate jurors. In addition to those otherwise allowed, each side is entitled to one peremptory challenge if one or two alternate jurors are to be impaneled, to two peremptory challenges if three or four alternate jurors are to be impaneled, and to three peremptory challenges if five or six alternate jurors are to be impaneled.

"(c) Any juror or alternate juror may be challenged for cause.

"(d) No verdict shall be set aside for any cause which might be alleged as ground for challenge of a juror before the jury is sworn, except when the objection to the juror is that he had a bias against the defendant such as would have disqualified him, such disqualification was not known to or suspected by the defendant or his counsel before the juror was sworn, and the basis for such disqualification was the subject of examination or request for examination of the prospective jurors by or on request of the defendant.

"§ 23–106. Witnesses for defense; fees

"The court shall order at any time that a subpoena be issued for service upon a named witness on behalf of a defendant if the defendant makes an application for such an order and makes a satisfactory showing that he is financially unable to pay the fees of the witness and that the presence of the witness is necessary to an adequate defense. If the court orders the subpoena to be issued the cost incurred by the process and the fees of the witness so subpoenaed shall be paid in the same manner in which similar costs and fees are paid in case of a witness subpoenaed in behalf of the prosecuting authority.

"§ 23–107. Discharge or acquittal of joint defendant during trial in order to be witness

"(a) When two or more persons are jointly indicted or charged by information, or charged by separate indictments or informations which have been joined for trial, the court may, with the consent of the prosecuting authority, direct that a defendant who has not gone into his defense be discharged so that he may be a witness for the prosecution.

"(b) When two or more persons are jointly tried, a person desiring that another defendant testify on his behalf may request a judgment of acquittal on behalf of such defendant, which the court shall consider in the same manner as a motion made by such defendant.

"(c) At the request of a defendant who wishes to testify on behalf of another person with whom he is jointly tried, if the evidence against such defendant is sufficient to be submitted to the jury and if such other person consents, the court may submit the case concerning such defendant to the jury separately so that his testimony may not be considered against him by such jury.

"(d) A discharge granted pursuant to subsection (a), or an acquittal secured pursuant to subsection (b) or (c), shall be bar to another prosecution for the same offense of the defendant so discharged or acquitted.

"§ 23–108. Depositions

"(a) If a material witness for either the prosecution or the defendant resides more than twenty-five miles from the place of holding court, is sick or infirm, or is about to leave the District of Columbia, and the prosecution or the defendant applies in writing to the court for a commission to examine such witness when the deposition is to be taken beyond the District of Columbia, the court may grant the commission and enter an order stating for what length of time notice shall be given to the other party before such witness shall be examined. At or before the time fixed in the notice, when the examination is upon written interrogatories, the other party may file cross-interrogatories, but if he fails to do so the clerk shall file the following interrogatories:

"(1) Are all your statements in the foregoing answers made from your own personal knowledge? If not, show what is stated upon information and give its source.

"(2) State everything you know in addition to what is stated in your above answers concerning this case favorable to either the prosecution or the defendant.

"(b) The court may order in any case that the examination be conducted orally.

"(c) The commission shall issue from the clerk's office, the examination of the witnesses shall be made and certified, and the return thereof made in the same manner as in civil cases, and unimportant irregularities or errors in the proceedings under the commission shall not cause the deposition to be excluded where no substantial prejudice can be wrought to the prosecution or the defendant by such irregularities or errors.

"§ 23–109. Powers of investigators assigned to United States attorney

"Any special investigator appointed by the Attorney General and assigned to the United States attorney for the District shall have authority to execute all lawful writs, process, and orders issued under authority of the United States, and command all necessary assistance to execute his duties, and shall have the same powers to make arrests as are possessed by members of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia.

"§ 23–110. Remedies on motion attacking sentence

"(a) A prisoner in custody under sentence of the Superior Court claiming the right to be released upon the ground that (1) the sentence was imposed in violation of the Constitution of the United States or the laws of the District of Columbia, (2) the court was without jurisdiction to impose the sentence, (3) the sentence was in excess of the maximum authorized by law, (4) the sentence is otherwise subject to collateral attack, may move the court to vacate, set aside, or correct the sentence.

"(b) A motion for such relief may be made at any time.

"(c) Unless the motion and files and records of the case conclusively show that the prisoner is entitled to no relief, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon the prosecuting authority, grant a prompt hearing thereon, determine the issues, and make findings of fact and conclusions of law with respect thereto. If the court finds that (1) the judgment was rendered without jurisdiction, (2) the sentence imposed was not authorized by law or is otherwise open to collateral attack, (3) there has been such a denial or infringement of the constitutional rights of the prisoner as to render the judgment vulnerable to collateral attack, the court shall vacate and set the judgment aside and shall discharge the prisoner, resentence him, grant a new trial, or correct the sentence, as may appear appropriate.

"(d) A court may entertain and determine the motion without requiring the production of the prisoner at the hearing.

"(e) The court shall not be required to entertain a second or successive motion for similar relief on behalf of the same prisoner.

"(f) An appeal may be taken to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals from the order entered on the motion as from a final judgment on application for a writ of habeas corpus.

"(g) An application for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a prisoner who is authorized to apply for relief by motion pursuant to this section shall not be entertained by the Superior Court or by any Federal or State court if it appears that the applicant has failed to make a motion for relief under this section or that the Superior Court has denied him relief, unless it also appears that the remedy by motion is inadequate or ineffective to test the legality of his detention.

"§ 23–111. Proceedings to establish previous convictions

"(a)(1) After conviction of (but before pronouncement of sentence on) a person for an offense under the laws applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia the United States attorney or the Corporation Counsel, as the case may be, shall file an information informing the court of any previous convictions that would subject such person to increased punishment. A copy of such information shall be served upon counsel for the person before sentence is imposed.

"(2) An information may not be filed under this section if the increased punishment which may be imposed is imprisonment for a term in excess of three years unless the person either waived or was afforded prosecution by indictment for the offense for which such increased punishment may be imposed.

"(3) Whenever an information has been filed under this section with respect to a person who stands convicted following a plea of guilty, the court shall allow the person to withdraw the plea upon a showing that, at the time the plea was entered, the person did not know that his previous convictions would subject him to increased punishment.

"(b) If the prosecutor files an information under this section, the court shall inquire of the person with respect to whom the information was filed whether he affirms or denies that he has been previously convicted as alleged in the information, and shall inform him that any challenge to a previous conviction which is not made before sentence is imposed may not thereafter be raised to attack the sentence.

"(c)(1) If the person denies any allegation of the information of previous conviction, or claims that any conviction alleged is invalid, he shall file a written response to the information. A copy of the response shall be served upon the prosecutor. The court shall hold a hearing to determine any issues raised by the response which would except the person from increased punishment. The hearing shall be before the court without a jury and either party may introduce evidence. Except as otherwise provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the prosecuting authority shall have the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt on any issue of fact. At the request of either party, the court shall enter findings of fact and conclusions of law.

"(2) A person claiming that a conviction alleged in the information was obtained in violation of the Constitution of the United States shall set forth his claim, and the factual basis therefor, with particularity in his response to the information. The person shall have the burden of proof by a preponderance of the evidence on any issue of fact raised by the response. Any challenge to a previous conviction, not raised by response to the information before an increased sentence is imposed in reliance thereon, shall be waived unless good cause be shown for failure to make a timely challenge.

"(d)(1) If the person files no response to the information, or if the court determines, after hearing, that the person is subject to increased punishment by reason of previous convictions, the court shall proceed to impose sentence upon him as provided by law.

"(2) If the court determines that the person has not been convicted as alleged in the information, that a conviction alleged in the information is invalid, or that the person is otherwise not subject to an increased sentence as a matter of law, the court shall, at the request of the prosecutor, postpone sentence to allow an appeal from that determination. If no such request is made, the court shall impose sentence as provided by law. The person may appeal from an order postponing sentence as if sentence had been pronounced and a final judgment of conviction entered.

"§ 23–112. Consecutive and concurrent sentences

"A sentence imposed on a person for conviction of an offense shall, unless the court imposing such sentence expressly provides otherwise, run consecutively to any other sentence imposed on such person for conviction of an offense, whether or not the offense (1) arises out of another transaction, or (2) arises out of the same transaction and requires proof of a fact which the other does not.

"23–321. Description of money.
"23–322. Intent to defraud.
"23–323. Perjury.
"23–324. Subordination of perjury.

SUBCHAPTER 1—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"§ 23–301. Prosecution by indictment or information

"An offense prosecuted in the Superior Court which may be punished by death shall be prosecuted by indictment returned by a grand jury. An offense which may be punished by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year shall be prosecuted by indictment, but it may be prosecuted by information if the defendant, after he has been advised of the nature of the charge and of his rights, waives in open court prosecution by indictment. Any other offense may be prosecuted by indictment or by information. An information subscribed by the proper prosecuting officer may be filed without leave of court.

"SUBCHAPTER II—JOINDER

"§ 23–311. Joinder of offenses and of defendants

"(a) Two or more offenses may be charged in the same indictment or information in a separate count for each offense if the offenses charged, whether felonies or misdemeanors or both, are of the same or similar character or are based on the same act or transaction or on two or more acts or transactions connected together or constituting parts of a common scheme or plan.

"(b) Two or more offenses may be charged in the same indictment or information as provided in subsection (a) even though one or more is in violation of the laws of the United States and another is in violation of laws applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia and may be prosecuted as provided in section 11–502(3).

"(c) Two or more defendants may be charged in the same indictment or information if they are alleged to have participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses. Such defendants may be charged in one or more counts together or separately and all of the defendants need not be charged in each count.

"§ 23–312. Joinder of indictments or informations for trial

"The court may order two or more indictments or informations or both to be tried together if the offenses, and the defendants if there is more than one, could have been joined in a single indictment or information. The procedure shall be the same as if the prosecution were under such single indictment or information.

"§ 23–313. Relief from prejudicial joinder

"If it appears that a defendant or the government is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or of defendants in an indictment or information or by such joinder for trial together, the court may order an election or separate trials of counts, grant a severance of defendants, or provide whatever other relief justice requires. In ruling on a motion by a defendant for severance the court may order the attorney for the government to deliver to the court for inspection in camera any statements or confessions made by the defendants which the government intends to introduce in evidence at the trial.

"§ 23–314. Joinder of inconsistent offenses concerning the same property

"An indictment or information may contain a count for larceny, a count for obtaining the same property by false pretenses, a count for embezzlement thereof, and a count for receiving or concealing the same property, knowing it to be stolen or embezzled, or any of such counts, and the jury may convict of any of such offenses, and may find any or all of the persons indicted guilty of any of said offenses.

"SUBCHAPTER III—SUFFICIENCY

"§ 23–321. Description of money

"In every indictment or information, except for forgery, in which it is necessary to make an averment as to any money or bank bill or notes, United States Treasury notes, postal and fractional currency, or other bills, bonds, or notes, issued by lawful authority and intended to pass and circulate as money, it shall be sufficient to describe such money, bills, notes, currency, or bonds simply as money, without specifying any particular coin, note, bill, or bond; and such allegation shall be sustained by proof that the accused has stolen or embezzled any amount of coin, or any such note, bill, currency, or bond, although the particular amount of species of such coin, note, bill, currency, or bond be not proved.

"§ 23–322. Intent to defraud

"In an indictment or information in which it is necessary to allege an intent to defraud, it shall be sufficient to allege that the party accused did the act complained of with intent to defraud, without alleging an intent to defraud any particular person or body corporate. On the trial of such an indictment or information it shall not be necessary to prove an intent to defraud any particular person, but it shall be sufficient to prove a general intent to defraud.

"§ 23–323. Perjury

"In every information or indictment for perjury, it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offense charged upon the defendant, and by what court, or before whom the oath was taken (averring such court, or person or persons, to have a competent authority to administer the same) together with the proper averment or averments to falsify the matter or matters wherein the perjury or perjuries is or are assigned; without setting forth the bill, answer, information, indictment, declaration, or any part of any record of proceeding either in law or equity, other than as aforesaid; and without setting forth the commission or authority of the court, or person or persons before whom the perjury was committed; any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

"§ 23–324. Subornation of perjury

"In every information or indictment for subornation of perjury, or for corrupt bargaining or contracting with others to commit perjury, it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offense charged upon the defendant, without setting forth the bill, answer, information, indictment, declaration, or any part of any record or proceeding either in law or equity, and without setting forth the commission or authority of the court, or person or persons before whom the perjury was committed, or was agreed or promised to be committed, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

"23–591. Authority to break and enter under certain conditions.

"SUBCHAPTER I—DEFINITIONS

"§ 23–501. Definitions

"As used in subchapters II, IV, and V of this chapter—

"(1) the term 'judicial officer' means a judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia or of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, or a United States Commissioner or magistrate for the District of Columbia;

"(2) the term 'law enforcement officer' means an officer or member of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia or of any other police force operating in the District of Columbia, or an investigative officer or agent of the United States;

"(3) the term 'prosecutor" means the United States attorney for the District of Columbia or his assistant, the Corporation Counsel of the District of Columbia or his assistant, or an attorney employed by, and who has entered an appearance on behalf of, the United States or the District of Columbia in a criminal case or in an investigation being conducted by a grand jury.

"SUBCHAPTER II—SEARCH WARRANTS

"§ 23–521. Nature and issuance of search warrants

"(a) Under circumstances described in this subchapter, a judicial officer may issue a search warrant upon application of a law enforcement officer or prosecutor. A warrant may authorize a search to be conducted anywhere in the District of Columbia and may be executed pursuant to its terms.

"(b) A search warrant may direct a search of any or all of the following:

"(1) one or more designated or described places or premises;

"(2) one or more designated or described vehicles;

"(3) one or more designated or described physical objects; or

"(4) designated persons.

"(c) A search warrant may direct the seizure of designated property or kinds of property, and the seizure may include, to such extent as is reasonable under all circumstances, taking physical or other impressions, or performing chemical, scientific, medical, or other tests or experiments of, from, or upon designated premises, vehicles, objects, or persons.

"(d) Property is subject to seizure pursuant to a search warrant if there is probable cause to believe that it—

"(1) is stolen or embezzled;

"(2) is contraband or otherwise illegally possessed;

"(3) has been used or is possessed for the purpose of being used, or is designed or intended to be used, to commit or conceal the commission of a criminal offense; or

"(4) constitutes evidence of or tends to demonstrate the commission of an offense or the identity of a person participating in the commission of an offense.

"(e) A search warrant may be addressed to a specific law enforcement officer, or to any law enforcement officer of a designated classification, or to any officer of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia or other designated agency authorized to make arrests or execute process in the District of Columbia.

"(f) A search warrant shall contain—

"(1) the name of the issuing court, the name and signature of the issuing judicial officer, and the date of issuance;

"(2) the name, classification, or department or agency of the officer or agent to whom it is addressed;

"(3) a designation of the premises, vehicles, objects, or persons to be searched, sufficient for certainty of identification;

"(4) a description of the property whose seizure is the object of the warrant;

"(5) a direction that the warrant be executed during the hours of daylight or, on the basis of a request made in accordance with section 23–522(c), an authorization for execution at any time of day or night;

"(6) where the judicial officer has found cause therefor, including one of the grounds set forth in paragraph (1), (2), (3), or (5) of section 23–591(c) an authorization that the executing officer may enter premises or vehicles to be searched without giving notice of his identity and purpose; and

"(7) a direction that the warrant and an inventory of any property seized pursuant thereto be returned to the court on the next court day after its execution.

"§ 23–522. Applications for search warrants

"(a) Each application for a search warrant shall be made in writing upon oath or affirmation to a judicial officer.

"(b) Each application shall include—

"(1) the name and title of the applicant;

"(2) a statement that there is probable cause to believe that property of a kind or character described in section 23–521(d) may be found in designated premise in a designated vehicle or object, or upon designated persons;

"(3) allegation of fact supporting such statement; and

"(4) a request that the judicial officer issue a search warrant directing a search for and seizure of the property in question.

The applicant may also submit depositions or affidavits of other persons containing allegations of fact supporting or tending to support those contained in the application.

"(c) The application may also contain—

"(1) a request that the search warrant be made executable at any hour of the day or night, upon the reasonable belief that (A) it cannot be executed during the hours of daylight, (B) the property sought is likely to be removed or destroyed if not seized forthwith, or (C) the property sought is not likely to be found except at certain times or in certain circumstances; and

"(2) a request that the search warrant authorize the executing officer to enter premises or vehicles to be searched without giving notice of his identity and purpose, upon reasonable grounds to believe that one of the conditions set forth in paragraph (1), (2), (3), or (5) of section 23–591(c) may exist at the time and place at which such warrant is to be executed.

Any request made pursuant to this subsection must be accompanied and supported by allegations of fact supporting such statement.

"§ 23–523. Time of execution of search warrants

"(a) A search warrant shall not be executed more than ten days after the date of issuance and shall be returned to the court after its execution or expiration in accordance with section 23–521(f)(7).

"(b) A search warrant may be executed on any day of the week and, in the absence of express authorization in the warrant pursuant to section 23–521(f)(5), shall be executed only during the hours of daylight.

"§ 23–524. Execution of search warrants

"(a) An officer executing a warrant directing a search of a dwelling house, other building, or a vehicle shall, except as provided in sections 23–521(f)(6) or 23–591(c), give, or make reasonable effort to give, notice of his identity and purpose to an occupant thereof before breaking and entering therein.

"(b) An officer executing a warrant directing a search of a person shall give, or make reasonable effort to give, notice of his identity and purpose to the person, and, if such person thereafter resists or refuses to permit the search, may use such force against the person or any other person aiding his resistance or refusal as is necessary to execute the warrant.

"(c)(1) An officer or agent executing a search warrant shall write and subscribe an inventory setting forth the time of the execution of the search warrant and the property seized under it.

"(2) If the search is of a person, a copy of the warrant and of the return shall be given to that person.

"(3) If the search is of a place, vehicle, or object, a copy of the warrant and of the return shall be given to the owner thereof if he is present, or if he is not, to an occupant, custodian, or other person present; or if no person is present, the officer shall post a copy of the warrant and of the return upon the premises, vehicle, or object searched.

"(d) A copy of the warrant shall be filed with the court whose judge or magistrate authorized its issuance on the next court day after its execution, together with a copy of the return.

"(e) An officer or agent executing a search warrant may seize any property discovered in the course of such execution which he reasonably believes to be subject to seizure pursuant to section 23–521(d), even if the property is not enumerated in the warrant or the application therefor, and no additional warrant shall be required to authorize such seizure, if the property is fully set forth in the return. Such seizure may include taking physical or other impressions or performing chemical, scientific, or other tests or experiments.

"(f) An officer or agent executing a search warrant may take photographs and measurements during the execution.

"(g) An officer executing a warrant directing a search of premises or a vehicle may search any person therein (1) to the extent reasonably necessary to protect himself or others from the use of any weapon which may be concealed upon the person, or (2) to the extent reasonably necessary to find property enumerated in the warrant which may be concealed upon the person.

"§ 23–525. Disposition of property

"An officer or agent who seizes property in the execution of a search warrant shall cause it to be safely kept for use as evidence. No property seized shall be released or destroyed except in accordance with law and upon order of a court or of the United States attorney or Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia or one of their assistants.

"SUBCHAPTER III—WIRE INTERCEPTION AND INTERCEPTION OF ORAL COMMUNICATIONS

"§ 23–541. Definitions

"As used in this subchapter—

"(1) the term 'wire communication' means any communication made in whole or in part through the use of facilities for the transmission of communications by the aid of wire, cable, or other like connection between the point of origin and the point of reception furnished or operated by any person engaged as a common carrier in providing or operating such facilities for the transmission of interstate or foreign communications;

"(2) the term 'oral communication' means any oral communication uttered by a person exhibiting an expectation that the communication is not subject to interception under circumstances justifying the expectation;

"(3) the term 'intercept' means the aural acquisition of the contents of any wire or oral communication through the use of any electronic, mechanical, or other device;

"(4) the term 'electronic, mechanical, or other device' means any device or apparatus which can be used to intercept a wire or oral communication other than—

"(A) any telephone or telegraph instrument, equipment, or facility, or any component thereof, (i) furnished to the subscriber or user by a communications common carrier in the ordinary course of its business and being used by the subscriber or user in the ordinary course of its business; or (ii) being used by a communications common carrier in the ordinary course of its business, or by an investigative or law enforcement officer in the ordinary course of his duties; or

"(B) a hearing aid or similar device being used to correct subnormal hearing to not better than normal;

"(5) the term 'investigative or law enforcement officer' means any officer of the United States or of the District of Columbia who is empowered by law to conduct investigations of or to make arrests for offenses enumerated in this subchapter, and any attorney authorized by law to prosecute or participate in the prosecution of such offenses;

"(6) the term 'contents', when used with respect to any wire or oral communication, includes any information concerning the identity of the parties to the communication or the existence, substance, purport, or meaning of that communication;

"(7) the term 'judge' means a judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, a judge of the District of Columbia, a judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, a judge of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, and a judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia;

"(8) the term 'judge of competent jurisdiction' means, in addition to the judges included in paragraph (7)—

"(A) a judge of a United States district court or a United States court of appeals not in the District of Columbia; and

"(B) a judge of any court of general criminal jurisdiction of a State who is authorized by a statute of that State to enter orders authorizing interceptions of wire or oral communications;

"(9) the term 'aggrieved person' means a person who was a party to any intercepted wire or oral communication or a person against whom the interception was directed; and

"(10) the term 'communication common carrier' has the same meaning which is given the term 'common carrier' by section 3(h) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 153(h)).

"§ 23-542. Authorization for interception of wire or oral communications

"(a) The United States attorney for the District of Columbia may authorize an application to a judge for, and the judge may grant, in conformity with section 2518, title 18, United States Code, and section 23-543 of this subchapter, an order authorizing or approving the interception of wire or oral communications by investigative and law enforcement officers when the interception may provide or has provided evidence of the commission of or a conspiracy to commit any of the following offenses:

"(1) Any of the offenses specified in the Act entitled 'An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia', approved March 3, 1901, and listed in the following table:

"Offense:	Specified in—
Abortion	section 809 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-201).
Arson	sections 820, 821 (D.C. Code, secs. 22-401, 22-402).
Blackmail	section 819 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-2305).
Bribery	section 861 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-701).
Burglary	section 823 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-1801).
Destruction of property of value in excess of $200.	section 848 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-403).
Gambling	sections 863, 866, 869e (D.C. Code, secs. 22-1501, 22-1505, 22-1513).
Grand larceny	section 826 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-2201).
Kidnaping	section 812 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-2101).
Manslaughter	section 802 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-2405).
Murder	sections 798, 800 (D.C. Code, secs. 22-2401, 22-2403).
Obstruction of justice.	section 862 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-703).
Receiving stolen property of value in excess of $100.	section 829 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-2205).
Robbery	section 810 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-2901).

"(2) Bribery as specified (A) in the second paragraph under the center heading 'General Expenses' in the first section of the Act of July 1, 1902 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-702), and (B) in the Act of February 26, 1936 (D.C. Code, sec. 22-704).

"(3) Extortion and threats as specified in sections 1501 and 1502 of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (D.C. Code, secs. 22-2306, 22-2307).

"(4) Offenses involving dealing in narcotic drugs, marihuana, and other dangerous drugs as specified in sections 2 and 16 of the Uniform Narcotic Drug Act (D.C. Code, secs. 33-402, 33-416) and section 203 of the Dangerous Drug Act for the District of Columbia (D.C. Code, sec. 33-702).

"§ 23-543. Procedure for interception of wire or oral communications

"(a) Each application for an order authorizing or approving the interception of a wire or oral communication shall be made in writing upon oath or affirmation to a judge and shall state the applicant's authority to make the application. Each application shall include—

"(1) the identity of the investigative or law enforcement officer making the application, and the officer authorizing the application;

"(2) a full and complete statement of the facts and circumstances relied upon by the applicant to justify his belief that an order should be issued, including (A) details as to the particular offense that has been, is being, or is about to be committed, (B) a particular description of the nature and location of the facilities from which or the place where the communication is to be intercepted, (C) a particular description of the type of communications sought to be intercepted, and (D) the identity of the person, if known, committing the offense and whose communications are to be intercepted;

"(3) a full and complete statement as to whether or not other investigative procedures have been tried and failed or why they reasonably appear to be unlikely to succeed if tried or to be too dangerous;

"(4) a statement of the period of time for which the interception is required to be maintained, and if the nature of the investigation is such that the authorization for interception should not automatically terminate when the described type of communication has been first obtained, a particular description of facts establishing probable cause to believe that additional communications of the same type will occur thereafter;

"(5) a full and complete statement of the facts concerning all previous applications, known to the individual authorizing and making the application, made to any judge for authorization to intercept, or for approval of interceptions of, wire or oral communications involving any of the same persons, facilities, or places specified in the application, and the action taken by the judge on each such application; and

"(6) where the application is for the extension of an order, a statement setting forth the results thus far obtained from the interception, or a reasonable explanation of the failure to obtain results.

"(b) The judge may require the applicant to furnish additional testimony or documentary evidence in support of the application.

"(c) Upon application the judge may enter an ex parte order, as requested or as modified, authorizing or approving interception of wire or oral communications within the District of Columbia, if the judge determines on the basis of the facts submitted by the applicant that—

"(1) there is probable cause for belief that an individual is committing, has committed, or is about to commit a particular offense enumerated in section 23-542;

"(2) there is probable cause for belief that particular communications concerning that offense will be obtained through the interception;

"(3) normal investigative procedures have been tried and have failed or reasonably appear to be unlikely to succeed if tried or to be too dangerous; and

"(4) there is probable cause for belief that the facilities from which, or the place where, the wire or oral communications are to be intercepted are being used, or are about to be used, in connection with the commission of the offense, or are leased to, listed in the name of, or commonly used by the individual referred to in paragraph (1).

"(d) Each order authorizing or approving the interception of any wire or oral communication shall specify—

"(1) the identity of the person, if known, whose communications are to be intercepted;

"(2) the nature and location of the communication facilities as to which, or the place where, authority to intercept is granted;

"(3) a particular description of the type of communication sought to be intercepted, and a statement of the particular offense to which it relates;

"(4) the identity of the agency authorized to intercept the communications, and of the person authorizing the application; and

"(5) the period of time during which the interception is authorized, including a statement as to whether or not the interception shall automatically terminate when the described communication has been first obtained.

"(e) No order entered under this section may authorize or approve the interception of any wire or oral communication for any period longer than is necessary to achieve the objective of the authorization, nor in any event longer than thirty days. Extensions of an order may be granted, but only upon application for an extension made in accordance with subsection (a) of this section and the court making the findings required by subsection (c) of this section. The period of extension shall be no longer than the authorizing judge deems necessary to achieve the purposes for which it was granted and in no event for longer than thirty days. Every order and extension thereof shall contain a provision that the authorization to intercept shall be executed as soon as practicable, shall be conducted in such a way as to minimize the interception of communications not otherwise subject to interception under this subchapter, and must terminate upon attainment of the authorized objective, or in any event in thirty days.

"(f) Whenever an order authorizing interception is entered pursuant to this subchapter, the order may require reports to be made to the judge who issued the order showing what progress has been made toward achievement of the authorized objective and the need for continued interception. Reports shall be made at such intervals as the judge may require.

"(g) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subchapter, any investigative or law enforcement officer, specially designated by the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, who reasonably determines that—

"(1) an emergency situation exists with respect to conspiratorial activities threatening the national security interest or to conspiratorial activities characteristic of organized crime that requires a wire or oral communication to be intercepted before an order authorizing the interception can with due diligence be obtained, and

"(2) there are grounds upon which an order could be entered under this subchapter to authorize interception, may intercept the wire or oral communication if an application for an order approving the interception is made in accordance with this section within forty-eight hours after the interception has occurred, or begins to occur. In the absence of an order, the interception shall immediately terminate when the communication sought is obtained or when the application for the order is denied, whichever is earlier. In the event the application for approval is denied, or in any other case where the interception is terminated without an order having been issued, the contents of any wire or oral communication intercepted shall be treated as having been obtained in violation of this subchapter, and an inventory shall be served as provided for in subsection (h)(4) of this section on the person named in the application.

"(h) (1) The contents of any wire or oral communication intercepted by any means authorized by this subchapter shall, if possible, be recorded on tape or wire or other comparable device. The recording of the contents of any wire or oral communication under this subchapter shall be done in such way as will protect the recording from editing or other alterations. Immediately upon the expiration of the period of the order, or extensions thereof, the recordings shall be made available to the judge issuing the order and sealed under his directions. Custody of the recordings shall be wherever the judge orders. They shall not be destroyed except upon an order of the issuing or denying judge and in any event shall be kept for ten years. Duplicate recordings may be made for use or disclosure pursuant to the provisions of subsections (1) and (2) of section 2517, title 18, United States Code, for investigations. The presence of the seal provided for by this subsection, or a satisfactory explanation for the absence thereof, shall be a prerequisite for the use or disclosure of the contents of any wire or oral communication or evidence derived therefrom under subsection (3) of section 2517 of title 18, United States Code.

"(2) Applications made and orders granted under this subchapter shall be sealed by the judge. Custody of the applications and orders shall be wherever the judge directs. The applications and orders shall be disclosed only upon a showing of good cause before a judge of competent jurisdiction and shall not be destroyed except on order of the issuing or denying judge, and in any event shall be kept for ten years.

"(3) Any violation of the provisions of subsection (h) may be punished as contempt of court.

"(4) Within a reasonable time but not later than ninety days after the filing of an application for an order of approval under subsection (g) which is denied, or the termination of the period of any order or extensions thereof, the issuing or denying judge shall cause to be served, on the persons named in the order or the application, and such other parties to intercepted communications as the judge may determine, in his discretion, are necessary in the interest of justice, an inventory which shall include notice of—

"(A) the fact of the entry of the order or the application;

"(B) the date of the entry and the period of authorized, approved, or disapproved interception, or the denial of the application; and

"(C) the fact that during the period wire or oral communications were or were not intercepted.

The judge, upon the filing of a motion, may in his discretion make available to the person or his counsel for inspection such portions of the intercepted communications, applications, and orders as the judge determines to be in the interest of justice. On an ex parte showing of good cause to a judge, the serving of the inventory required by this subsection may be postponed.

"(i) The contents of any intercepted wire or oral communication or evidence derived therefrom shall not be received in evidence or otherwise disclosed in any trial, hearing, or other proceeding in court unless each party, not less than ten days before the trial, hearing, or proceeding, has been furnished with a copy of the court order, and accompanying application, under which the interception was authorized or approved. This ten-day period may be waived by the judge if he finds that it was not possible to furnish the party with the above information ten days before the trial, hearing, or proceeding and that the party will not be prejudiced by the delay in receiving the information.

"(j) (1) Any aggrieved person in any trial, hearing, or proceeding in or before any court, department, officer, agency, regulatory body, or other authority of the United States or the District of Columbia, may move to suppress the contents of any intercepted wire or oral communication, or evidence derived therefrom, on the grounds that—

"(A) the communication was unlawfully intercepted;

"(B) the order of authorization or approval under which it was intercepted is insufficient on its face, or

"(C) the interception was not made in conformity with the order of authorization or approval.

The motion shall be made before the trial, hearing, or proceeding unless there was no opportunity to make the motion or the person was not aware of the grounds of the motion. If the motion is granted, the contents of the intercepted wire or oral communication, or evidence derived therefrom, shall be treated as having been obtained in violation of this subchapter. The judge, upon the filing of the motion by the aggrieved person, may in his discretion make available to the aggrieved person or his counsel for inspection such portions of the intercepted communication or evidence derived therefrom as the judge determines to be in the interests of justice.

"(2) In addition to any other right to appeal, the United States attorney shall have the right to appeal from an order granting a motion to suppress made under paragraph (1) of this subsection, or the denial of an application for an order of approval, if the United States attorney shall certify to the judge or other official granting such motion or denying the application that the appeal is not taken for purposes of delay. Appeal shall be taken within thirty days after the date the order was entered and shall be diligently prosecuted.

"§ 23–544. Procedure for approval of interception of wire or oral communications

"When an investigative or law enforcement officer while engaged in intercepting wire or oral communications in the manner authorized by section 23–543, intercepts wire or oral communications relating either to offenses other than those specified in the order of authorization or to offenses other than those offenses for which interception was made pursuant to section 23–543(g), he shall make an application to a judge as soon as practicable for approval for disclosure and use of the information intercepted, in accordance with section 2517 of title 18, United States Code.

"SUBCHAPTER IV—ARREST WARRANT AND SUMMONS

"§ 23–561. Issuance, form, and contents

"(a) (1) A judicial officer may issue a warrant for the arrest of any person upon a sworn complaint which states facts constituting an offense over which the judicial officer has jurisdiction for trial or preliminary examination, and establishing probable cause to believe that the person committed the offense. More than one warrant may issue on the same complaint.

"(2) Upon request of the prosecutor a summons shall issue instead of an arrest warrant. More than one summons may issue on the same complaint. If a person fails to appear in response to a summons, a warrant shall issue for his arrest.

"(b) (1) An arrest warrant shall be signed by the judicial officer and shall state or contain the name of the issuing court, the date of issuance of the warrant, a description of the offense charged, and the name of the person to be arrested or, if his name is unknown, any name or description by which he can be identified with reasonable certainty. It shall command that the person be arrested and brought before the issuing court or officer. If the complaint establishes reasonable grounds to believe that one of the conditions set out in paragraphs (1) through (5) of section 23–591(c) may exist at the time and place at which such warrant is to be executed, the warrant may contain an authorization that it be executed as provided in subsection (a) of section 23–591.

"(2) A summons shall be in the same form as an arrest warrant except that it shall summon the person named to appear before the issuing court or officer at a stated time and place.

"(c) An arrest warrant may be directed to a specific law enforcement officer, or to any law enforcement officer of a designated classification, or to any officer of the Metropolitan Police of the District of Columbia or other designated agency authorized to make arrests or execute process.

"(d) Each complaint shall be made in writing upon oath or affirmation. Except for good cause shown, no warrant shall be issued unless the complaint has been approved by an appropriate prosecutor.

"§ 23–562. Execution and return

"(a) (1) A warrant issued pursuant to this subchapter shall be executed by the arrest of the person named. The officer need not have the warrant in his possession at the time of the arrest, but upon request he shall show the warrant to the person as soon as possible. If the officer does not have the warrant in his possession at the time of the arrest, he shall inform the person of the offense charged and of the fact that a warrant has been issued.

"(2) A summons shall be served upon a person by delivering a copy to him personally, or by leaving it at his dwelling house or usual place of abode with some person of suitable age and discretion then residing therein, or by mailing it to the person's last known address.

"(b) (1) The officer executing a warrant shall make return thereof to the judicial officer before whom the person is brought for preliminary examination. At the request of the appropriate prosecutor any unexecuted and unexpired warrant shall be returned to the issuing court or judicial officer and shall be canceled.

"(2) On or before the return day the person to whom a summons was delivered for service shall make return thereof to the court or officer before whom the summons is returnable.

"(3) At the request of the appropriate prosecutor made at any time while the complaint is pending, a warrant returned unexecuted and not canceled or expired or a summons returned unserved or a duplicate thereof may be delivered by the judicial officer to the marshall or other authorized person for execution or service.

"(c) (1) A law enforcement officer within the District of Columbia making an arrest under a warrant issued pursuant to this subchapter, making an arrest without a warrant, or receiving a person arrested by a special policeman or other person pursuant to section 23–582, shall take the arrested person without unnecessary delay before the court or other judicial officer empowered to commit persons charged with the offense for which the arrest was made. This subsection, however, shall not be construed to conflict with or otherwise supersede section 3501 of title 18, United States Code. When a person arrested without a warrant is brought before a judicial officer, a complaint or information shall be filed forthwith.

"(2) Before taking an arrested person to a judicial officer, a law enforcement officer shall perform all recording, fingerprinting, photographing, and other preliminary police duties required in the particular case, and if such duties are performed with reasonable promptness, the period of time required therefor shall not constitute a delay within the meaning of this section.

"§ 23–563. Territorial and other limits

"(a) A warrant or summons for an offense punishable by imprisonment for more than one year issued by the Superior Court of the District of Columbia may be served at any place within the jurisdiction of the United States.

"(b) No warrant or summons issued by the Superior Court of the District of Columbia for an offense punishable by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by a fine only, or by such imprisonment and a fine, may be executed at any place more than twenty-five miles from the place where the court is held, or more than one year after the date of issuance.

"(c) A person arrested outside the District of Columbia on a warrant issued by the Superior Court of the District of Columbia shall be taken before a judge, commissioner, or magistrate, and held to answer in the Superior Court pursuant to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as if the warrant had been issued by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

"(d) When an application alleges that an act which would constitute a felony if committed by an adult has been committed by a child, and that the child may not with due diligence be found within the District of Columbia, a judicial officer may issue a warrant for the arrest of the child as if he were an adult. When the child is brought before the issuing court or officer pursuant to the warrant he shall be ordered transferred to the Family Division of the Superior Court pursuant to section 16–2302.

"SUBCHAPTER V—ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT

"§ 23–581. Arrests without warrant by law enforcement officers

"(a)(1) A law enforcement officer may arrest, without a warrant having previously been issued therefor—

"(A) a person whom he has probable cause to believe has committed or is committing a felony;

"(B) a person whom he has probable cause to believe has committed or is committing an offense in his presence;

"(C) a person whom he has probable cause to believe has committed or is about to commit any offense listed in paragraph (2) and, unless immediately arrested, may not be apprehended, may cause injury to others, or may tamper with, dispose of, or destroy evidence.

"(2) The offenses referred to in subparagraph (C) of paragraph (1) are the following:

"(A) The following offenses specified in the Act entitled 'An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia', approved March 3, 1901, and listed in the following table:

"Offense:	Specified in—
Assault	section 806 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–504).
Petit larceny	section 827 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2202).
Receiving stolen goods.	section 829 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2205).
Unlawful entry	section 824 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–3102).

"(B) Attempts to commit the following offenses specified in such Act and listed in the following table:

"Offense:
Burglary	section 823 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–1801).
Grand larceny	section 826 (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2201).
Unauthorized use of vehicles.	section 826b (D.C. Code, sec. 22–2204).

"(b) A law enforcement officer may, even if his jurisdiction does not extend beyond the District of Columbia, continue beyond the District, if necessary, a pursuit commenced within the District of a person who has committed an offense or whom he has probable cause to believe has committed or is committing a felony, and may arrest that person in any State the laws of which contain provisions equivalent to those of section 23–901.

"§ 23–582. Arrests without warrant by other persons

"(a) A special policeman shall have the same powers as a law enforcement officer to arrest without warrant for offenses committed within premises to which his jurisdiction extends, and may arrest outside the premises on fresh pursuit for offenses committed on the premises.

"(b) A private person may arrest another—

"(1) whom he has probable cause to believe is committing in his presence—

"(A) a felony, or

"(B) an offense enumerated in section 23–581(a)(3); or

"(2) in aid of a law enforcement officer or special policeman, or other person authorized by law to make an arrest.

"(c) Any person making an arrest pursuant to this section shall deliver the person arrested to a law enforcement officer without unreasonable delay.

"SUBCHAPTER VI—AUTHORITY TO BREAK AND ENTER UNDER CERTAIN CONDITIONS

"§ 23–591. Authority to break and enter under certain conditions

"(a) Any officer authorized by law to make arrests or to execute search warrants, or any person aiding such an officer, may break and enter any premises, any outer or inner door or window of a dwelling house or other building, or any part thereof, any vehicle, or anything within such dwelling house, building, or vehicle, or otherwise enter to execute search or arrest warrants, to make an arrest where authorized by law without a warrant, or where necessary to liberate himself or a person aiding him in the execution of such warrant or in making such arrest.

"(b) Breaking and entry shall not be made until after such officer or person makes an announcement of his identity and purpose and the officer reasonably believes that admittance to the dwelling house, building, or vehicle is being denied or unreasonably delayed.

"(c) An announcement of identity and purpose shall not be required prior to such breaking and entry if the warrant expressly authorizes entry without notice, or where such officer or person reasonably believes—

"(1) his identity or purpose is already known to any person in the premises;

"(2) such notice is likely to result in the evidence subject to seizure being easily and quickly destroyed, disposed of, or concealed;

"(3) such notice is likely to endanger the life or safety of the executing officer or another person;

"(4) such notice is likely to enable the party to be arrested to escape; or

"(5) such notice would otherwise be a useless gesture.

"(d) Whoever, after notice is given under subsection (b) or after entry where such notice is unnecessary under subsection (c), destroys, conceals, disposes of, or attempts to destroy, conceal, or dispose of, or otherwise prevents or attempts to prevent the seizure of evidence subject to seizure shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.

"(e) As used in this section, and in section 23–524(a), the terms 'break and enter' and 'breaking and entering' include any use of physical force or violence or other unauthorized entry but does not include entry obtained by trick or strategem.

"(f) With regard to (1) the execution of a warrant directing a search of a person under section 23–524(b), (2) the execution of a warrant directing the arrest of a person under subchapter IV of this chapter, or (3) an arrest authorized by law without a warrant under subchapter V of this chapter, the notice requirements of this section are applicable only where it is necessary to enter a dwelling house, building, or vehicle to effect such a search or arrest.

"Chapter 7.—EXTRADITION AND FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE

"Sec.

"23–701. Warrants for the arrest of fugitives from justice.
"23–702. Procedure on arrest of fugitives.
"23–703. Failure to appear.
"23–704. Extradition.
"23–705. Removal proceedings and returns to foreign countries not affected.
"23–706. Confinement.
"23–707. Definitions.

"§ 23–701. Warrants for the arrest of fugitives from justice

"Whenever any person who is (1) within the District of Columbia, (2) charged with any offense committed in any State, and (3) liable by the Constitution and laws of the United States to be delivered over upon the demand of the Governor of that State, any judge of the Superior Court may, upon complaint on oath or affirmation of any credible witness, setting forth the offense, that the person is a fugitive from justice, and such other matters as are necessary to bring the case within the provisions of law, issue a warrant to bring the person so charged before the Superior Court, to answer the complaint.

"(a) Any person arrested upon a warrant issued pursuant to section 23–701, or arrested within the District of Columbia as a fugitive from justice without a warrant having been issued, shall be taken before the Criminal Division of the Superior Court for preliminary examination on a complaint charging him as a fugitive.

"(b) If, upon the examination of the person charged, it shall appear to the court that there is reasonable cause to believe that the complaint is true and that the person may be lawfully demanded of the chief judge, the person shall be detained or released according to law, in like manner as if the offense had been committed in the District of Columbia, to appear before the court at a future date, allowing thirty days to obtain a requisition from the Governor of the State from which the person is a fugitive. The complaint of fugitivity from another jurisdiction shall create a presumption that the person is unlikely to appear if released, which may be overcome only by clear and convincing proof.

"(c) If the person so released or detained shall appear before the court upon the day ordered, he shall be discharged, unless he shall be demanded by requisition pursuant to subsection (g) of this section or section 23–704, or unless the court shall find cause to detain or to release him as provided by subsection (b) until a later day; but regardless of whether the person shall be detained or released as provided in subsection (b) or discharged, his delivery to any person authorized by the warrant of the Governor shall be a discharge of any bond or obligation.

"(d) The Chief of Police of the Metropolitan Police Department shall give notice to the police official or sheriff of the city or county from which the person is a fugitive that the person is so held in the District of Columbia.

"(e) A person detained as provided by this section shall not be detained in jail longer than to allow a reasonable time for the person receiving the notice required by subsection (d) to apply for and obtain a proper requisition for the person detained according to the circumstances of the case and the distance of the place where the offense is alleged to have been committed.

"(f) (1) At any time prior to the filing of a requisition, a person arrested pursuant to this section may in open court waive further proceedings pursuant to this chapter.

"(2) Following waiver, a judge of the Superior Court may, in his discretion, if the United States attorney consents, release the person upon such conditions as the judge shall deem necessary to insure his appearance before the proper official in the State from which he is a fugitive, and shall otherwise order his return to the jurisdiction of that State in the custody of a proper official.

"(3) Following waiver, a person not released pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection shall be ordered to return to the jurisdiction from which he is a fugitive in the custody of a proper official, and may be detained to await return.

"(4) A person detained pursuant to paragraph (3) for more than three days (not including Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays) shall be returned to the court and shall thereupon be released pursuant to paragraph (2), unless the court shall find good reason to extend his detention for an additional three days to obtain the attendance of a proper official of the demanding jurisdiction.

"(g) If a person has not waived further proceedings pursuant to subsection (f), and a requistion from the Governor of the jurisdiction from which the person is a fugitive is presented to the court, the court shall order the requisition to be filed and referred to the chief judge for extradition proceedings pursuant to section 23–704, and shall order the person committed pending those proceedings.

"§ 23–703. Failure to appear

"Any person released pursuant to section 23–702 who fails to appear as required shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

"§ 23–704. Extradition

"(a) In all cases where the laws of the United States provide that fugitives from justice shall be delivered up, the chief judge of the Superior Court shall cause to be apprehended and delivered up fugitives from justice who shall be found within the District of Columbia, in the same manner and under the same regulations as the executive authority of a State is required to do by the provisions of chapter 209 of title 18, United States Code, and all executive and judicial officers are required to obey the lawful precepts or other process issued for that purpose, and to aid and assist in that delivery.

"(b) The chief judge of the Superior Court may also surrender, on demand of the Governor of any State, any person in the District of Columbia charged in that State in the manner provided in subsection (a) of this section with committing an act in the District of Columbia, or in another State, intentionally resulting in a crime in the State whose executive authority is making the demand, even though the accused was not in that State at the time of the commission of the crime, and has not fled therefrom.

"(c) No person apprehended in accordance with the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall be delivered over to the agent whom the executive authority demanding him shall have appointed to receive him unless he shall first be taken before the chief judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia who shall inform him of the demand made for his surrender, and of the crime with which he is charged, and that he has the right to demand and procure legal counsel.

"(d) If the person or his counsel shall state that he desires to test the legality of the person's arrest, the chief judge shall hold a hearing to determine whether the person shall be delivered over as demanded. At the hearing, the person shall have the same rights to challenge his detention and extradition as if the hearing were upon a writ of habeas corpus.

"(e) If the chief judge shall order the person delivered over, he may appeal, within twenty-four hours, from that order to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals if the chief judge who rendered the order, or a judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, issues a certificate of probable cause. The appeal shall be expedited by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. An application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person who is authorized to demand a hearing pursuant to this subsection shall not be entertained if it appears that the applicant has failed to demand such a hearing or that the chief judge, after hearing, has ordered him delivered over, unless it also appears that the remedy by hearing is inadequate or ineffective to test the legality of his detention.

"(f) Nothing contained in this subsection shall prevent a person from waiving his right to appear before the chief judge of the Superior Court and voluntarily returning in custody of a proper official to the jurisdiction of the State which is demanding him.

"(g) No person demanded by the Governor of a State pursuant to this section shall be released upon bond or other obligation except pursuant to an order of a court of the demanding state.

"(h) Any associate judge designated by the chief judge or acting chief judge shall have the same power to act pursuant to this section as the chief judge.

"§ 23–705. Removal proceedings and returns to foreign countries not affected

"Nothing contained in this chapter shall repeal, modify, or in any way effect existing law concerning the procedure for the return of any person apprehended in the District of Columbia to a Federal judicial district to answer a Federal charge, or repeal, modify, or affect existing law or treaty concerning the return to a foreign country of a person apprehended or detained in the District of Columbia as a fugitive from a foreign country.

"§ 23–706. Confinement

"(a) The agent of the demanding State to whom the prisoner may have been delivered in accordance with the provisions of section 23–704, may, when necessary, confine the prisoner in a facility of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections, and the Department of Corrections must receive and safely keep the prisoner for such reasonable time as will enable the officer or person having charge of him to proceed on his route, such officer or person being chargeable with the expense of keeping.

"(b) The officer or agent of a demanding State to whom a prisoner may have been delivered following extradition proceedings in another State, or to whom a prisoner may have been delivered after waiving extradition in the other State, and who is passing through the District of Columbia with a prisoner for the purpose of immediately returning the prisoner to the demanding State, may, when necessary, confine the prisoner in a facility of the Department of Corrections. The Department of Corrections must receive and safely keep the prisoner for such reasonable time as will enable the officer or agent to proceed on his route, such officer or agent being chargeable with the expense of keeping. That officer or agent shall produce and show to the Department of Corrections satisfactory written evidence of the fact that he is actually transporting the prisoner to the demanding State after a requisition by the executive authority of the demanding State. The prisoner shall not be entitled to demand a new requisition while in the District of Columbia.

"§ 23–707. Definitions

"For purposes of this chapter—

"(1) the term 'State' includes any territory or possession of the United States; and

"(2) the term 'Governor' means the executive authority of a State.

"Chapter 9.—FRESH PURSUIT

"Sec.

"23–901. Arrests in the District of Columbia by officers of other States.
"23–902. Hearing; commitment; discharge.
"23–903. 'Fresh pursuit' defined.

"§ 23–901. Arrests in the District of Columbia by officers of other States

"Any member of a duly organized peace unit of any State (or county or municipality thereof) of the United States who enters the District of Columbia in fresh pursuit and continues within the District of Columbia in fresh pursuit of a person in order to arrest him on the ground that he is believed to have committed a felony in such State shall have the same authority to arrest and hold that person in custody as has any member of any duly organized peace unit of the District of Columbia to arrest and hold in custody a person on the ground that he is believed to have committed a felony in the District of Columbia. This section shall not be construed so as to make unlawful any arrest in the District of Columbia which would otherwise be lawful.

"§ 23–902. Hearing; commitment; discharge

"If an arrest is made in the District of Columbia by an officer of another State in accordance with the provisions of section 23–901, he shall without unnecessary delay take the person arrested before a judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, who shall conduct a hearing for the purpose of determining the lawfulness of the arrest. If the judge determines that the arrest was lawful, he shall order the release or detention of the person arrested, pursuant to section 23–702, to await for a reasonable time, a requisition from the Governor of the State demanding the extradition of the person arrested. If the judge determines that the arrest was unlawful he shall order the person discharged.

"§ 23–903. 'Fresh pursuit' defined

"For purposes of this chapter, the term 'fresh pursuit' shall include fresh pursuit as defined by the common law, also the pursuit of a person who has committed a felony or one whom the pursuing officer has reasonable grounds to believe has committed a felony. It shall also include the pursuit of a person whom the pursuing officer has reasonable grounds to believe has committed a felony, although no felony has actually been committed, if there is reasonable ground for believing that a felony has been committed. Such term shall not necessarily imply an instant pursuit, but pursuit without unreasonable delay.

"§ 23-1101. Definitions

"For purposes of this chapter—

"(1) the term 'bonding business' means the business of becoming surety for compensation upon bonds in criminal cases in the District of Columbia; and

"(2) the term 'bondsman' means any person or corporation engaged in the bonding business either as a principal or as an agent, clerk, or representative of another engaged in such business.

"§ 23-1102. Bonding business impressed with public interest

"The bonding business is impressed with a public interest.

"§ 23-1103. Procuring business through official or attorney for a consideration prohibited

"It shall be unlawful for any bondsman, either directly or indirectly, to give, donate, lend, contribute, or to promise to give, donate, lend, or contribute any money, property, entertainment, or other thing of value whatsoever to any attorney at law, police officer, deputy United States marshal, jailer, probation officer, clerk, or other attaché of a criminal court, or public official of any character, for procuring or assisting in procuring any person to employ the bondsman to execute as surety any bond for compensation in any criminal case in the District of Columbia. It shall be unlawful for any attorney at law, police officer, deputy United States marshal, jailer, probation officer, clerk, bailiff, or other attaché of a criminal court, or public official of any character, to accept or receive from a bondsman any money, property, entertainment, or other thing of value whatsoever for procuring or assisting in procuring a person to employ a bondsman to execute as surety any bond for compensation in a criminal case in the District of Columbia.

"§ 23-1104. Attorneys procuring employment through official or bondsman for a consideration prohibited

"It shall be unlawful for any attorney at law, either directly or indirectly, to give, loan, donate, contribute, or to promise to give, loan, donate, or contribute any money, property, entertainment, or other thing of value whatsoever to, or to split or to divide any fee or commission with, any bondsman, police officer, deputy United States marshal, probation officer, bailiff, clerk, or other attaché of any criminal court for causing or procuring or assisting in causing or procuring a person to employ the attorney to represent him in a criminal case in the District of Columbia.

"§ 23-1105. Receiving other than regular fee for bonding prohibited; bondsmen prohibited from endeavoring to secure dismissal or settlement

"It shall be lawful to charge for executing a bond in a criminal case in the District of Columbia, but it shall be unlawful for a bondsman, either directly or indirectly, to charge, accept, or receive a sum of money, or other thing of value, other than the regular fee for bonding, from a person for whom he has executed bond, for any other service whatever performed in connection with any indictment, information, or charge upon which the person is bailed or held in the District of Columbia. It also shall be unlawful for any bondsman to settle, or attempt to settle, or to procure or attempt to procure the dismissal of any indictment, information, or charge against any person in custody or held upon bond in the District of Columbia, with a court, or with the prosecuting attorney in a court in the District of Columbia.

"§ 23-1106. Posting names of authorized bondsmen; list to be furnished prisoners; prisoners may communicate with bondsmen; record to be kept by police

"A typewritten or printed list alphabetically arranged of all persons engaged under the authority of any of the courts of criminal jurisdiction in the District of Columbia in the business of becoming surety upon bonds for compensation in criminal cases shall be posted in a conspicuous place in each police precinct, jail, prisoners dock, house of detention, and every other place in the District of Columbia in which persons in custody of the law are detained, and one or more copies thereof kept on hand; and when a person who is detained in custody in a place of detention shall request a person in charge thereof to furnish him the name of a bondsman, or to put him in communication with a bondsman, the list shall be furnished to the person in charge of the place of detention within a reasonable time to put the person detained in communication with the bondsman selected, and the person in charge of the place of detention shall contemporaneously with that transaction make in the blotter or book of record kept in the place of detention, a record showing the name of the person requesting the bondsman, the offense with which the person is charged, the time at which the request was made, the bondsman requested, and the person by whom the bondsman was called, and preserve that as a permanent record in the book or blotter in which entered.

"§ 23-1107. Bondsmen prohibited from entering place of detention unless requested by prisoner; record of visit to be kept

"It shall be unlawful for a bondsman to enter a police precinct, jail, prisoner's dock, house of detention, or other place where persons in the custody of the law are detained in the District of Columbia for the purpose of obtaining employment as a bondsman, without having been previously called by a person detained or by some relative or other authorized person acting for or on behalf of the person detained. Whenever a bondsman enters a police precinct, jail, prisoner's dock, house of detention, or other place where persons in the custody of the law are detained in the District of Columbia, he shall forthwith give to the person in charge thereof his mission there and the name of the person calling him and requesting him to come to such place. That information shall be recorded by the person in charge of the place of detention and preserved as a public record, and the failure of the bondsman to give that information, or the failure of the person in charge of the place of detention to make and preserve a record of that information, shall constitute a violation of this chapter.

"§ 23-1108. Qualifications of bondsmen; rules to be prescribed by courts; list of agents to be furnished; renewal of authority to act; detailed records to be kept; penalties and disqualifications

"(a) It shall be the duty of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia and the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, each, to provide, under reasonable rules and regulations, the qualifications of persons and corporations applying for authority to engage in the bonding business in criminal cases in the District of Columbia, and the terms and conditions upon which the business shall be carried on, and no person or corporation shall, either as principal, or as agent, clerk, or representative of another, engage in the bonding business in either court until he shall, by order of the court, be authorized to do so. The courts, in making these rules and regulations, and in granting authority to persons to engage in the bonding business, shall take into consideration both the financial responsibility and the moral qualities of the person so applying, and no person shall be permitted to engage, either as principal or agent, in the bonding business, who has ever been convicted of an offense involving moral turpitude, or who is not known to be a person of good moral character. It shall be the duty of each of the courts to require every person qualifying to engage in the bonding business as principal to file with the court a list showing the name, age, and residence of each person employed by the bondsman as agent, clerk, or representative in the bonding business, and require an affidavit from each of these persons stating that he will abide by the terms and provisions of this chapter. Each of the courts shall require the authority of each of those persons to be renewed from time to time at such periods as the court may by rule provide, and before the authority shall be renewed the court shall require from each of those persons an affidavit that since his previous qualification to engage in the bonding business he has abided by the provisions of this chapter, and any person swearing falsely in any of the affidavits shall be guilty of perjury.

"(b) Each court shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to insure that whenever a bondsman becomes surety for compensation upon a bond in a criminal case before the court, the bondsman shall make a record, which shall be accurate to the best of the maker's knowledge and belief and shall thereafter be open for inspection by the court or its designed representative, and by the designated representative of other law enforcement agencies of the District of Columbia, of the following matters:

"(1) the full name and address of the person for whom the bond is executed (referred to in this subsection as the 'defendant') and the full name and address of his employer, if any;

"(2) the offense with which the defendant is charged;

"(3) the name of the court or officer authorizing the defendant's admission to bail;

"(4) the amount of the bond;

"(5) the name of the person who called the bondsman, if other than the defendant;

"(6) the amount of the bondsman's charge for executing the bond;

"(7) the full name and address of the person to whom the bondsman presented his bill for the charge;

"(8) the full name and address of the person paying the charge; and

"(9) the manner of payment of the charge.

Whoever violates any rule or regulation prescribed under this subsection shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, and if he is a bondsman shall be disqualified from thereafter engaging in any manner in the bonding business for such period of time as the trial judge shall order.

"§ 23-1109. Giving advance information of proposed raid prohibited

"It shall be unlawful for any police officer or other public official, in advance of any raid by police or other peace officers or public officials or the execution of any search warrant or warrant of arrest, to give or furnish, either directly or indirectly, any information concerning the proposed raid or arrest to any person engaged in any manner in the bonding business, or to any attorney at law; but it shall not be unlawful for any police or other peace officer, in conducting any raid or in executing any search warrant or warrant of arrest, to communicate to any attorney at law or person engaged in the bonding business, any fact necessary to enable the officer to obtain from the attorney at law or person engaged in the bonding business information necessary to enable the officer to carry out the raid or execute the process.

"§ 23–1110. Designation of official to take bail or collateral when court is not in session

"(a) The judges of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia shall have the authority to appoint some official of the Metropolitan Police Department to act as a clerk of the court with authority to take bail or collateral from persons charged with offenses triable in the Superior Court at all times when the court is not open and its clerks accessible. The official so appointed shall have the same authority at those times with reference to taking bonds or collateral as the clerk of the Municipal Court had on March 3, 1933; shall receive no compensation for those services other than his regular salary; shall be subject to the orders and rules of the Superior Court in discharge of his duties, and may be removed as the clerk at any time by the judges of the court. The United States District Court for the District of Columbia shall have power to authorize the official appointed by the Superior Court to take bond of persons arrested upon writs and process from that court in criminal cases between 4 o'clock postmeridian and 9 o'clock antemeridian and upon Sundays and holidays and shall have power at any time to revoke the authority granted by it.

"(b) (1) An officer or member of the Metropolitan Police Department who arrests without a warrant a person for committing a misdemeanor may, instead of taking him into custody, issue a citation requiring the person to appear before an official of the Metropolitan Police Department designated under subsection (a) of this section to act as a clerk of the Superior Court.

"(2) Whenever a person is arrested without a warrant for committing a misdemeanor and is booked and processed pursuant to law, an official of the Metropolitan Police Department designated under subsection (a) of this section to act as a clerk of the Superior Court may issue a citation to him for an appearance in court or at some other designated place, and release him from custody.

"(3) No citation may be issued under paragraph (1) or (2) unless the person authorized to issue the citation has reason to believe that the arrested person will not cause injury to persons or damage to property and that he will make an appearance in answer to the citation.

"(4) Whoever willfully fails to appear as required in a citation, shall be fined not more than the maximum provided for the misdemeanor for which such citation was issued or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both. Prosecution under this paragraph shall be by the prosecuting officer responsible for prosecuting the offense for which the citation is issued.

"§ 23–1111. Penalties

"Any person violating any provision of this chapter shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $100, or imprisoned for not less than ten nor more than sixty days, or both, where no other penalty is provided by this chapter; and if the person so convicted is (1) a police officer or other public official, he shall upon recommendation of the trial judge also be forthwith dismissed from office, (2) a bondsman, he shall be disqualified from thereafter engaging in any manner in the bonding business for such a period of time as the trial judge shall order, or (3) an attorney at law, he shall be subject to suspension or disbarment as attorney at law.

"§ 23–1112. Enforcement

"It shall be the duty of the Superior Court and of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia to see that this chapter is enforced, and upon the impaneling of each grand jury in the District of Columbia it shall be the duty of the judge impaneling such jury to charge it to investigate the manner in which this chapter is enforced and all violations thereof in connection with the matter under investigation by such jury.

"§ 23–1301. District of Columbia Bail Agency

"The District of Columbia Bail Agency (hereafter in this subchapter referred to as the 'agency') shall continue in the District of Columbia and shall secure pertinent data and provide for any judicial officer in the District of Columbia or any officer or member of the Metropolitan Police Department issuing citations, reports containing verified information concerning any individual with respect to whom a bail or citation determination is to be made.

"§ 23–1302. Definitions

"As used in this chapter—

"(1) the term 'judicial officer' means, unless otherwise indicated, the Supreme Court of the United States, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, United States District for the District of Columbia, the Superior Court of the District of Columbia or any justice or judge of those courts or a United States commissioner or magistrate; and

"(2) the term 'bail determination' means any order by a judicial officer respecting the terms and conditions of detention or release (including any order setting the amount of bail bond or any other kind of security) made to assure the appearance in court of—

"(A) any person arrested in the District of Columbia, or

"(B) any material witness in any criminal proceeding in a court referred to in paragraph (1).

"§ 23–1303. Interviews with detainees; investigations and reports; information as confidential; consideration and use of reports in making bail determinations

"(a) The agency shall, except when impracticable, interview any person detained pursuant to law or charged with an offense in the District of Columbia who is to appear before a judicial officer or whose case arose in or is before any court named in section 23–1302(1). The interview, when requested by a judicial officer, shall also be undertaken with respect to any person charged with intoxication or a traffic violation. The agency shall seek independent verification of information obtained during the interview, shall secure any such person's prior criminal record which shall be made available by the Metropolitan Police Department, and shall prepare a written report of the information for submission to the appropriate judicial officer. The report to the judicial officer shall, where appropriate, include a recommendation as to whether such person should be released or detained under any of the conditions specified in subchapter II of this chapter. If the agency does not make a recommendation, it shall submit a report without recommendation. The agency shall provide copies of its report and recommendations (if any) to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the Corporation Counsel of the District of Columbia (if pertinent), and to counsel for the person concerning whom the report is made. The report shall include but not be limited to information concerning the person accused, his family, his community ties, residence, employment, and prior criminal record (if any), and may include such additional verified information as may become available to the agency.

"(b) With respect to persons seeking review under subchapter II of this chapter of their detention or conditions of release, the agency shall review its report, seek and verify such new information as may be necessary, and modify or supplement its report to the extent appropriate.

"(c) The agency when requested by any appellate court or a judge or justice thereof, or by any other judicial officer, shall furnish a report as provided in subsection (a) of this section respecting any person whose case is pending before any such appellate court or judicial officer or in whose behalf an application for a bail determination shall have been submitted.

"(d) Any information contained in the agency's files, presented in its report, or divulged during the course of any hearing shall not be admissible on the issue of guilt in any judicial proceeding, but such information may be used in proceedings under sections 23–1327, 23–1328, and 23–1329, in perjury proceedings, and for the purposes of impeachment in any subsequent proceeding.

"(e) The agency, when requested by a member or officer of the Metropolitan Police Department acting pursuant to court rules governing the issuance of citations in the District of Columbia, shall furnish to such member or officer a report as provided in subsection (a).

"(f) The preparation and the submission by the agency of its report as provided in this section shall be accomplished at the earliest practicable opportunity,

"(g) A judicial officer in making a bail determination shall consider the agency's report and its accompanying recommendation, if any. The judicial officer may order such detention or may impose such terms and set such conditions upon release, including requiring the execution of a bail bond with sufficient solvent sureties as shall appear warranted by the facts, except that such judicial officer may not order any detention or establish any terms or conditions for release not otherwise authorized by law.

"(h) The agency shall—

"(1) supervise all persons released on nonsurety release, including release on personal recognizance, personal bond, nonfinancial conditions, or cash deposit or percentage deposit with the registry of the court;

"(2) make reasonable effort to give notice of each required court appearance to each person released by the court;

"(3) serve as coordinator for other agencies and organizations which serve or may be eligible to serve as custodians for persons released under supervision and advise the judicial officer as to the eligibility, advisability, and capacity of such agencies and organizations;

"(4) assist persons released pursuant to subchapter II of this chapter in securing employment or necessary medical or social services;

"(5) inform the judicial officer and the United States attorney for the District of Columbia of any failure to comply with pretrial release conditions or the arrest of persons released under its supervision and recommend modifications of release conditions when appropriate;

"(6) prepare, in cooperation with the United States marshal for the District of Columbia and the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, such pretrial detention reports as are required by Rule 46 (h) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; and

"(7) perform such other pretrial functions as the executive committee may, from time to time, assign.

"§ 23–1304. Executive committee; composition; appointment and qualifications of Director

"(a) The agency shall function under authority of and be responsible to an executive committee of five members of which three shall constitute a quorum. The executive committee shall be composed of the respective chief judges of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, the Superior Court, or if circumstances may require, the designee of any such chief judge, and a fifth member who shall be selected by the chief judges.

"(b) The executive committee shall appoint a Director of the agency who shall be a member of the bar of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

"§ 23–1305. Duties of Directors; compensation; tenure

"The Director of the agency shall be responsible for the supervision and execution of the duties of the agency. The Director shall receive such compensation as may be set by the executive committee but not in excess of the compensation authorized for GS–16 of the General Schedule contained in section 5332 of title 5, United States Code. The Director shall hold office at the pleasure of the executive committee.

"§ 23–1306. Chief assistant and other agency personnel; compensation

"The Director, subject to the approval of the executive committee, shall employ a chief assistant and such assisting and clerical staff and may make assignments of such agency personnel as may be necessary properly to conduct the business of the agency. The staff of the agency, other than clerical, shall be drawn from law students, graduate students, or such other available sources as may be approved by the executive committee. The chief assistant to the Director shall receive compensation as may be set by the executive committee, but in an amount not in excess of the amount authorized for GS–14 of the General Schedule contained in section 5332 of title 5 United States Code, and shall hold office at the pleasure of the executive committee. All other employees of the agency shall receive compensation, as set by the executive committee, which shall be comparable to levels of compensation established in such chapter 53. From time to time, the Director, subject to the approval of the executive committee, may set merit and longevity salary increases.

"§ 23–1307. Annual reports to executive committee, Congress, and Commissioner

"The Director shall on June 15 of each year submit to the executive committee a report as to the agency's administration of its responsibilities for the previous period of June 1 through May 31, a copy of which report will be transmitted by the executive committee to the Congress of the United States, and to the Commissioner of the District of Columbia. The Director shall include in his report, to be prepared as directed by the Commissioner of the District of Columbia, a statement of financial condition, revenues, and expenses for the past June 1 through May 31 period.

"§ 23–1308. Budget estimates

"Budget estimates for the agency shall be prepared by the Director and shall be subject to the approval of the executive committee.

"SUBCHAPTER II—RELEASE AND PRETRIAL DETENTION

"§ 23–1321. Release in noncapital cases prior to trial

"(a) Any person charged with an offense, other than an offense punishable by death, shall, at his appearance before a judicial officer, be ordered released pending trial on his personal recognizance or upon the execution of an unsecured appearance bond in an amount specified by the judicial officer, unless the officer determines, in the exercise of his discretion, that such a release will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or the safety of any other person or the community. When such a determination is made, the judicial officer shall, either in lieu of or in addition to the above methods of release, impose the first of the following conditions of release which will reasonably assure the appearance of the person for trial or the safety of any other person or the community, or, if no single condition gives that assurance, any combination of the following conditions:

"(1) Place the person in the custody of a designated person or organization agreeing to supervise him.

"(2) Place restrictions on the travel, association, or place of abode of the person during the period of release.

"(3) Require the execution of an appearance bond in a specified amount and the deposit in the registry of the court, in cash or other security as directed, of a sum not to exceed 10 per centum of the amount of the bond, such deposit to be returned upon the performance of the conditions of release.

"(4) Require the execution of a bail bond with sufficient solvent sureties, or the deposit of cash in lieu thereof.

"(5) Impose any other condition, including a condition requiring that the person return to custody after specified hours of release for employment or other limited purposes.

No financial condition may be imposed to assure the safety of any other person or the community.

"(b) In determining which conditions of release, if any, will reasonably assure the appearance of a person as required and the safety of any other person or the community, the judicial officer shall, on the basis of available information, take into account such matters as the nature and circumstances of the offense charged, the weight of the evidence against such person, his family ties, employment, financial resources, character and mental conditions, past conduct, length of residence in the community, record of convictions, and any record of appearance at court proceedings or of flight to avoid prosecution or failure to appear at court proceedings.

"(c) A judicial officer authorizing the release of a person under this section shall issue an appropriate order containing a statement of the conditions imposed, if any, shall inform such person of the penalties applicable to violations of the conditions of his release, shall advise him that a warrant for his arrest will be issued immediately upon any such violation, and shall warn such person of the penalties provided in section 23–1328.

"(d) A person for whom conditions of release are imposed and who, after twenty-four hours from the time of the release hearing, continues to be detained as a result of his inability to meet the conditions of release, shall, upon application, be entitled to have the conditions reviewed by the judicial officer who imposed them. Unless the conditions of release are amended and the person is thereupon released, the judicial officer shall set forth in writing the reasons for requiring the conditions imposed. A person who is ordered released on a condition which requires that he return to custody after specified hours shall, upon application, be entitled to a review by the judicial officer who imposed the condition. Unless the requirement is removed and the person is thereupon released on another condition, the judicial officer shall set forth in writing the reasons for continuing the requirement. In the event that the judicial officer who imposed conditions of release is not available, any other judicial officer may review such conditions.

"(e) A judicial officer ordering the release of a person on any condition specified in this section may at any time amend his order to impose additional or different conditions of release, except that if the imposition of such additional or different conditions results in the detention of the person as a result of his inability to meet such conditions or in the release of the person on a condition requiring him to return to custody after specified hours, the provisions of subsection (d) shall apply.

"(f) Information stated in, or offered in connection with, any order entered pursuant to this section need not conform to the rules pertaining to the admissibility of evidence in a court of law.

"(g) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prevent the disposition of any case or class of cases by forfeiture of collateral security where such disposition is authorized by the court.

"(h) The following shall be applicable to any person detained pursuant to this subchapter:

"(1) The person shall be confined, to the extent practicable, in facilities separate from convicted persons awaiting or serving sentences or being held in custody pending appeal.

"(2) The person shall be afforded reasonable opportunity for private consultation with counsel and, for good cause shown, shall be released upon order of the judicial officer in the custody of the United States marshal or other appropriate person for limited periods of time to perpare defenses or for other proper reasons.

"§ 23–1322. Detention prior to trial.

"(a) Whenever a judicial officer determines that no condition or combination of conditions of release will reasonably assure the safety of any other person or the community, he may, subject to the provisions of this section, order pretrial detention of a person charged with—

"(1) a dangerous crime as defined in section 23–1331(3);

"(2) a crime of violence, as defined in section 23–1331(4), if (i) the person has been convicted of a crime of violence within the ten-year period immediately preceding the alleged crime of violence for which he is presently charged; or (ii) the crime of violence was allegedly committed while the person was, with respect to another crime of violence, on bail or other release or on probation, parole, or mandatory release pending completion of a sentence; or

"(3) any offense if such person, for the purpose of obstructing or attempting to obstruct justice, threatens, injures, intimidates, or attempts to threaten, injure, or intimidate any prospective witness or juror.

"(b) No person described in subsection (a) of this section shall be ordered detained unless the judicial officer—

"(1) holds a pretrial detention hearing in accordance with the provisions of subsection (c) of this section;

"(2) finds that—

"(A) there is clear and convincing evidence that the person is a person described in subsection (a) of this section;

"(B) based on the factors set out in subsection (b) of section 23–1321, there is no condition or combination of conditions of release which will reasonably assure the safety of any other person or the community; and

"(C) except with respect to a person described in paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of this section, on the basis of information presented by proffer or otherwise to the judicial officer there is a substantial probability that the person committed the offense for which he is present before the judicial officer; and

"(3) issues an order of detention accompanied by written findings of fact and the reasons for its entry.

"(c) The following procedures shall apply to pretrial detention hearings held pursuant to this section:

"(1) Whenever the person is before a judicial officer, the hearing may be initiated on oral motion of the United States attorney.

"(2) Whenever the person has been released pursuant to section 23–1321 and it subsequently appears that such person may be subject to pretrial detention, the United States attorney may initiate a pretrial detention hearing by ex parte written motion. Upon such motion the judicial officer may issue a warrant for the arrest of the person and if such person is outside the District of Columbia, he shall be brought before a judicial officer in the district where he is arrested and shall then be transferred to the District of Columbia for proceedings in accordance with this section.

"(3) The pretrial detention hearing shall be held immediately upon the person being brought before the judicial officer for such hearing unless the person or the United States attorney moves for a continuance. A continuance granted on motion of the person shall not exceed five calendar days, unless there are extenuating circumstances. A continuance on motion of the United States attorney shall be granted upon good cause shown and shall not exceed three calendar days. The person may be detained pending the hearing.

"(4) The person shall be entitled to representation by counsel and shall be entitled to present information by proffer or otherwise, to testify, and to present witnesses in his own behalf.

"(5) Information stated in, or offered in connection with, any order entered pursuant to this section need not conform to the rules pertaining to the admissibility of evidence in a court of law.

"(6) Testimony of the person given during the hearing shall not be admissible on the issue of guilt in any other judicial proceeding, but such testimony shall be admissible in proceedings under sections 23–1327, 23–1328, and 23–1329, in perjury proceedings, and for the purposes of impeachment in any subsequent proceedings.

"(7) Appeals from orders of detention may be taken pursuant to section 23–1324.

"(d) The following shall be applicable to persons detained pursuant to this section:

"(1) To the extent practicable, the person shall be given an expedited trial.

"(2) Such person shall be treated in accordance with section 23–1321—

"(A) upon the expiration of sixty calendar days, unless the trial is in progress or the trial has been delayed at the request of the person; or

"(B) whenever a judicial officer finds that a subsequent event has eliminated the basis for such detention.

"(3) The person shall be deemed detained pursuant to section 23–1325 if he is convicted.

"(e) The judicial officer may detain for a period not to exceed five calendar days a person who comes before him for a bail determination charged with any offense, if it appears that such person is presently on probation, parole, or mandatory release pending completion of sentence for any offense under State or Federal law and that such person may flee or pose a danger to any other person or the community if released. During the five day period, the United States attorney or the Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia shall notify the appropriate State or Federal probation or parole officials. If such officials fail or decline to take the person into custody during such period, the person shall be treated in accordance with section 23–1321, unless he is subject to detention under this section. If the person is subsequently convicted of the offense charged, he shall receive credit toward service of sentence for the time he was detained pursuant to this subsection.

"§ 23–1323. Detention of addict

"(a) Whenever it appears that a person charged with a crime of violence, as defined in section 23–1331(4), may be an addict, as defined in section 23–331(5), the judicial officer may, upon motion of the United States attorney, order such person detained in custody for a period not to exceed three calendar days, under medical supervision, to determine whether the person is an addict.

"(b) Upon or before the expiration of three calendar days, the person shall be brought before a judicial officer and the results of the determination shall be presented to such judicial officer. The judicial officer thereupon (1) shall treat the person in accordance with section 23–1321, or (2) upon motion of the United States attorney, may (A) hold a hearing pursuant to section 23–1322, or (B) hold a hearing pursuant to subsection (c) of this section.

"(c) A person who is an addict may be ordered detained in custody under medical supervision if the judicial officer—

"(1) holds a pretrial detention hearing in accordance with subsection (c) of section 23–1322;

"(2) finds that—

"(A) there is clear and convincing evidence that the person is an addict;

"(B) based on the factors set out in subsection (b) of section 23–1321, there is no condition or combination of conditions of release which will reasonably assure the safety of any other person or the community; and

"(C) on the basis of information presented to the judicial officer by proffer or otherwise, there is a substantial probability that the person committed the offense for which he is present before the judicial officer; and

"(3) issues an order of detention accompanied by written findings of fact and the reasons for its entry.

"(d) The provisions of subsection (d) of section 23–1322 shall apply to this section.

"§ 23–1324. Appeal from conditions of release

"(a) A person who is detained, or whose release on a condition requiring him to return to custody after specified hours is continued, section 23–1321(d) or section 23–1321(e) by a judicial officer, other than a judge of the court having original jurisdiction over the after review of his application pursuant to offense with which he is charged or a judge of a United States court of appeals or a Justice of the Supreme Court, may move the court having original jurisdiction over the offense with which he is charged to amend the order. Such motion shall be determined promptly.

"(b) In any case in which a person is detained after (1) a court denies a motion under subsection (a) to amend an order imposing conditions of release, (2) conditions of release have been imposed or amended by a judge of the court having original jurisdiction over the offense charged, or (3) he is ordered detained or an order for his detention has been permitted to stand by a judge of the court having original jurisdiction over the offense charged, an appeal may be taken to the court having appellate jurisdiction over such court. Any order so appealed shall be affirmed if it is supported by the proceedings below. If the order is not so supported, the court may remand the case for a further hearing, or may, with or without additional evidence, order the person released pursuant to section 23–1321(a). The appeal shall be determined promptly.

"(c) In any case in which a judicial officer other than a judge of the court having original jurisdiction over the offense with which a person is charged orders his release with or without setting terms or conditions of release, or denies a motion for the pretrial detention of a person, the United States attorney may move the court having original jurisdiction over the offense to amend or revoke the order. Such motion shall be considered promptly.

"(d) In any case in which—

"(1) a person is released, with or without the setting of terms or conditions of release, or a motion for the pretrial detention of a person is denied, by a judge of the court having original jruisdiction over the offense with which the person is charged, or

"(2) a judge of a court having such original jurisdiction does not grant the motion of the United States attorney filed pursuant to subsection (c), the United States attorney may appeal to the court having appellate jurisdiction over such court. Any order so appealed shall be affirmed if it is supported by the proceedings below. If the order is not so supported, (A) the court may remand the case for a further hearing, (B) with or without additional evidence, change the terms or conditions of release, or (C) in cases in which the United States attorney requested pretrial detention pursuant to sections 23–1322 and 23–1323, order such detention.

"§ 23–1325. Release in capital cases or after conviction

"(a) A person who is charged with an offense punishable by death shall be treated in accordance with the provisions of section 23–1321 unless the judicial officer has reason to believe that no one or more conditions of release will reasonably assure that the person will not flee or pose a danger to any other person or to the property of others. If such a risk or flight or danger is believed to exist, the person may be ordered detained.

"(b) A person who has been convicted of an offense and is awaiting sentence shall be detained unless the judicial officer finds by clear and convincing evidence that he is not likely to flee or pose a danger to any other person or to the property of others. Upon such finding, the judicial officer shall treat the person in accordance with the provisions of section 23–1321.

"(c) A person who has been convicted of an offense and sentenced to a term of confinement or imprisonment and has filed an appeal or petition for a writ of certiorari shall be detained unless the judicial officer finds by clear and convincing evidence that (1) the person is not likely to flee or pose a danger to any other person or to the property of others, and (2) the appeal or petition for a writ of certiorari raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in a reversal or an order for new trial. Upon such findings, the judicial officer shall treat the person in accordance with the provisions of section 23–1321.

"(d) The provisions of section 23–1324 shall apply to persons detained in accordance with this section.

"§ 23–1326. Release of material witnesses

"If it appears by affidavit that the testimony of a person is material in any criminal proceeding, and if it is shown that it may become impracticable to secure his presence by subpena, a judicial officer shall impose conditions of release pursuant to section 23–1321. No material witnesses shall be detained because of inability to comply with any condition of release if the testimony of such witness can adequately be secured by deposition, and further detention is not necessary to prevent a failure of justice. Release may be delayed for a reasonable period of time until the deposition of the witness can be taken pursuant to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

"§ 23–1327. Penalties for failure to appear

"(a) Whoever, having been released under this title prior to the commencement of his sentence, willfully fails to appear before any court or judicial officer as required, shall, subject to the provisions of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, incur a forfeiture of any security which was given or pledged for his release, and, in addition, shall, (1) if he was released in connection with a charge of felony, or while awaiting sentence or pending appeal or certiorari prior to commencement of his sentence after conviction of any offense, be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not less than one year and not more than five years, (2) if he was released in connection with a charge of misdemeanor, be fined not more than the maximum provided for such misdemeanor and imprisoned for not less than ninety days and not more than one year, or (3) if he was released for appearance as a material witness, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

"(b) Any failure to appear after notice of the appearance date shall be prima facie evidence that such failure to appear is willful. Whether the person was warned when released of the penalties for failure to appear shall be a factor in determining whether such failure to appear was willful, but the giving of such warning shall not be a prerequisite to conviction under this section.

"(c) The trier of facts may convict under this section even if the defendant has not received actual notice of the appearance date if (1) reasonable efforts to notify the defendant have been made, and (2) the defendant, by his own actions, has frustrated the receipt of actual notice.

"(d) Any term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to this section shall be consecutive to any other sentence of imprisonment.

"§ 23–1328. Penalties for offenses committed during release

"(a) Any person convicted of an offense committed while released pursuant to section 23–1321 shall be subject to the following penalties in addition to any other applicable penalties:

"(1) A term of imprisonment of not less than one year and not more than five years if convicted of committing a felony while so released; and

"(2) A term of imprisonment of not less than ninety days and not more than one year if convicted of commiting a misdemeanor while so released.

"(b) The giving of a warning to the person when released of the penalties imposed by this section shall not be a prerequisite to the application of this section.

"(c) Any term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to this section shall be consecutive to any other sentence of imprisonment.

"§ 23–1329. Penalties for violation of conditions of release

"(a) A person who has been conditionally released pursuant to section 23–1321 and who has violated a condition of release shall be subject to revocation of release, an order of detention, and prosecution for contempt of court.

"(b) Proceedings for revocation of release may be initiated on motion of the United States attorney. A warrant for the arrest of a person charged with violating a condition of release may be issued by a judicial officer and if such person is outside the District of Columbia he shall be brought before a judicial officer in the district where he is arrested and shall then be transferred to the District of Columbia for proceedings in accordance with this section. No order of revocation and detention shall be entered unless, after a hearing, the judicial officer finds that—

"(1) there is clear and convincing evidence that such person has violated a condition of his release; and

"(2) based on the factors set out in subsection (b) of section 23–131, there is no condition or combination of conditions of release which will reasonably assure that such person will not flee or pose a danger to any other person or the community.

The provisions of subsections (c) and (d) of section 23–1322 shall apply to this subsection.

"(c) Contempt sanctions may be imposed if, upon a hearing and in accordance with principles applicable to proceedings for criminal contempt, it is established that such person has intentionally violated a condition of his release. Such contempt proceedings shall be expedited and heard by the court without a jury. Any person found guilty of criminal contempt for violation of a condition of release shall be imprisoned for not more than six months, or fined not more than $1,000, or both.

"(d) Any warrant issued by a judge of the Superior Court for violation of release conditions or for contempt of court, for failure to appear as required, or pursuant to subsection (c)(2) of section 23–1322, may be executed at any place within the jurisdiction of the United States. Such warrants shall be executed by a United States marshal or by any other officer authorized by law.

"§ 23–1330. Contempt

"Nothing in the subchapter shall interfere with or prevent the exercise by any court of the United States of its power to punish for contempt.

"§ 23–1331. Definitions

"As used in this subchapter:

"(1) The term 'judicial officer' means, unless otherwise indicated, any person or court in the District of Columbia authorized pursuant to section 3041, title 18, United States Code, or the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, to bail or otherwise release a person before trial or sentencing or pending appeal in a court of the United States, and any judge of the Superior Court.

"(2) The term 'offense' means any criminal offense committed in the District of Columbia, other than an offense triable by court-martial, military commission, provost court, or other military tribunal, which is in violation of an Act of Congress.

"(3) The term 'dangerous crime' means (A) taking or attempting to take property from another by force or threat of force, (B) unlawfully entering or attempting to enter any premises adapted for overnight accommodation of persons or for carrying on business with the intent to commit an offense therein, (C) arson or attempted arson of any premises adaptable for overnight accommodation of persons or for carrying on business, (D) rape, carnal knowledge of a female under the age of sixteen, assault with intent to commit either of the foregoing offenses, or taking or attempting to take immoral, improper, or indecent liberties with a child under the age of sixteen years, or (E) unlawful sale or distribution of a narcotic or depressant or stimulant drug (as defined by any Act of Congress) if the offense is punishable by imprisonment for more than one year.

"(4) The term 'crime of violence' means murder, forcible rape, carnal knowledge of a female under the age of sixteen, taking or attempting to take immoral, improper, or indecent liberties with a child under the age of sixteen years, mayhem, kidnaping, robbery, burglary, voluntary manslaughter, extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence, arson, assault with intent to commit any offense, assault with a dangerous weapon, or an attempt or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses, as defined by any Act of Congress or any State law, if the offense is punishable by imprisonment for more than one year.

"(5) The term 'addict' means any individual who habitually uses any narcotic drug as defined by section 4731 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to endanger the public morals, health, safety, or welfare.

"§ 23–1332. Applicability of subchapter

"The provisions of this subchapter shall apply in the District of Columbia in lieu of the provisions of sections 3146 through 3152 of title 18, United States Code.

"Chapter 15.—OUT-OF-STATE WITNESSES

"Sec.

"23–1501. Definitions.

"23–1502. Hearing on recall of out-of-State witnesses by State courts; determination; travel allowance; penalty.

"25–503. Certificate providing for attendance of witnesses at criminal prosecutions in the District of Columbia; travel allowance; penalty.

"23–1504. Exemption from arrest.

"§ 23–1501. Definitions

"As used in this chapter—

"(1) The term 'witness' includes a person whose testimony is desired in any proceeding or investigation by a grand jury or in a criminal action, prosecution, or proceeding.

"(2) The term 'State' includes the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and any other territory or possession of the United States.

"(3) The term 'summons' includes a subpena, order, or other notice requiring the appearance of a witness.

"§ 23–1502. Hearing on recall of out-of-State witnesses by State courts; determination; travel allowance; penalty

"(a) If a judge of a court of record in any State which by its laws has made provision for commanding persons within that State to attend and testify in the District of Columbia certifies under the seal of the court (1) that there is a criminal prosecution pending in that court, or that a grand jury investigation has commenced or is about to commence, (2) that a person within the District of Columbia is a material witness in the prosecution or grand jury investigation, and (3) that his presence will be required for a specified number of days, upon presentation of that certificate to any judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, except as provided in subsection (c), such judge shall fix a time and place for a hearing, and shall make an order directing the witness to appear at a time and place certain for the hearing.

"(b) If at the hearing the judge determines that the witness is material and necessary, that it will not cause undue hardship to the witness to attend and testify in the prosecution or grand jury investigation in the requesting State, and that the laws of such State and of any other State through which the witness may be required to pass by ordinary course of travel, will give to him protection from arrest and the service of civil and criminal process, he shall issue a summons, with a copy of the certificate attached, directing the witness to attend and testify in the prosecution or grand jury investigation, as the case may be, at a time and place specified in the summons. In any such hearing the certificate shall be prima facie evidence of all the facts stated therein.

"(c) If the certificate presented under subsection (a) recommends that the witness be taken into immediate custody and delivered to an officer of the requesting State to assure his attendance, in the requesting State, the judge may in lieu of notification of hearing, direct that the witness be forthwith brought before him for a hearing. If the judge at the hearing is satisfied of the desirability of the custody and delivery of the witness, he may, in lieu of issuing subpena or summons, order the witness to be forthwith taken into custody and delivered to an officer of the requesting State. The certificate shall be prima facie proof of the desirablity of the custody and delivery of the witness.

"(d) Any witness who is summoned as above provided and, after being paid or tendered by some properly authorized person the fees and allowances authorized for witnesses in criminal cases in United States district courts, fails without good cause to attend and testify as directed in the summons, shall be punished in the manner provided for the punishment of any witness who disobeys a summons issued from the Superior Court.

"(a) If a person in any State, which by its laws has made provision for commanding persons within its borders to attend and testify in criminal prosecutions or grand jury investigations in the District of Columbia, is a material witness in such a prosecution or a grand jury investigation in the District of Columbia which has commenced or is about to commence, a judge may issue a certificate under seal stating these facts and specifying the number of days the witness will be required. The certificate may include a recommendation that the witness be taken into immediate custody and delivered to an officer of the United States or the District of Columbia to assure his attendance in the District of Columbia. This certificate shall be presented to a judge of a court of record in the county in which the witness is found.

"(b) If the witness is summoned to attend and testify in the District of Columbia he shall be tendered the fees and allowances authorized for witnesses in criminal cases in the United States district courts. A witness who has appeared in accordance with the provisions of the summons shall not be required to remain within the District of Columbia for a period longer than that specified in the certificate, unless otherwise ordered by the court. If the witness, after coming into the District of Columbia, fails without good cause to attend and testify as directed in the summons, he may be punished in the manner provided for the punishment of any other witness who disobeys a summons issued from the court in the District of Columbia where the prosecution has been instituted or the grand jury investigation has commenced or is about to commence.

"§ 23–1504. Exemption from arrest

"(a) Any person who comes into the District of Columbia in obedience to a summons directing him to attend and testify in the District of Columbia shall not, while in the District of Columbia, pursuant to the summons, be subject to arrest or the service of process, civil or criminal, in connection with any matter which arose before his entrance into the District of Columbia under the summons.

"(b) Any person who is in the process of passing through the District of Columbia for the purpose of proceeding to or returning from a State which has summoned him to attend and testify shall not be subject to arrest or the service of process, civil or criminal, in connection with any matter which arose at some other time.

"Chapter 17.—DEATH PENALTY

"Sec.
"23–1701. Capital punishment.
"23–1702. Provision for death chamber; appointment of executioner and assistants; fees.
"23–1703. Sentences to be in writing and certified copy furnished.
"23–1704. Who may be present at executions; fact of execution to be certified to clerk of court.
"23–1705. Place of execution.

"§ 23–1701. Capital punishment

"The mode of capital punishment in the District of Columbia shall be by the process commonly known as electrocution. The punishment of death shall be inflicted by causing to pass through the body of the convict a current of electricity of sufficient intensity to cause death, and the application of the current shall be continued until the convict is dead. The time fixed for the execution of the sentence shall not be considered an essential part of the sentence, and if it be not executed at the time therein appointed, by reason of the pendency of an appeal or for other cause, the court may appoint another day for carrying the same into execution.

"§ 23–1702. Provision for death chamber, appointment of executioner and assistants; fees

"The Commissioner of the District of Columbia shall provide a death chamber and necessary apparatus for inflicting the death penalty by electrocution and designate an executioner and necessary assistants, not exceeding three in number. The District of Columbia Council shall fix the fees for the executioner and his assistants.

"§ 23–1703. Sentences to be in writing and certified copy furnished

"If a person is sentenced to death for a conviction in the District of Columbia the presiding judge shall sentence the convicted person to death according to the terms of this chapter, and make the sentence in writing, such sentence shall be filed with the papers in the case against the convicted person, and a certified copy thereof shall be transmitted, by the clerk of the court in which such sentence is pronounced, to the District of Columbia Department of Corrections not less than ten days prior to the time fixed in the sentence of the court for the execution.

"§ 23–1704. Who may be present at execution; fact of execution to be certified to clerk of court

"At the execution of the death penalty there shall be present only the following persons: The executioner and his assistant; the prison physician and one other physician if the condemned person so desires; the condemned person's counsel and relatives, not exceeding three, if they so desire; the prison chaplain and such other ministers of the Gospel, not exceeding two, as may attend by desire of the condemned; the superintendent of the prison, or, in the event of his disability, a deputy designated by him; and not fewer than three nor more than five respectable citizens whom the superintendent of the prison shall designate, and, if necessary to insure their attendance, shall subpena to be present. The fact of execution shall be certified by the prison physician and the executioner to the clerk of the court in which sentence was pronounced, which certificate shall be filed by the clerk with the papers in the case. No person under the age of twenty-one years shall be allowed to witness any execution.

"§ 23–1705. Place of execution

"Any person adjudged to suffer death shall be executed within the walls of the designated facility of the Department of Corrections, or within the yard or inclosure thereof, and not elsewhere."

(b) The following provisions of law are repealed on the effective date of this Act, except with respect to rights and duties which matured, penalties which were incurred, and proceedings which were begun before the effective date of this Act:

(1) Sections 397 and 398 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia (D.C. Code, secs. 4–140, 4–141).

(2) The following provision of British law in effect in the District of Columbia: 23 Geo. II, chapter 11, sections 1 and 2 (D.C. Code, secs. 23–204, 23–205).

(3) The following sections of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901:

TITLE III—PUBLIC DEFENDER

REDESIGNATION OF LEGAL AID AGENCY AS PUBLIC DEFENDER SERVICE

SEC. 301. The Legal Aid Agency for the District of Columbia is redesignated the District of Columbia Public Defender Service (hereafter in this title referred to as the "Service").

AUTHORITY OF SERVICE

SEC. 302. (a) The Service is authorized to represent any person in the District of Columbia who a District of Columbia court determines is financially unable to obtain adequate representation in each of the following categories:

(1) Persons charged with an offense punishable by imprisonment for a term of six months, or more.

(2) Persons charged with violating a condition of probation or parole.

(3) Persons subject to proceedings pursuant to chapter 5 of title 21 of the District of Columbia Code (Hospitalization of the Mentally Ill).

(4) Persons for whom civil commitment is sought pursuant to title III of the Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Act of 1966 (42 U.S.C. 3411, et seq.) or the provisions of the Hospital Treatment for Drug Addicts Act for the District of Columbia (D.C. Code, sec. 24–601, et seq.).

(5) Juveniles alleged to be delinquent or in need of supervision.

(6) Persons subject to proceedings pursuant to section 7 of the Act of August 4, 1947 (D.C. Code, sec. 24–527) (relating to commitment of chronic alcoholics by court order for treatment).

Representation may be furnished at any stage of a proceeding, including appellate, ancillary, and collateral proceedings. Not more than 60 per centum of the persons annually determined to be financially unable to obtain adequate representation in each of the above categories may be represented by the Service, but the Service may furnish technical and other assistance to private attorneys appointed to represent persons described in the above-enumerated categories. The Service shall determine the best practicable allocation of its staff personnel to the courts where it furnishes representation.

(b) The Service shall establish and coordinate the operation of an effective and adequate system for appointment of private attorneys to represent persons specified in subsection (a), but the courts shall have final authority to make such appointments. The Service shall report to the courts at least quarterly on matters relating to the operation of the appointment system and shall consult with the courts on the need for modifications and improvements.

(c) Upon approval of its Board of Trustees, the Service may perform such other functions as are necessary and appropriate to the duties described above.

(d) The determination whether a person is financially unable to obtain adequate representation shall be based on information provided by the person to be represented and such other persons or agencies as the court in its discretion shall require. Whoever in providing this information knowingly falsifies, conceals, or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or representation, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or entry shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF SERVICE

SEC. 303. (a) The powers of the Service shall be vested in a Board of Trustees composed of seven members. The Board of Trustees shall establish general policy for the Service but shall not direct the conduct of particular cases.

(b) (1) Members of the Board of Trustees shall be appointed by a panel consisting of—

(A) the chief judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit;

(B) the chief judge of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia;

(C) the chief judge of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals;

(D) the chief judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia; and

(E) the Commissioner of the District of Columbia. The panel shall be presided over by the Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit (or in his absence, the designee of such judge). A quorum of the panel shall be four members.

(2) Judges of the United States courts in the District of Columbia and of District of Columbia courts may not be appointed to serve as members of the Board of Trustees.

(3) The term of office of a member of the Board of Trustees shall be three years. No person shall serve more than two consecutive terms as a member of the Board of Trustees. A vacancy in the Board of Trustees shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the remainder of such term.

(c) The trustees of the Legal Aid Agency for the District of Columbia in office on the effective date of this Act shall serve the unexpired portions of their terms as trustees of the Service.

(d) For the purposes of any action brought against the trustees of the Service, they shall be deemed to be employees of the District of Columbia.

DIRECTOR AND DEPUTY DIRECTOR OF SERVICE

SEC. 304. The Board of Trustees shall appoint a Director and Deputy Director of the Service, each of whom shall serve at the pleasure of the Board. The Director shall be responsible for the supervision of the work of the Service and shall perform such other duties as the Board of Trustees may prescribe. The Deputy Director shall assist the Director and shall perform such duties as he may prescribe. The Director and Deputy Director shall be members of the bar of the District of Columbia. The Board of Trustees shall fix the compensation to be paid to the Director and the Deputy Director, but such compensation shall not be less than $17,500 nor more than $27,500.

STAFF

SEC. 305. (a) The Director shall employ a staff of attorneys, clerical and other personnel necessary to provide adequate and effective defense services. The Director shall make assignments of the personnel of the Service. The salaries of all employees of the Service, other than the Director and the Deputy Director, shall be fixed by the Director, but shall not exceed the salaries which may be paid to persons of similar qualifications and experience in the Office of the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia. All attorneys employed by the Service to represent persons shall be members of the bar of the District of Columbia.

(b) No attorney employed by the Service shall engage in the private practice of law or receive a fee for representing any person.

FISCAL REPORTS

SEC. 306. (a) The Board of Trustees of the Agency shall submit a fiscal year report of the Service's operations to the Congress of the United States, to the chief judges of the Federal courts in the District of Columbia and of the District of Columbia courts, and to the Commissioner of the District of Columbia. The report shall include a statement of the financial condition of the Service and a summary of services performed during the year.

(b) The Board of Trustees shall annually arrange for an independent audit to be prepared by a certified public accountant or by a designee of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 307. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title, there is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, out of any moneys in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, such sums as may be necessary to implement the purposes of this title. Such sums shall be appropriated for the judiciary to be disbursed by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts to carry on the business of the Service. The Administrative Office in disbursing and accounting for such sums, shall follow, so far as possible, its standard fiscal practices. The budget estimate for the Service shall be prepared in consultation with the Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

TRANSITION PROVISION

SEC. 308. All employees of the Legal Aid Agency for the District of Columbia on the effective date of this Act shall be deemed to be employees of the District of Columbia Public Defender Service and shall be entitled to the same compensation and benefits as they are entitled to as employees of the Legal Aid Agency for the District of Columbia.

REPEAL

SEC. 309. The District of Columbia Legal Aid Act (D.C. Code, secs. 2–2201 to 2–2210) is repealed.

TITLE IV—ATTORNEY'S FEES IN ACTIONS FOR WRONGFUL ARREST BROUGHT AGAINST OFFICERS OR MEMBERS OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT

ATTORNEY'S FEES IN ACTIONS FOR WRONGFUL ARREST

SEC. 401. (a) Chapter 7 of title 5 of the District of Columbia Code (relating to fees and costs) is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"§ 15–717. Attorney's fees to be awarded in certain civil actions brought against members or officers of the Metropolitan Police Department

"In a civil action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia or any District of Columbia court brought against a member or officer of the Metropolitan Police Department for damages resulting from an alleged wrongful arrest by such officer or member, the judgment of such court, whether for the plaintiff or the defendant, shall include an award of a reasonable attorney's fee to such member or officer."

(b) The table of sections for chapter 7 of title 15 of the District of Columbia Code is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"15–717. Attorney's fees to be awarded in certain civil actions brought against members or officers of the Metropolitan Police Department."

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 402. The amendments made by this title shall take effect with respect to civil actions in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia or any District of Columbia court brought after the date of enactment of this Act against a member or officer of the Metropolitan Police Department for damages resulting from an alleged wrongful arrest by such officer or member.

TITLE V—TRANSFER TO BUREAU OF PRISONS OF CERTAIN FACILITIES OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA DEPARTMENT OF CORRECTIONS

TRANSFER

SEC. 501. (a) Section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to create a Department of Corrections in the District of Columbia", approved June 27, 1946 (D.C. Code, sec. 24–442), is amended by striking out ", the Reformatory at Lorton in the State of Virginia,".

(b) Section 6 of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a Board of Public Welfare in and for the District of Columbia, to determine its functions, and for other purposes", approved March 16, 1926 (D.C. Code, sec. 3–106), is amended by striking out "(b) the reformatory at Lorton in the State of Virginia;".

(c) All the functions, powers, and duties of the Commissioner of the District of Columbia and the District of Columbia Council with respect to (1) the institutions of the District of Columbia that are located in Fairfax County, Virginia, and are operated by the Department of Corrections of the government of the District of Columbia, and (2) the care, custody, discipline, instruction, and rehabilitation of persons committed to, or otherwise residing in, such institutions, are transferred to the Attorney General. The Attorney General may from time to time make such provisions as he shall deem appropriate authorizing the performance of any of the functions, powers, or duties transferred to him by this section by any officer, employee, or organizational entity of the Department of Justice.

(d) The personnel—

(1) who the Director of the Bureau of the Budget determines were employed in connection with any function, power, or duty transferred by this section, and

(2) who are subject to the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code governing appointment in the competitive service and compensated in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates shall be transferred to the Attorney General and shall continue to have the employment privileges and rights they had under part III of title 5, United States Code, before their transfer under this section. The transfer of personnel pursuant to this section shall be without reduction in classification or compensation for one year after such transfer.

(e) For the purposes of the twenty-second paragraph under the center heading "UNITED STATES COURTS" in the first section of the Act of March 3, 1915 (D.C. Code, sec 24–424), each institution of the District of Columbia described in section 2 of this Act shall be considered a Federal penitentiary.

TITLE VI—ABOLITION OF COMMISSION ON REVISION OF THE CRIMINAL LAWS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

ABOLITION OF COMMISSION

SEC. 601. (a) Title IX of the Act entitled "An Act relating to crime and criminal procedure in the District of Columbia", approved December 27, 1967 (Public Law 90–226), is repealed.

(b) The Committees on the District of Columbia of the Senate and House of Representatives shall make a full and complete review and study of the statutory and case law applicable in the District of Columbia for the purpose of formulating a revised code of criminal law for the District of Columbia.

TITLE VII—INTERSTATE COMPACT ON JUVENILES

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 701. (a) The Congress finds that (1) juveniles who are not under proper supervision and control, or who have absconded, escaped, or run away, are likely to endanger their own health, morals, and welfare, and the health, morals, and welfare of others and (2) the cooperation of the District of Columbia with the States is necessary to provide for the welfare and protection of juveniles and other persons in the District of Columbia.

(b) The Congress intends, in authorizing the District of Columbia to adopt the Interstate Compact on Juveniles, to have the District of Columbia cooperate fully with the States (1) in returning juveniles to those States requesting their return, and (2) in accepting and providing for the return of juveniles who are residents of the District of Columbia and who are found or apprehended in a State.

AUTHORITY TO ENTER INTO COMPACT

SEC. 702 (a) The Commissioner of the District of Columbia (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Commissioner") is authorized to enter into and execute on behalf of the District of Columbia a compact with any State or States legally joining therein in the form substantially as follows:

"THE INTERSTATE COMPACT ON JUVENILES

"The contracting states solemnly agree:

"ARTICLE I—Findings and Purposes

"That juveniles who are not under proper supervision and control, or who have absconded, escaped, or run away, are likely to endanger their own health, morals and welfare, and the health, morals and welfare of others. The cooperation of the states party to this compact is therefore necessary to provide for the welfare and protection of juveniles and of the public with respect to (1) cooperative supervision of delinquent juveniles on probation or parole; (2) the return from one state to another, of delinquent juveniles who have escaped or absconded; (3) the return, from one state to another, of non-delinquent juveniles who have run away from home; and (4) additional measures for the protection of juveniles and of the public, which any two or more of the party states may find desirable to undertake cooperatively. In carrying out the provisions of this compact the party states shall be guided by the non-criminal, reformative and protective policies which guide their laws concerning delinquent, neglected or dependent juveniles generally. It shall be the policy of the states party to this compact to cooperate and observe their respective responsibilities for the prompt return and acceptance of juveniles and delinquent juveniles who become subject to the provisions of this compact. The provisions of this compact shall be reasonably and liberally construed to accomplish the foregoing purposes.

"ARTICLE II—Existing Rights and Remedies

"That all remedies and procedures provided by this compact shall be in addition to and not in substitution for other rights, remedies and procedures, and shall not be in derogation of parental rights and responsibilities.

"ARTICLE III—Definitions

"That, for the purposes of this compact, 'delinquent juvenile' means any juvenile who has been adjudged delinquent and who, at the time the provisions of this compact are invoked, is still subject to the jurisdiction of the court that has made such adjudication or to the jurisdiction or supervision of any agency or institution pursuant to an order of such court; 'probation or parole' means any kind of conditional release of juveniles authorized under the laws of the states party hereto; 'court' means any court having jurisdiction over delinquent, neglected or dependent children; 'state' means any state, territory or possessions of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; and 'residence' or any variant thereof means a place at which a home or regular place of abode is maintained.

"(a) That the parent, guardian, person or agency entitled to legal custody of a juvenile who has not been adjudged delinquent but who has run away without the consent of such parent, guardian, person or agency may petition the appropriate court in the demanding state for the issuance of a requisition for his return. The petition shall state the name and age of the juvenile, the name of the petitioner and the basis of entitlement to the juvenile's custody, the circumstances of his running away, his location if known at the time application is made, and such other facts as may tend to show that the juvenile who has run away is endangering his own welfare or the welfare of others and is not an emancipated minor. The petition shall be verified by affidavit, shall be executed in duplicate, and shall be accompanied by two certified copies of the document or documents on which the petitioner's entitlement to the juvenile's custody is based, such as birth certificates, letters of guardianship, or custody decrees. Such further affidavits and other documents as many be deemed proper may be submitted with such petition. The judge of the court to which this application is made may hold a hearing thereon to determine whether for the purposes of this compact the petitioner is entitled to the legal custody of the juvenile, whether or not it appears that the juvenile has in fact run away without consent, whether or not he is an emancipated minor, and whether or not it is in the best interest of the juvenile to compel his return to the state. If the judge determines, either with or without a hearing, that the juvenile should be returned, he shall present the appropriate court or to the executive authority of the state where the juvenile is alleged to be located a written requisition for the return of such juvenile. Such requisition shall set forth the name and age of the juvenile, the determination of the court that the juvenile has run away without the consent of a parent, guardian, person or agency entitled to legal custody, and that it is in the best interest and for the protection of such juvenile that he be returned. In the event that a proceeding for the adjudication of the juvenile as a delinquent, neglected or dependent juvenile is pending in the court at the time when such juvenile runs away, the court may issue a requisition for the return of such juvenile upon its own motion, regardless of the consent of the parent, guardian, person or agency entitled to legal custody, reciting therein the nature and circumstances of the pending proceeding. The requisition shall in every case be executed in duplicate and shall be signed by the judge. One copy of the requisition shall be filed with the compact administrator of the demanding state, there to remain on file subject to the provisions of law governing records of such court. Upon the receipt of a requisition demanding the return of a juvenile who has run away, the court or the executive authority to whom the requisition is addressed shall issue an order to any peace officer or other appropriate person directing him to take into custody and detain such juvenile. Such detention order must substantially recite the facts necessary to the validity of its issuance hereunder. No juvenile detained upon such order shall be delivered over to the officer whom the court demanding him shall have appointed to receive him, unless he shall first be taken forthwith before a judge of a court in the state, who shall inform him of the demand made for his return and who may appoint counsel or guardian ad litem for him. If the judge of such court shall find that the requisition is in order, he shall deliver such juvenile over to the officer whom the court demanding him shall have appointed to receive him. The judge, however, may fix a reasonable time to be allowed for the purpose of testing the legality of the proceeding.

"Upon reasonable information that a person is a juvenile who has run away from another state party to this compact without the consent of a parent, guardian, person or agency entitled to his legal custody, such juvenile may be taken into custody without a requisition and brought forthwith before a judge of the appropriate court who may appoint counsel or guardian and litem for such juvenile and who shall determine after a hearing whether sufficient cause exists to hold the person, subject to the order of the court, for his own protection and welfare, for such a time not exceeding 90 days as will enable his return to another state party to this compact pursuant to a requisition for his return from a court of that state. If, at the time when a state seeks the return of a juvenile who has run away, there is pending in the state wherein he is found any criminal charge, or any proceeding to have him adjudicated a delinquent juvenile for an act committed in such State, or if he is suspected of having committed within such state a criminal offense or an act of juvenile delinquency, he shall not be returned without the consent of such state until discharged from prosecution or other form of proceeding, imprisonment, detention or supervision for such offense or juvenile delinquency. The duly accredited officers of any state party to this compact, upon the establishment of their authority and the identity of the juvenile being returned, shall be permitted to transport such juvenile through any and all state party to this compact, without interference. Upon his return to the state from which he ran away, the juvenile shall be subject to such further proceedings as may be appropriate under the laws of that state.

"(b) That the state to which a juvenile is returned under this Article shall be responsible for payment of the transportation costs of such return.

"(c) That 'juvenile' as used in this Article means any person who is a minor under the law of the state of residence of the parent, guardian, person or agency entitled to the legal custody of such minor.

"ARTICLE V—Return of Escapees and Absconders

"(a) That the appropriate person or authority from whose probation or parole supervision a delinquent juvenile has absconded or from whose institutional custody he has escaped shall present to the appropriate court or to the executive authority of the state where the delinquent juvenile is alleged to be located a written requisition for the return of such delinquent juvenile. Such requisition shall state the name and age of the delinquent juvenile, the particulars of his adjudication as a delinquent juvenile, the circumstances of the breach of the terms of his probation or parole or of his escape from an institution or agency vested with his legal custody or supervision, and the location of such delinquent juvenile, if known, at the time the requisition is made. The requisition shall be verified by affidavit, shall be executed in duplicate, and shall be accompanied by two certified copies of the judgment, formal adjudication, or order of commitment which subjects such delinquent juvenile to probation or parole or to the legal custody of the institution or agency concerned. Such further affidavits and other documents as may be deemed proper may be submitted with such requisition. One copy of the requisition shall be filed with the compact administrator of the demanding state, there to remain on file subject to the provisions of law governing records of the appropriate court. Upon the receipt of a requisition demanding the return of a delinquent juvenile who has absconded or escaped, the court or the executive authority to whom the requisition is addressed shall issue an order to any peace officer or other appropriate person directing him to take into custody and detain such delinquent juvenile. Such detention order must substantially recite the facts necessary to the validity of its issuance hereunder. No delinquent juvenile detained upon such order shall be delivered over to the officer whom the appropriate person or authority demanding him shall have appointed to receive him, unless he shall first be taken forthwith before a judge of an appropriate court in the state, who shall inform him of the demand made for his return and who may appoint counsel or guardian ad litem for him. If the judge of such court shall find that the requisition is in order, he shall deliver such delinquent juvenile over to the officer whom the appropriate person or authority demanding him shall have appointed to receive him. The judge, however, may fix a reasonable time to be allowed for the purpose of testing the legality of the proceeding.

"Upon reasonable information that a person is a delinquent juvenile who has absconded while on probation or parole, or escaped from an institution or agency vested with his legal custody or supervision in any state party to this compact, such person may be taken into custody in any other state party to this compact without a requisition. But in such event, he must be taken forthwith before a judge of the appropriate court, who may appoint counsel or guardian ad litem for such person and who shall determine, after a hearing, whether sufficient cause exists to hold the person subject to the order of the court for such a time, not exceeding 90 days, as will enable his detention under a detention order issued on a requisition pursuant to this Article. If, at the time when a state seeks the return of a delinquent juvenile who has either absconded while on probation or parole or escaped from an institution or agency vested with his legal custody or supervision, there is pending in the state wherein he is detained any criminal charge or any proceeding to have him adjudicated a delinquent juvenile for an act committed in such state, or if he is suspected of having committed within such state a criminal offense or an act of juvenile delinquency, he shall not be returned without the consent of such state until discharged from prosecution or other form of proceeding, imprisonment, detention or supervision for such offense or juvenile delinquency. The duly accredited officers of any state party to this compact, upon the establishment of their authority and the identity of the delinquent juvenile being returned, shall be permitted to transport such delinquent juvenile through any and all states party to this compact, without interference. Upon his return to the state from which he escaped or absconded, the delinquent juvenile shall be subject to such further proceedings as may be appropriate under the laws of that state.

"(b) That the state to which a delinquent juvenile is returned under this Article shall be responsible for the payment of the transportation costs of such return.

"ARTICLE VI—Voluntary Return Procedure

"That any delinquent juvenile who has absconded while on probation or parole, or escaped from an institution or agency vested with his legal custody or supervision in any state party to this compact, and any juvenile who has run away from any state party to this compact, who is taken into custody without a requisition in another state party to this compact under the provisions of Article IV(a) or of Article V(a), may consent to his immediate return to the state from which he absconded, escaped or ran away. Such consent shall be given by the juvenile or delinquent juvenile and his counsel or guardian ad litem if any, by executing or subscribing a writing, in the presence of a judge of the appropriate court, which states that the juvenile or delinquent juvenile and his counsel or guardian ad litem, if any, consent to his return to the demanding state. Before such consent shall be executed or subscribed, however, the judge, in the presence of counsel or guardian ad litem, if any, shall inform the juvenile or delinquent juvenile of his rights under this compact. When the consent has been duly executed, it shall be forwarded to and filed with the compact administrator of the state in which the court is located and the judge shall direct the officer having the juvenile or delinquent juvenile in custody to deliver him to the duly accredited officer or officers of the state demanding his return, and shall cause to be delivered to such officer or officers a copy of the consent. The court may, however, upon the request of the state to which the juvenile or delinquent juvenile is being returned, order him to return unaccompanied to such state and shall provide him with a copy of such court order; in such event a copy of the consent shall be forwarded to the compact administrator of the state to which said juvenile or delinquent juvenile is ordered to return.

"ARTICLE VII—Cooperative Supervision of Probationers and Parolees

"(a) That the duly constituted judicial and administrative authorities of a state party to this compact (herein called 'sending state') may permit any delinquent juvenile within such state, placed on probation or parole, to reside in any other state party to this compact (herein called 'receiving state') while on probation or parole, and the receiving state shall accept such delinquent juvenile, if the parent, guardian or person entitled to the legal custody of such delinquent juvenile is residing or undertakes to reside within the receiving state. Before granting such permission, opportunity shall be given to the receiving state to make such investigations as it deems necessary. The authorities of the sending state shall send to the authorities of the receiving state copies of pertinent court orders, social case studies and all other available information which may be of value to and assist the receiving state in supervising a probationer or parolee under this compact. A receiving state, in its discretion, may agree to accept supervision of a probationer or parolee in cases where the parent, guardian or person entitled to the legal custody of the delinquent juvenile is not a resident of the receiving state, and if so accepted the sending state may transfer supervision accordingly.

"(b) That each receiving state will assume the duties of visitation and of supervision over any such delinquent juvenile and in the exercise of those duties will be governed by the same standards of visitation and supervision that prevail for its own delinquent juveniles released on probation or parole.

"(c) That, after consultation between the appropriate authorities of the sending state and of the receiving state as to the desirability and necessity of returning such a delinquent juvenile, the duly accredited officers of a sending state may enter a receiving state and there apprehend and retake any such delinquent juvenile on probation or parole. For that purpose, no formalities will be required, other than establishing the authority of the officer and the identity of the delinquent juvenile to be retaken and returned. The decision of the sending state to retake a delinquent juvenile on probation or parole shall be conclusive upon and not reviewable within the receiving state, but if, at the time the sending state seeks to retake a delinquent juvenile on probation or parole, there is pending against him within the receiving state any criminal charge or any proceeding to have him adjudicated a delinquent juvenile for any act committed in such state or if he is suspected of having committed within such state a criminal offense or an act of juvenile delinquency, he shall not be returned without the consent of the receiving state until discharged from prosecution or other form of proceeding, imprisonment, detention or supervision for such offense or juvenile delinquency. The duly accredited officers of the sending state shall be permitted to transport delinquent juveniles being so returned through any and all states party to this compact, without interference.

"(d) That the sending state shall be responsible under this Article for paying the costs of transporting any delinquent juvenile to the receiving state or of returning any delinquent juvenile to the sending state.

"ARTICLE VIII—Responsibility for Costs

"(a) That the provisions of Articles IV(b), V(b) and VII(d) of this compact shall not be construed to alter or affect any internal relationship among the departments, agencies and officers of and in the government of a party state, or between a party state and its subdivisions, as to the payment of costs, or responsibilities therefor.

"(b) That nothing in this compact shall be construed to prevent any party state or subdivision thereof from asserting any right against any person, agency, or other entity in regard to costs for which such party state or subdivsion thereof may be responsible pursuant to Articles IV(b), V(b) or VII(d) of this compact.

"ARTICLE IX—Detention Practices

"That, to every extent possible, it shall be the policy of states party to this compact that no juvenile or delinquent juvenile shall be placed or detained in any prison, jail or lockup nor be detained or transported in association with criminal, vicious or dissolute persons.

"ARTICLE X—Supplementary Agreements

"That the duly constituted administrative authorities of a state party to this compact may enter into supplementary agreements with any other state or states party hereto for the cooperative care, treatment and rehabilitation of delinquent junveniles whenever they shall find that such agreements will improve the facilities or programs available for such care, treatment, and rehabilitation. Such care, treatment and rehabilitation may be provided in an institution located within any state entering into such supplementary agreement. Such supplementary agreements shall (1) provide the rates to be paid for the care, treatment and custody of such delinquent juveniles, taking into consideration the character of facilities, services and subsistence furnished; (2) provide that the delinquent juvenile shall be given a court hearing prior to his being sent to another state for care, treatment and custody; (3) provide that the state receiving such a delinquent juvenile in one of its institutions shall act solely as agent for the state sending such delinquent juvenile; (4) provide that the sending state shall at all times retain jurisdiction over delinquent juveniles sent to an institution in another state; (5) provide for reasonable inspection of such institutions by the sending state; (6) provide that the consent of the parent, guardian, person or agency entitled to the legal custody of said delinquent juvenile shall be secured prior to his being sent to another state; and (7) make provision for such other matters and details as shall be necessary to protect the rights and equities of such delinquent juveniles and of the cooperating states.

"ARTICLE XI—Acceptance of Federal and other Aid

"That any state party to this compact may accept any and all donations: gifts and grants of money, equipment and services from the federal or any local government, or any agency thereof and from any person, firm or corporation, for any of the purposes and functions of this compact, and may receive and utilize, the same subject to the terms, conditions and regulations governing such donations, gifts and grants.

"ARTICLE XII—Compact Administrators

"That the governor of each state party to this compact shall designate an officer who, acting jointly with like officers of other party states, shall promulgate rules and regulations to carry out more effectively the terms and provisions of this compact.

"ARTICLE XIII—Excution of Compact

"That this compact shall become operative immediately upon its execution by any state as between it and any other state or states so executing. When executed it shall have the full force and effect of law within such state, the form or execution to be in accordance with the laws of the executing state.

ARTICLE XIV—Reunification

"That this compact shall continue in force and remain binding upon each executing state until renounced by it. Renunciation of this compact shall be by the same authority which executed it, by sending six months' notice in writing of its intention to withdraw from the compact to the other states party hereto. The duties and obligations of a renouncing state under Article VII hereof shall continue as to parolees and probationers residing therein at the time of withdrawal until retaken or finally discharged. Supplementary agreements entered into under Article X hereof shall be subject to renunciation as provided by such supplementary agreements, and shall not be subject to the six months' renunciation notice of the present Article.

"ARTICLE XV—Severability

"That the provisions of this compact shall be severable and if any phrase, clause, sentence or provision of this compact is declared to be contrary to the constitution of any participating state or of the United States or the applicability thereof to any government, agency, person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of this compact and the applicability thereof to any government, agency, person or circumstances shall not be affected thereby. If this compact shall be held contrary to the constitution of any state participating therein, the compact shall remain in full force and effect as to the remaining states and in full force and effect as to the state affected as to all severable matters."

(b) The Commissioner may enter into and execute on behalf of the District of Columbia the following additional articles to the Interstate Compact on Juveniles:

"ARTICLE XVI—Additional Provision Relating to Return of Minor Children

"This article shall provide additional remedies, and shall be binding only as among and between those party states which specifically execute the same.

"For the purposes of this article, 'child', as used herein, means any minor within the jurisdictional age limits of any court in the home state.

"When any child is brought before a court of a state of which such child is a resident, and such state is willing to permit such child's return to the home state of such child, such home state, upon being so advised by the state in which such proceeding is pending, shall immediately institute proceedings to determine the residence and jurisdictional facts as to such child in such home state, and upon finding that such child is in fact a resident of said state and subject to the jurisdiction of the court thereof, shall within five days authorize the return of such child to the home state, and to the parent or custodial agency legally authorized to accept such custody in such home state, and at the expense of such home state, to be paid from such funds as such home state may procure, designate, or provide, prompt action being of the essence.

"ARTICLE XVII—Additional Provision Concerning Interstate Rendition of Juveniles Alleged to be Delinquent

"This article shall provide additional remedies, and shall be binding only as among and between those party states which specifically execute the same.

"All provisions and procedures of Articles V and VI of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles shall be construed to apply to any juvenile charged with being a delinquent by reason of a violation of any criminal law. Any juvenile, charged with being a delinquent by reason of violating any criminal law shall be returned to the requesting state upon a requisition to the state where the juvenile may be found. A petition is such case shall be filed in a court of competent jurisdiction in the requesting state where the violation of criminal law is alleged to have been committed. The petition may be filed regardless of whether the juvenile has left the state before or after the filing of the petition. The requisition described in Article V of the compact shall be forwarded by the judge of the court in which the petition has been filed."

COMPACT ADMINISTRATOR

SEC. 703. (a) The Commissioner shall appoint or designate an officer of the government of the District of Columbia (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "compact administrator") to administer the compact. The compact administrator shall serve at the pleasure of the Commissioner.

(b) The compact administrator, acting jointly with like officers of party States, shall promulgate rules and regulations to carry out more effectively the terms of the compact. The compact administrator shall cooperate with all departments, agencies, and officers of the government of the District of Columbia in facilitating the proper administration of the compact or of any supplementary agreement entered into by the compact administrator under subsection (c) of this section.

(c) Subject to the approval of the Commissioner, the compact administrator may enter into supplementary agreements with appropriate State officials for the purpose of administering the compact.

(d) Subject to the approval of the Commissioner, the compact administrator may make or arrange for any payments necessary to discharge any financial obligations imposed upon the District of Columbia by the compact or by any supplementary agreement entered into under subsection (c) of this section.

ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 704. The courts, departments, agencies, and officers of the District of Columbia shall enforce the compact and shall take such action as may be necessary to carry out the purposes and intent of the compact which may be within their respective jurisdictions.

CONSTRUCTION OF COMPACT

SEC. 705. The compact shall not be construed to prohibit the adoption of any other plan or procedure for the District of Columbia for the return of any runaway juvenile.

CONGRESSIONAL AUTHORITY

SEC. 706. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is hereby expressly reserved by the Congress.

TITLE VIII—EFFECTIVE DATE

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 801 (a) Except as provided in part E of title I, section 402, and subsection (b) of this section, this Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the first day of the seventh calendar month which begins after the date of its enactment.

(b) Section 601 shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act. The amendments made by sections 201 and 205 of this Act shall apply with respect to any person who commits an offense after the effective date of this Act.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 16196) was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING CERTAIN CORRECTIONS TO BE MADE IN THE ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 11959

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 554) and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution as follows:

H. CON. RES. 554

Concurrent resolution authorizing certain corrections to be made in the enrollment of H.R. 11959

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed, in the enrollment of the bill (H.R. 11959) to amend chapters 31, 34, and 35 of title 38, United States Code, in order to increase the rates of vocational rehabilitation, educational assistance, and special training allowance paid to eligible veterans and persons under such chapters, to make the following corrections, namely: In section 202 of the bill, delete the subsection designation "(a)" immediately after "Sec. 202.", and delete all of subsection (b) thereof; in section 1969(a) of the new subchapter added by section 204(a)(4) of the bill, delete "section 1682(b) of this title" and insert in lieu thereof "subsection (b) of this section"; and in the parenthetical matter contained in section 242(a) of the new subchapter added by section 214(a) of the bill, insert "need for" immediately after "including their".

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I correctly understand that this concurrent resolution provides no substantive changes in the legislation?

Mr. DORN. The gentleman is correct. The conference report passed the House unanimously on March 18. These are only technical corrections in the phraseology of the bill.

Mr. GROSS. There are no additions by way of substantive legislation?

Mr. DORN. Absolutely not.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

(Mr. DORN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. DORN. The concurrent resolution, Mr. Speaker, which I have just presented, is one which deals with errors in the conference report, House Report No. 91–918, on the bill H.R. 11959 which was adopted unanimously by the House last Wednesday, March 18. The matters are technical in nature and do not substantially alter the conference agreement or form the basis for any different action on the part of the House. They were simply oversights which occur when a report is being prepared under considerable pressure as was the case in this instance.

The corrections are as follows: First, a section relating to apprentice training, which the conferees agreed to remove, was erroneously left in the bill; second, this corrects an incorrect cross reference relating to the method of paying under the PREP program; and third, two words "need for" were erroneously omitted from section 242 relating to veterans' assistance offices.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FARBSTEIN CALLS FOR JUSTICE IN POSTAL CRISIS

(Mr. FARBSTEIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, the seriouness of the nationwide postal crisis is now apparent to all. Everyone acknowledges the fact that the carriers' action is illegal; everyone also acknowledges the legitimate grievances of the Nation's postal employees. The question confronting the President and the Members of Congress is what can be done to bring the men back to work.

I suggest that one principle and one principle alone must guide us in seeking a solution. That principle is justice. There has been much talk about the degree to which the mail is subsidized but no one has talked about who is really subsidizing postal operations. Postal operations have been chiefly subsidized by the postal workers, themselves who work for substandard wages.

Justice demands that the burden for subsidized postal operations be spread evenly among the population and not rest exclusively on the backs of hard-working postal employees.

Justice demands that Federal employees be paid a decent wage. It is criminal that postal wages are so low that 7 percent of the post office employees in New York must supplement their income with welfare payments.

Justice requires that the President and Members of Congress state unequivocally now their support for immediate and substantial wage increases with no penalties imposed on those who have not been at work.

Justice for post office employees will end the crisis now confronting us. The mail must move once again—but by justly compensated postal employees, not by the Army. The President and the Members of Congress, acting justly, have nothing to fear.

THE POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. FISHER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, the current illegal strikes by 20 percent of postal employees against the U.S. Government is most unfortunate and cannot be tolerated. Additional legislation designed to prevent a repetition is imperative.

The present prohibition against such work stoppages seems difficult to enforce, even though it carries a penalty of a year's imprisonment and a $1,000 fine, and the guilty employee must be dismissed and cannot be reemployed for 3 years. As the Washington Post on last Saturday pointed out:

Except in flagrant cases, this is law that is difficult to invoke.

Therefore, if the Congress is to meet its obligation to protect the public interest, and prevent a recurrence of this defiance of the law, it naturally follows that additional legislation is required.

Today I have introduced a bill which I believe will accomplish that purpose. It provides that any Government employee—including, of course, postal employees—who willingly engages in an illegal strike, that person shall then, automatically and by operation of law, be reduced in grade by one level, and a promotion will be prohibited for at least 2 years.

Mr. Speaker, recent events have demonstrated that this type of legislation is absolutely necessary if the Congress wants to be doubly certain that in the future there will be no more strikes against the Government of the United States.

POSSIBILITY OF STRIKE BY OTHER CIVIL SERVANTS

(Mr. HAYS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I read an article in the paper this morning that some civil servants in other departments—and it mentioned the Pentagon, the Departments of Agriculture and Health, Education and Welfare—are going to strike. Now, I think the postal strike can cause us a lot of trouble because most postal employees work, but I suggest that a strike by these others might be very helpful if they would stay off for about a week. Congress might then get the message that they do not do anything, that we do not need them, and we might invite them not to come back at all.

DANGER OF MOOD CONTROL DRUGS

(Mr. HANNA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Speaker, a week or so ago I addressed the House on the question of mood control drugs. I brought up the problem we face in terms of the permissive toleration on the part of our society regarding mood control drugs. The problem effects both the adults who are using these drugs legally as well as the children who are using them illegally.

I was very impressed to find that Dr. James L. Goddard, the former Chief of the Food and Drug Administration, testifying before one of our committees, posed the problem that some American housewives are themselves "junkies." The housewife gulps pills to pep her up, others to calm her down, and still others to let her sleep.

On medical grounds Dr. Goddard says that we probably do not need over a million of the 8 billion amphetamine tablets produced annually. Of the 8 billion barbiturates and 4 billion tranquilizers, only a small percentage are really necessary. He proposes that we immediately tax these legally produced pills to provide funds with which we can then use to educate our people as to the medical effects of what we are doing both to our adult and to our child populations.

Perhaps we can then begin to unwind this problem that has been plaguing our society for some time.

WHY NOT DIVIDE MONEY POURED INTO CONGO AMONG POSTAL WORKERS?

(Mr. DICKINSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in reading in this morning's Post an article of Mobutu's Congo regime wherein it was pointed out with great pride the great stability that he has brought to that country of some 16 million people.

But, Mr. Speaker, I was also very amazed and surprised to learn that in the past 9 years the United States has poured in almost a half billion dollars into this country to bring it to its present state of stability.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, in view of the postal employees wildcat strike, that if we had taken just this money and divided it among the 750,000 postal employees, they could get an annual raise of $667 per postal employee or $255 more than the average increase at 5.4 percent per employee that was passed by the House.

We should have met the problem that has been plaguing us here at home instead of pouring $1½ billion down the rathole in the Congo. What priority should come first? Stability at home or stability in the Congo, financed by U.S. taxpayers? For my money, I prefer stability in the United States as the No. 1 priority.

NORTH CAROLINA POSTAL WORKERS COMMENDED

(Mr. MIZELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MIZELL. Mr. Speaker, during the past week, many parts of the Nation have been faced with a major crisis as a result of the massive walkout staged by postal workers in some of the major cities of the Northeast and Midwest. Labor negotiations are often very difficult, and postal workers, because of the importance of their jobs, are somewhat restricted as to the ways that they can legally express their desires. At a time these Federal employess are in need of financial consideration, and when emotions are running high in all areas of the country, I commend the postal workers in the Fifth District as well as throughout North Carolina for recognizing their responsibility to serve the people and for remaining on their job.

Inflation has taken its toll and these people deserve to be able to maintain a decent standard of living.

The need for wide-range postal reform is great, and I am happy to say that long awaited legislation designed to solve many of our postal problems has now been ordered out of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee. When this legislation will reach the floor of the House, I cannot say. It is entirely up to the House leadership. I cannot overemphasize the immediate need for this vital reform, and it is my wish that the entire Congress have the opportunity to consider this legislation as soon as possible. In the meantime, I strongly commend our North Carolina postal employees for their patience and for recognizing their commitment to serve the people and the businesses of this Nation.

SENATOR MILTON R. YOUNG—25 YEARS IN THE SENATE

(Mr. KLEPPE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KLEPPE. Mr. Speaker, Thursday, March 19, marked the 25th consecutive year of distinguished service in the Senate of the United States by my good friend and fellow North Dakotan, Senator MILTON R. YOUNG.

Not many Members of the Congress have been privileged to serve for a quarter of a century. He is the first from North Dakota to achieve that mark.

Even more impressive than the length of his service is the quality of the dedicated service he has given to the people of his State and Nation, MILT YOUNG has been a doer and a mover since the first day he came to the Senate. His imprint is on virtually every piece of major legislation relating to farm programs, rural electrification, and conservation which has been enacted during the last quarter of a century.

Today, as ranking minority member of the Senate Appropriations Committee and second ranking minority member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, and as a man who has earned the highest respect of his colleagues, MILT YOUNG stands among the top leaders of the Senate. Before coming to Washington, he served with distinction in both the North Dakota House and Senate.

His own modesty would prevent him from thinking of himself as a statesman, but he is one, nevertheless. His integrity, his constant devotion to the best interests of his country have, I know, made him a statesman of first rank in the eyes of the people of North Dakota and all who know him.

No one has been more helpful to me than MILT YOUNG during my time in Washington. I have found his counsel, his broad knowledge of legislation, invaluable. For this and other reasons, I have an especially warm and personal friendship for him.

On his 25th year in the Senate, I wish him all the best and many, many more years of service to his State and Nation.

POSTAL SITUATION

(Mr. PUCINSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the President intends to announce to the Nation at 2 o'clock this afternoon what his plan is to break the tragic impasse between the postal workers and the Post Office Department which has stopped delivery of mail in this country.

It occurs to me that the most expeditious way to solve this problem would be for the President to advise the chairman of the Senate Post Office Committee and the chairman of the House Post Office Committee to send him up H.R. 13000 forthwith and he will sign it.

There is no reason why there should be this stoppage and impasse in this country. Nor can anyone defend or justify an illegal strike against the Government of the United States.

But, this House last October passed legislation providing for a two-step increase in postal salaries, 5½ percent retroactive to October 1, 1969, and another 5½ percent effective as of July 1 of this year.

The Senate on December 12 passed its own version, which provides a somewhat lower postal pay raise than the House version.

There is really no reason why we should have this work stoppage today. The postal workers saw this Chamber act 6 months ago, but the money is still not in their weekly paycheck. I honestly believe that if the President would separate the question of postal pay from postal reform—and I intend to support him on postal reform—but I think if the President would separate those two, then we could have mail flowing late this afternoon or early this evening. It is my hope that the President stop trying to come up with any more gimmicks and address himself to this fundamental problem.

Postal workers in the city of Chicago get less money than dishwashers in a restaurant. That is what this whole dispute is all about. The fact of the matter is that all of us know that they are underpaid and that the answer to this problem is to give them some money in their pay envelope, in their April 1 paycheck.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke to many of these postal workers during the weekend and they all say they are determined not to return merely on a promise of a pay raise. They want concrete proof the additional money will be forthcoming and that is why I believe the best approach now is to have the President state he will approve a pay raise now and work out details on postal reform as quickly as possible.

JETS TO ISRAEL

(Mr. ADDABBO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, the President's decision to postpone the sale of additional jets to Israel is a serious error and a direct contradiction of statements by this administration that there has been no change in our Mideast policy.

I call on my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to speak out in bipartisan expression of our disappointment with the President's decision and to urge the President to reverse the current policy of retreating from the support of our ally, the nation of Israel. This decision is a blunder which will encourage Arab nations to pursue their policy of terrorism in the Middle East. The Congress must not allow this decision to destroy our close ties with Israel but rather we must assume the responsibility for correcting this mistake and healing diplomatic wounds inflicted on Israel by an administration which apparently does not understand the scope or implication of the Mideast crisis.

I believe that the majority of House Members disagree with the President's decision and will support efforts to change the President's mind on the Israel request for additional aircraft.

I cannot understand how the present administration can talk about balance while we train Arab pilots here in the United States and the President of France has recently announced the sale of 100 planes to Libya.

I call upon the President and his advisers to reassess their statements and position and bring them back into true and just balance, which must heed the needs of Israel.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON FISHERIES AND WILDLIFE, COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES, TO SIT DURING GENERAL DEBATE TODAY

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries may sit during general debate today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE TO SIT DURING GENERAL DEBATE TODAY

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may sit during general debate today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

THE RESPONSIBILITY IS WITH CONGRESS

(Mr. RHODES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all Members of the House are desirous of ending the impasse in the postal delivery situation as rapidly as possible. The gentleman from Illinois has just made a point which I think is a good one, that there is legislation which is pending which can be sent to the White House. I suggest, however, that he has placed the responsibility for sending that legislation on the wrong shoulders. The Constitution provides for a separation of powers. The Congress sends legislation to the President which it deems wise and which it believes should be adopted. The President then either signs the bill or he vetoes it.

The President has never had a chance either to sign or veto this piece of legislation. I am suggesting to the gentleman from Illinois that the proper subject of his plea for action is the Congress of the United States and not the President.

I also suggest that it would not be wise—and I think the gentleman might agree with me—for any legislative action to be taken as long as an illegal strike is in progress, as long as the mails are being impeded, and not being delivered as a result of a wildcat, illegal strike.

I sincerely hope that this Congress and the administration will not act "under the gun." I think if we were to do so, it would constitute a precedent which would rise to haunt us for many, many years in the future.

PAN-AMERICAN DAY, APRIL 14, 1970

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 889) and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 889

Resolved, That the House of Representatives hereby designates Tuesday, April 14, 1970, for the celebration of Pan-American Day, on which day, after the reading of the Journal, remarks appropriate to such occasion may occur.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 91-284)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the message from the President to the Congress of the United States.

The Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Seventeen years ago President Eisenhower established the Small Business Administration (SBA). This marked the first peacetime recognition by the Federal Government of the special needs of small businesses.

—Today there are in the United States an estimated 5,400,000 independent businesses, of which 95 percent are small by SBA size standards.

—97 percent of our nation's firms employ fewer than 100 full-time workers.

—The small business sector of the economy contributes roughly 37 percent of the gross national product and is responsible for over 40 percent of U.S. employment.

We all know the almost legendary stories of men in the past and in our time who have started out in small business with little more than an idea and a belief in themselves and have gone on to great financial success. Yet small business can also mean other things.

—It can mean for the nation a source of independent innovation which continually offers new products and services needed by any economy if it is to remain vital.

—It can mean the everyday success of the average businessman whether he owns his own retail or service enterprise or heads a small manufacturing concern. It is a quiet kind of success that doesn't make the big news on the financial page, but makes life more rewarding for millions of Americans. It is the kind of success that offers personal services to consumers—and personal satisfaction to the businessman.

—It can mean a chance for a young American to bring not only his talent but his individuality to the challenges of the business world.

—It can also mean an opportunity for dignity and for economic and social progress for many Americans previously without access to the economic system of our nation. Small business in a way to become a part of that system—and, after seeing it work, believe in it, in its promises and in its challenges.

THE REPORT OF THE TASK FORCE ON IMPROVING THE PROSPECTS OF SMALL BUSINESS

In order to discover ways in which we could help improve the prospects of small business in the United States, I appointed a Task Force, chaired by Mr. J. Wilson Newman of New York, to report to me. In line with recommendations in their report, I am:

—Directing the Small Business Administration to emphasize its role as the advocate of the interest of small business. I am further directing all agencies to take these interests fully into account in their activities affecting small business.

—Proposing legislation to expand research to provide a clear picture of the problems, the trends and the needs of small business and a clear picture of the impact of Government on small business.

—Proposing legislation to create a new position of Assistant Secretary in the Department of Commerce to assist in formulating policy for the Office of Minority Business Enterprise (OMBE). I established OMBE early in my Administration to coordinate programs and activities within the Federal Government aimed at assisting minorities to enter the American economic mainstream. This is an extremely important undertaking.

The Task Force identified three major problem areas that can be found in all parts of the small business community, including that of the disadvantaged entrepreneur:

—The need for capital and for recognition of the special financial problems small firms may face in their early years;

—The need for sound management counseling; and —The need for people and especially for trained people.

In order to help small business in these areas, I am proposing a far-reaching legislative program.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

The Small Business Task Force found in surveys of businessmen across the nation that one-fifth of those consulted ranked financing first among their problems. Interest assistance, incentives to make loans, tax reform, bonding for small contractors and Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Companies (MESBIC) are five major areas for action.

INTEREST ASSISTANCE

The risk of failure for small business is high, and the early years are the most perilous. These are the years in which the small businessman most often finds himself short of working capital and when high interest rates can have their greatest impact. In order to help small businessmen in such crucial early years, I propose legislation to authorize the Small Business Administration to make grants to borrowers whose loans are guaranteed by the SBA. These grants would narrow the gap between the prevailing interest rates and the statutory interest rate for SBA direct loans.

INCENTIVES TO MAKE LOANS

Another problem area of financing is that of providing adequate incentives to the private sector to make high-risk loans to small business. The cost of processing a small loan may and often does equal or exceed the cost of processing a large loan. In order to help the man who needs a small loan that carries a higher-than-usual degree of risk, I am proposing legislation that would offer compensation in the form of tax incentives to those lenders who bear the additional cost of making such loans. The incentive would be an income tax deduction equal to 20 percent of the interest earned on SBA-guaranteed loans.

To further assist in this area, I am proposing legislation that the SBA be permitted to delegate to the banks to the full extent it deems advisable the authority to make loans that the SBA guarantees, provided the bank retains a portion of the risk. Also, the SBA is revising its procedures so that a bank, with SBA approval, can use its regular loan forms rather than the special SBA forms.

A variety of organizations other than banks—foundations, trusts, church groups, community groups and others—are also interested in assisting the small business efforts of the disadvantaged by loan programs. To encourage these efforts, I also propose legislation to give the SBA the authority to guarantee loans by such organizations.

TAX REFORMS FOR SMALL BUSINESS

The man who is willing to take the financial risks involved in beginning a small business should be encouraged. In recognition of these risks, I propose legislation to provide the following tax reforms:

—Revision of "Subchapter S" of the Internal Revenue Code to make it easier for small business to be treated like a partnership for tax purposes.

—A ten-year tax loss carry-forward period, instead of the present 5-year period. This extension will be of special use to those new businesses that find it necessary during the early years to spend large amounts of money on research and development.

BONDING

No treatment of the problems of small business—especially those problems in the inner city—would be complete without consideration of the problem of insurance, including crime and property protection and surety bonds for construction.

On June 30, 1970, the Federal Insurance Administrator will report on these matters as required by the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968. However, the urgency of the need to provide assistance relative to surety bonds for small business calls for immediate action. Accordingly, I am proposing legislation that would enable the SBA to guarantee, for a fee, as much as 90 percent of surety bonds up to $500,000 for small contractors who are qualified by SBA standards but lack the resources to qualify for bonding in the open market. Additional action regarding bonding may be called for in the Federal Insurance Administrator's report.

MINORITY ENTERPRISE SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT COMPANY

The MESBIC concept shows promise of becoming an important tool for the generation of capital and as a source of managerial assistance for the disadvantaged who need help in small business. The Federal government matches the MESBIC sponsor on a "2 for 1" basis. The "leverage" power of this concept can be seen in an example: If a sponsor puts $150,000 into his MESBIC, the government lends it $300,000. This $450,000, with the application of other loans it generates, can result in over $2 million for new enterprises. Of equal importance is the availability of the sponsor's managerial talents.

To provide additional tools to assist this program, I propose legislation to provide:

—Statutory authorization for a bank to become involved in the program as the sole sponsor of a MESBIC.

—Ordinary income tax deductions for contributions to MESBICs organized and operating under non-profit corporation statutes. This would provide a tax incentive for doubling the commitment of funds.

The legislation being proposed also reflects the intention that the program assist all the socially and economically disadvantaged who need such assistance.

PERSONNEL AND MANAGEMENT ASSISTANCE

In its survey, the Small Business Task Force discovered that two out of every five responses listed the quality and availability of personnel as a major problem. It also is probably the most difficult one to solve. However, there are steps that can be taken at this time.

JOBS PROGRAM

The Secretary of Labor is initiating an expansion of the Federal JOBS (Job Opportunities in the Business Sector) Program that will aid small business. The JOBS Program until now has been in practice suitable only to larger corporations. But under this new program, consortiums of small businessmen—with the cooperation of local organizations such as boards of trade and chambers of commerce—will receive Federal assistance to offset the extraordinary costs of training employees until they become fully productive.

STOCK OPTIONS

In order to offset the advantages large businesses have in attracting managerial talent, I am sending legislation to the Congress which would revise the tax rules for stock options as they relate to small business. The proposal would extend the qualified option exercise period from five to eight years and reduce the required holding period for the stock from three years to one year. This should substantially assist small, technically-oriented growth companies in their competition with larger companies for managerial and other talent.

MANAGERIAL TRAINING ASSISTANCE

In order to help disadvantaged entrepreneurs get the kind of business know-how needed for success in small business, I propose legislation that would provide management training for those among the disadvantaged who are entrepreneurs and prospective entrepreneurs. Assistance would be offered for extension courses, night school and other management training courses.

Small business is an important part of our national life; it has been an important part of my personal life as well. My father knew the challenges and the rewards of owning and operating a small store. To him—and to our family—that store meant more than a source of income; it meant a daily challenge, a place where we could work out the destiny of the family in our own way, taking the risks, and enjoying the satisfactions of ownership. Looking back on those years, I know now that our store was a success not only because of what it did for our family budget, but for what it did for our spirit. I know that today, in helping Americans in small business, we are helping their spirit—and the spirit of our nation.

The message was, without objection, referred by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. PRICE of Illinois) to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL OF THE NATIONAL WEATHER SERVICE

(Mr WOLD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLD. Mr. Speaker, man has always watched the weather, sometimes praising, sometimes lamenting. Man, however, has never studied the weather more carefully and followed and reported its behavior more accurately than during the last 100 years in this country. The U.S. Weather Service, established in 1870, is enjoying its centennial.

I want to recognize and commend the men and women of this fine branch of the Department of Commerce who have provided this service. In Wyoming, a State in which adverse weather, if not accurately traced and predicted, can have devastating impact on the extensive agricultural industry, we are especially proud of our weather specialists, Mr. Thomas Rule and Mr. John Alyea, of Cheyenne; Mr. Diel Coulter, of Casper; Mr. Ivin Gee, of Lander, and Mr. William Troxler, of Sheridan. These men and their staffs are our important weather eyes and ears. We realize their importance and thank them for their fine work.

AUTHORIZING EXTENSION OF CERTAIN NAVAL VESSEL LOANS AND NEW LOANS

Mr. O'NEILL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 876 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 876

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 15728) to authorize the extension of certain naval vessel loans now in existence and new loans, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'NEILL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. SMITH) pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 876 provides an open rule with 1 hour of general debate for consideration of H.R. 15728 to authorize the extension of certain naval vessel loans now in existence and new loans, and for other purposes.

The purpose of H.R. 15728 is to authorize the extension for an additional 5 years of existing loans of one submarine for Greece and one submarine to Pakistan and to authorize a new loan for two destroyer escorts to the Republic of Vietnam, two destroyers and two submarines to Turkey, and three submarines to the Republic of China.

The submarine loaned to Greece and the one loaned to Pakistan were loaned under the act of 1961 and each requires congressional authorization for the extension.

The 11 ships involved are not now required for the defense of the United States and may be recalled if necessitated.

Enactment of the legislation will involve the expenditure of approximately $17 million. In the case of Turkey, costs will be charged to funds programed for it under foreign aid or to funds provided by that country. The cost associated with the Republic of Vietnam would under existing procedures be absorbed within current available Navy funds. The cost associated with the Republic of China would be charged to that Government.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of House Resolution 876 in order that H.R. 15728 may be considered.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, as stated by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, House Resolution 876 does provide for 1 hour of general debate under the rule for consideration of the bill (H.R. 15728) to authorize the extension of certain naval vessel loans now in existence and new loans, and for other purposes.

The purpose of the bill is to extend our existing naval vessel loan program to several countries, and to authorize the broadening of the program to include other nations under the provisions.

Existing loans of one submarine to Greece and one submarine to Pakistan are continued by the bill. New loans are also authorized. These include the loan of two destroyer escorts to the Republic of Vietnam, two destroyers and two submarines to Turkey, and three submarines to the Republic of China.

The 11 ships on loan or to be loaned are not needed by the U.S. Navy. The loan program is in our best interest as well as that of the countries to whom the loans are made.

Cost of the legislation is estimated at $17 million. Part of this amount will be charged to funds already made available to the recipient country or will be absorbed within current Navy funds.

The Department of Defense supports the bill but was not consulted after the three submarines for the Republic of China were added to the bill.

There are no minority views.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of House Resolution 876.

Mr. O'NEILL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 15728) to authorize the extension of certain naval vessel loans now in existence and new loans, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 15728, with Mr. DORN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RIVERS) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRAY) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RIVERS).

Mr. RIVERS. I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 15728.

This bill is one of the ship loan bills and would extend loans of one submarine to Greece and one submarine to Pakistan. It would also authorize new loans of two destroyer escorts to the Republic of Vietnam, two destroyers and two submarines to the Government of Turkey, and three submarines to the Republic of China.

Mr. Chairman, as you know, the Navy recently has removed a large number of ships from active service. These ships are still considered valuable enough to be carried on the Register of Naval Vessels. Loaning these ships to our allies will help put into effect the Nixon doctrine of letting our allies bear more responsibility for their local defenses. All of these ships will be available for antisubmarine warfare—ASW—operations at a time when our own ASW operations are being curtailed and when the Soviet submarine operations are expanding.

The Department of Defense regards as most important the achievement of a strong antisubmarine capability in the areas where these ships are loaned. This contribution by the recipient countries to offsetting a prospective submarine threat enhances the total defense capability of the free world. To the extent that recipient countries develop an antisubmarine capability, U.S. naval forces will be freed for other antisubmarine tasks.

Although the U.S. Navy Reserve Fleet is a source of great potential naval strength, this potentiality would be increased if all the ships could be adequately manned, operated, and maintained in an active status. The cost of such operation by the United States is prohibitive in peacetime. Operation and maintenance of the vessels by allies can assist in keeping the equipment ready for use and in good condition.

At the present time the Navy has had severe cuts in the size of its fleet. Within the past year the active fleet dropped from 894 to 722. Of the ships that have been retired from active service some of them have been found still to be capable of further use to the Navy as part of the Reserve Fleet. It is from this group of ships which are being retired that the additional ships involved in this bill will be drawn.

Of these additional ships, it is proposed to lend two destroyers and two submarines to the Government of Turkey. Turkey's strategic position astride the Bosporus makes it important that we continue to give her assistance. This is especially so in view of the large buildup of Soviet ships operating in the Mediterranean—most of which traverse the Bosporus. The destroyers and the submarines will be especially helpful to the United States in NATO antisubmarine warfare activities in the Mediterranean. The two submairnes authorized by this bill permit the retirement by Turkey of two submarines previously loaned which no longer have even a marginal capability.

The two destroyer escorts which are being loaned to the Republic of Vietnam will help the President's policy of Vietnamization of the war in Southeast Asia.

In the overall defense of the Western Pacific the Republic of China had undertaken a role of participating in antisubmarine-warfare activities. Permitting China to have three submarines does not introduce a new weapons system into the area but lets China replace the United States in the localization of the defense of an area where the Communist Chinese have over 30 Whiskey class submarines provided by the Soviets and flying the Red Chinese flag. In addition to helping to meet their threat, providing the submarines to China at this time will permit China to continue having submarines to use in ASW training since the services the United States has heretofore provided for this training are being curtailed. The area for which China is exercising some ASW responsibility is one of the areas where we will be providing reduced protection due to the cutbacks in our Pacific surface and submarine fleet.

I think it is important to note one thing about the bill at this time. This bill is an authorization. It is not a mandate. The Committee on Armed Services saw the need for the submarines for China at a time when it had a legislative bill before it. Rather than wait for the wheels of the executive branch to grind out a legislative proposal, we added the submarines for China. The need is there. If the President in his wisdom does not want to make use of this authorization, he need not. This bill gives him the power to go ahead but he will make the decision whether to use this power.

With respect to the ships whose loans are being extended by this legislation, the submarine which is being continued in Greece will also be available for NATO exercises in the Mediterranean while the submarine which is being continued in Pakistan will provide a small proxy for U.S. presence in the Indian Ocean at a time when the Soviets are now moving to fill the vacuum created by the withdrawal of British naval forces in that area.

Mr. Chairman, I urge passage of H.R. 15728.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 15728. Over the period of years since 1951 the Congress has passed a number of bills under which we have loaned ships to allies. This bill would continue that practice as is required by section 7307 of title 10 in the United States Code.

This year we come before you with a bill which would renew the loan of one submarine to Greece and one to Pakistan. In addition, it would authorize new loans of two destroyers to Vietnam, two destroyers and two submarines to Turkey and three submarines to the Republic of China.

One of the biggest threats facing the United States at this time is the Soviet fleet of over 375 submarines. This bill which is before you today would allow each of the nations to participate a little more in antisubmarine warfare activities in their local areas and this will relieve the United States of this burden.

The lending of ships to our allies, while it started by statute in 1951, is also in support of the Nixon doctrine as announced at Guam. There he promised that we would provide material to those who are threatened in a non-nuclear-type situation but that the local country would have to be the primary source of manpower.

Because of the recent inactivation of a large number of ships in the U.S. Navy, we have ships which we can keep in operating condition by lending them to our allies in accordance with the provisions of this bill. Otherwise, these ships would be mothballed and laid up in storage. If they are needed in any future emergency we can, if we so desire, recall them for use with our own active fleet.

The loans to Greece and Pakistan are merely extensions of earlier loans. The destroyers to Vietnam are being turned over to that country as part of the effort in the Vietnamization of the war in Southeast Asia. The destroyers and submarines which would be loaned to Turkey would enable Turkey to protect its interest, particularly in the Bosporus. Both Greece and Turkey are members of NATO and will employ their ships in NATO exercises and NATO defenses. With respect to submarines to China, the committee saw the need for these in light of the withdrawal of U.S. submarines from the area and added the submarines out of the group being retired by the Navy. In this manner the committee is making available to the President the statutory authority to transfer these submarines to the Republic of China without having to wait for further legislative action. This bill merely authorizes the loan of the ships, it does not require it. If the President does not want to use this power he need not. However, having seen the problem at a time when we have the ship loan bill before us we thought it best to proceed.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly support H.R. 15728.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the matter has been fully explained by the distinguished chairman of the committee (Mr. RIVERS). All this legislation calls for is for renewed loans of one ship to Greece and one to Pakistan. It adds two destroyers to Vietnam, two destroyers and two submarines to Turkey, and three submarines to Nationalist China.

As has already been pointed out, these are ships that the United States does not need, ships that we are not now using, and ships, however, that can be valuable to the interests of the United States because they will be in the hands of friendly countries. In fact, as to Nationalist China, if it had not been for President Truman, and later President Eisenhower's action in furnishing equipment for the defense of that island, the country now probably would be under the Red Chinese, under the iron hand of a Communist government. Today Nationalist China is one of the most prosperous countries in Asia and is a friend of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there was any opposition in the committee to this. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER).

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to question the wisdom of providing in this bill for the loan of three submarines to the Republic of China. I think certain facts are undisputed; first, the Republic of China—Taiwan—has no submarines today; second, they lack trained personnel to operate the submarines; and, third, they lack the capability to repair the submarines.

It is also undisputed that the loan authority was not requested by the President.

Finally, it is clear to us, or to those of us who heard Under Secretary Elliot Richardson the other day that, at least, for his part, there has not been an adequate case made for this loan.

One of the questions that needs to be answered is: Is Taiwan threatened today by Red China? An examination of the deployment of the forces of mainland China indicates that they are deployed in a defensive posture. This is established in an analysis published by the Institute for Strategic Studies located in London.

Moreover, if one examines the naval capability of the Communist Chinese it becomes evident that they lack the capability to transport sufficient troops to adequately carry on any invasion. Admiral McCain last year indicated in testimony before the Foreign Affairs Committee that in his opinion an attack on Taiwan by mainland China would be foolhardy. He said that the Taiwanese have steadily developed their capability to deter the Chinese Communists from attempting an invasion.

With those facts reasonably well established in the record, the question arises, "Why should we not, nevertheless, loan the Taiwan Government these three submarines?"

In the first place, this introduces a new weapons system so far as the Republic of China is concerned. They do not have any submarines today and this would put at their disposal these U.S. submarines for their use and under their control and for their purposes—not under our control and for our purposes—but under their control for their purposes. That is an important distinction. It is true that in the Western Pacific there are submarines today, whether they be Soviet, United States, or Red Chinese—but to give to the Government of Taiwan, the Republic of China, submarines, puts into their hands a military capability, a new weapons system which they do not have today.

Now beyond this it adds to the cost of maintaining a military establishment in Taiwan. The estimates we have from the Department of Defense indicate that it would cost at least $6 million to bring these submarines up to the point where they would be transferred to the Government of Taiwan and then the annual operating costs of those submarines would be on the order of $7 million a year—closer to $8 million a year.

It is provided that in this bill that these costs would be borne by the Government of Taiwan, the Republic of China. The fact of the matter is that the Republic of China today continues to be the beneficiary of the military assistance program and there cannot be any doubt that whether this money is spent by the Government of Taiwan or whether it is considered to come out of our military assistance program, the effect is the same—it increases the cost of the Military Establishment being maintained by the Government of Taiwan by that amount.

Today the Government of Taiwan, the Republic of China, maintains some 400,000 army troops. I think it can be argued and I think the Department of State and the Department of Defense would say that this is larger than that government needs to maintain, for purely defensive purposes.

Were it not for the Vietnam war, we would be suggesting to that government that they ought to scale down and not to increase, but to scale down the size of the military establishment that they maintain, as being in excess of the needs for their defensive purposes and creating a burden which should not be placed either on the military assistance program or on the people of Taiwan.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YATES. In reading the report, I do not see any statement by the Department of Defense with respect to these submarines for Taiwan. Is the Department in favor or opposed to the grant?

Mr. FRASER. The Department of Defense, to my knowledge has not made any formal statement. The only statement from the administration which I am aware of is a statement by the Under Secretary last week, on the Hill, when he said that he did not believe a sufficient case had been made for the transfer of these submarines.

Mr. YATES. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. I want first to say how much I admire the effort of the gentleman from Minnesota to spotlight this issue and to get the House at least to think about what it will be doing if it votes to authorize the loan of these submarines. We are continually indebted to the gentleman from Minnesota for his unstinting work in the little grinding ways that make such a difference here in the long run, as well as for the courage and intelligence of his leadership on great problems.

One aspect of this proposed transaction that troubles me is the degree to which "loaning" submarines might involve the United States in further military activity on or near the Asian mainland. Does the gentleman have any idea of what would happen if Nationalist China used these submarines against Communist China and if Communist China then retaliated against Nationalist China? How deeply involved in defending Nationalist China would we then be? Might not our treaty commitments come into play? In short, might not the transfer of submarines—added to the transfer of the jet bombers—does all this not begin to smack of, or at least, risk, escalating the Chinese civil war in such a way as to make increased American involvement very likely?

Mr. FRASER. The United States does have a bilateral defense treaty with Taiwan supplemented by the Formosa resolution, all going back some years. But if a war breaks out in which Taiwan is attacked, we are under an obligation and I do not know the precise range of it, to be involved in her defense.

Mr. Chairman, I think that points up one of the problems we have here. This new weapons system is to be placed at the disposal of the Taiwan Government which is maintaining troop forces which are larger than it needs for defensive purposes. There is being placed at their disposal a means of harassing the mainland—harassing the mainland in a number of ways—by the harassment of shipping through covert means and by enabling her to land saboteurs and raiding parties on the mainland.

There may be some who think that is a good idea, but I doubt that it really is. Right now there is no hot war between the two Chinas. There remains an unfinished civil war.

Two percent of the Chinese population is on the island of Taiwan and the other 98 percent is on the mainland. Both sides agree that there is only one China, but thus far they have not sought to bring that conflict to an end through military means, and one would hope that so long as both sides persist in the one-China concept, they would look to a peaceful solution to the civil war.

It seems to me that the United States, bound by treaty to Taiwan, ought to attempt to insure that our involvement there would only come about in the event there were a major threat, followed by a real attack on Taiwan. We ought not put into the hands of the Taiwan government the offensive capabilities which could draw us into more military adventures in the far Pacific.

I do not advocate turning our backs on our treaty responsibilities to Taiwan, but I do advocate our urging that government to scale down its military forces. We certainly should not engage in an enlargement of the range and sophistication of the weaponry we give to Taiwan, particularly weaponry with offensive capabilities. We should not put those kinds of sophisticated weapons into the hands of the Taiwan government.

Mr. Chairman, at the appropriate time I will move to strike the authorization for the three submarines to Taiwan until such time as a better case has been made for them.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute. As I said in my earlier statement, the bill does not put anything into the hands of anybody. It merely gives the President the right to do these things.

Some time ago, when we had a ship construction bill, in 1967, the DOD did not ask for additional destroyers, but during consideration of the legislation the committee added three new ships, one destroyer for the Republic of China and two for Korea. The Department did not ask for them. The President, in his wisdom, saw that we were further down the road than he was, and he implemented the authorization. The bill does not make him do anything. At the proper time I will answer this question more fully, but I wish to point out now that if these three submarines were used as the gentleman suggests, it would be the first time in the history of civilization that three submarines from a little island called Formosa invaded China, a place containing more than 800 million people. That would really be something for the books.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding. On page 9 of the report, the following statement appears:

> The Department of Defense and the Bureau of the Budget have no objection to this bill, except that they have not been asked about the submarines to China.

That language strikes me as a very curious statement. I wonder if you could inform us why the Departments were not asked to state their views on submarines to China.

Mr. RIVERS. Of course, we did not ask the DOD about it. We heard their witnesses. Let me answer you by saying that we do not rubberstamp the Department of Defense.

Mr. FINDLEY. I think that is commendable.

Mr. RIVERS. Of course it is commendable.

Mr. FINDLEY. The gentleman asked for their views on all other items except this one and you received an expression from them.

Mr. RIVERS. We have never followed that course and we never will. The Department of Defense submitted the basic bill. We questioned responsible witnesses. The Navy cut down the number of active ships in its fleet. If the gentleman was here when I was speaking at the outset of the debate, he heard me say that they have cut the number down at least 172 ships.

We are leaving the Taiwan Straits. If the President wants to stay out, there is nothing mandatory about this bill. The Navy would like to see this. What else does the gentleman want?

Mr. FINDLEY. I think the gentleman has somewhat weakened his case by failing to ask the Departments as to their reaction. The report sets forth that they have no objection to all other parts.

Mr. RIVERS. The Department of Defense does not operate anything. The Navy operates our ships. The Department of Defense forms the policy.

Mr. FINDLEY. Has the Navy set forth its position as to the other provisions in this bill?

Mr. RIVERS. I have told the gentleman the Navy would like to have these.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE).

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER). At the outset I will state I do not like to get into someone else's bill. Unfortunately, I have had this same experience when we brought in our military assistance bill, and other people interfered in that one.

Also, I have great respect for the chairman of this committee and for the ranking minority member, and I thank the gentleman for giving me this opportunity to speak, but I am greatly concerned about this issue and that is why I take this time to support the amendment.

The proposal to loan these three subs to Taiwan to me looks like what something this body did with reference to the foreign aid bill. I refer, of course, to the fight we had over the giving of Phantom jets to China last December. As my colleagues will recall, I strongly opposed the gift of those jets. I am just as opposed at this time to the sub deal worked out by the Committee on Armed Services. The reasons for my opposition are many, and I would like to share them with my colleagues.

To begin with, the loan, as stated in this colloquy, was never requested by the administration. Moreover, the Armed Services Committee clearly states in its report:

> The three submarines for the Republic of China were added in committee before the views of the DOD were requested.

I repeat, the Department of Defense was not even asked about these subs. For that matter, a careful reading of the hearings indicates that the Department of Defense, which is charged with great responsibility in this area, does not support the loan. But even if this were not clear, I think it is obvious that Defense would require a great deal of time to think the proposed loan over because of all its ramifications.

One such ramification is the all-important foreign policy aspect. Here we are with President Nixon trying to improve relations with mainland China. So what do we do? We would not even give him or the Department of State a chance to see what this loan would do to that new, and very delicate, policy.

I would also remind my colleagues there is a very practical question that should be raised. Does China have the military capability to handle the subs we propose to loan it? They have no subs right now. They have no sub personnel. They have no sub training facilities. They have no sub repair facilities. In view of all this, I certainly think the question should be raised, and adequately answered, before we go ahead with these plans.

Mr. Chairman, I am very disturbed by the way in which this loan was included in the bill before us. As I read the hearings, I get the feeling that the committee was searching very hard for a reason to loan some subs to China. I feel as I did in the case of the jets last year. That is, if China needs these subs, then let a request for them come through normal and legitimate channels.

Let the Department of Defense come to us and say the subs are essential to both the Chinese and the U.S. military posture in the Far East. Let the Department of State come up and say they have studied the foreign policy implications of this loan, and they are satisfied it will not conflict with President Nixon's policy toward mainland China. Then give us a chance to study these positions and decide whether or not the proposed loan is justified.

Mr. Chairman, seldom before in the history of our great Nation have the processes of government come under such close scrutiny as they have today. As Members well know, seldom before has our military policy been so carefully analyzed and criticized.

No time is the right time for us, the elected representatives of all the people, to operate outside the established rules of this body. Today is obviously not the time to violate this principle of government.

I therefore urge my colleagues to support the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

I might say here, Mr. Chairman, that only a few weeks ago we had General Warren up before our Committee on Foreign Aid. At that time my last inquiry to him was. "General, is this all you want for Formosa? I have been a great supporter of military assistance to Formosa, but I do not want to go down on the floor of the House in 2 months, when we bring this bill out, and be confronted by a secret document handled by a Member of this House saying that Formosa now needs some Phantom jets and they need some destroyers or they may need some other military equipment. Is this all you are asking in military assistance for Formosa?"

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. CONTE. He said, "Yes, this is it."

I realize that this is a loan and does not come under the MAP program, but he said, "Yes, this is all we need."

Let me tell the Members this: After we voted that military assistance bill in this House and finally knocked out those jets, Formosa was treated pretty well. They got a beautiful Christmas package, with over 30 C–119's. I will not give the exact figures, because they are classified. There were over 35 F–100's, over 20 F–104's, and they got a good many tanks. They got thousands of M–14 rifles. We treated Formosa pretty well. There was over $150 million in military goodies plus what we had in the bill for Formosa under the military assistance program.

All I am saying is, let us have hearings, so we could question these people handling this program to find out whether the subs actually are needed.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RIVERS. Has the gentleman's own committee ever handled a ship loan bill?

Mr. CONTE. No. I mentioned that. We do not have the loan program. We only have the military assistance program.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. HALL).

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I stand here as a member of the Committee on Armed Services who asked and obtained permission for this bill to be delayed until such time as many of the explanations that have been asked here today were made by the proper authorities of the Department of Defense and certainly the Department of the Navy.

I have been thoroughly satisfied in my requests for this further information as to the mutual advantages of this foreign military loan, under one of the devices by which we may make these ships available to member nations of NATO and to other sovereign nations who will help us in our continually reduced ability to satisfy our security commitments around the world.

Those mutual advantages are as listed in the report, internal and external security, and a much-needed antisubmarine capability.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing that helps to track another killer submarine as much as a submarine. Readiness and maintenance with prepositioning of equipment around the world and dispersion of our reserve fleet rather than the costly process of putting it in mothballs. Also a favorable extension of what is referred to in the Department of State as the U.S. influence.

I think it is terribly wrong to compare the loan of submarines or the sale of ships under the Foreign Military Sales Act to the Republic of China, to the question of the jet aircraft recently considered in the foreign aid bill and marked out in conference. This is a proposition to fill the vacuum left by the 7th U.S. Fleet which had been patrolling the Straits of Taiwan until recently but even more than that these ships were not available at the time the original bill came over to the Congress with the DOD or the U.S. Navy request. They have now been scheduled for deactivation. They are now available and hence have been added to this bill.

I think it must be borne in mind that up until now the Republic of China has had no submarine capability and certainly we can control these three submarines if we have to supply all the parts and replacements. This is standard whether it is aircraft, important ships of the Navy, or whatnot. The Republic of China on Taiwan does have a sizable surface antisubmarine warfare force which up to now has required a target submarine for training purposes. It is wrong to say that there is no aggression on the part of the aggressor when still on alternate days the islands of Quemoy and Matsu are being shelled from the Communist China mainland. These submarine target vessels have been previously furnished by the 7th Fleet. In the cutback and the pullout, with our naval forces spread thinner and thinner around the world, we can no longer do that. With the provision of these submarines the Republic of China on Taiwan can furnish this themselves. We can continue with our substantial reduction. We will also have prepositioned capable ments of our 7th Fleet.

I am thoroughly satisfied that with our capability for overhaul and repair plus follow-on parts, that it is a good thing. I hope that after this explanation there will be no amendment, because the overall defense of the western Pacific is vital to the peace of the entire world.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HALL. The Red Chinese have 30 Whiskey class submarines supplied of their own making or from Communists elsewhere around the world. That fact alone requires that, at the very least, we provide the Republic of China, a nation friendly to us and sharing the same ideals, with a capability of continuing to maintain its existing ASW capability. These submarines are essential if the Republic of China is to continue their capability, and we are to withdraw eleunits of our reserve fleet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield an additional minute to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BRAY. I yield one additional minute to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. HALL).

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri whether or not the Nationalist Chinese have any trained submarine personnel.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I would state to the gentleman from New York that they do not have the trained personnel, and that we would furnish that training and remain the source of required spare parts and equipment. That is how, I will say in answer further to the question of the gentleman, we would maintain control of these three vessels proposed for loan to the Republic of China.

Mr. RYAN. So that in addition to the three submarines it would be necessary for the United States to set up a training course in order to train personnel to operate these submarines, is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri an additional minute in order to answer my last question?

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HALL. May I say to the gentleman that these people have had ASW training, they are running the antisubmarine patrol at this time. I happen to have been over there. I have flown over the island. I know their radar, their offensive capability, their defensive and sonar capability. The only thing that would be necessary would be for them, as the submarines are reconditioned, to be on board and take "on the job training," so to speak, in order to handle these ships for the patrol fleet. The gentleman must understand that we are not transferring our new sophisticated ASW submarines, and of course, these are not nuclear-powered submarines. These submarines, as I would hope the gentleman would recognize, are submarines of the vintage of the end of World War II.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I direct the attention of the gentleman to page 5853 of the hearings, where Captain Hagerman, U.S. Navy, Director, Foreign Military Assistance Division, stated one of the problems created by the proposed submarine loan. He said:

> But the problem is we have to set up special courses to train them. This could be done. I am just indicating a comment or two.

Mr. HALL. I am trying to indicate to the gentleman that the information I have tried to provide the committee is essentially along those lines, and updates the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri as to whether or not the missions which these submarines will perform are now being performed with or without passage of this bill, and is not the question whether the Chinese are going to assume this mission with Chinese personnel, or whether it is going to go by default if it is not performed by the 7th Fleet with U.S. personnel?

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the distinguished gentleman from California knows our capability, and our commitments. As I stated in my original statement, this has been previously performed by combatant ships of the 7th Fleet. I am sure that we all would agree how nice it would be, instead of having to provide this service ourselves, to have it performed by a friendly foreign nation. How much better it is to have these ships prepositioned and under use of our friendly allies than to have them scrapped or put in the expensive mothball fleet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. FISHER. If the gentleman will yield further, throughout the debate there has been some concern expressed by some of the speakers that if this provision is not stricken out of this bill, and the submarines should be loaned to our friends on Formosa, it might hurt the feeling of Red China or Peking. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not regard the Republic of China as one of the most dependable and probably one of the most valuable friends the United States has in this whole world today?

Mr. HALL. I not only so regard them, I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Texas, but I admire them for what they have done, and how they have lifted themselves economically up by their own bootstraps so that now they no longer require economic aid.

I know they have performed beautifully, in a difficult geophysical and geoeconomic position, to the point where they are a staunch and capable ally and, indeed, are an outpost of freedom around the world.

Mr. FISHER. Would the gentleman agree with me that at this time when this great struggle for power is going on between the free world and the Communist world, it behooves us to examine a situation such as this with care and with concern, always anxious to help those who are in a position to help us in this great struggle?

Mr. HALL. I certainly do agree with the gentleman. It has been one of my duties and privileges to inspect our military assistance program around the world, in other sovereign nations' capitals, and determine the effectiveness of the use of this power. The prime part of this program is indeed a loan program, of the providing of ships, for example, that are no longer required by the active U.S. fleet. This action is tantamount to maintaining the balance of power in the free world versus our aggressors.

I think it is essential that we should do a thing like this, and this action has the additional advantage of prepositioning these ships in a location far better than the reserve fleet. I strongly recommend this bill.

Mr. FISHER. When we make a gesture of this kind, relatively small though it be, in behalf of our friend, the Republic of China, is it not true that over—even more important than just helping that one country that certainly needs it in a strategic position, that it is helping the United States and our overall strategic capability through strengthening the defenses of one of our most dependable allies.

Mr. HALL. I do not think the gentleman could say it any better unless he were to liken this action to a symbolic stretching of the arm of freedom of the Statue of Liberty around the world, because that is exactly what has happened.

I think it is most worthwhile. I have had the opportunity to provide this modicum of additional information in order to quiet some of the qualms that have been expressed today. But the real point is—it is the duty of those of the Committee on Armed Services who are appointed on the need-to-know basis to inquire into this type of situation and become fully advised, and then inform other members of the Committee on Armed Services and to try to exercise prudent judgment based on full information about the need to strengthen these dependable allies around the world so that we can maintain our defense posture despite reductions in the size of our fleet.

I, for one, am in strong favor of those countries who are willing to assist in and share in the protection of freedom around the world.

This is exactly what this bill does, and I thank the gentleman for his questions.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I have recorded my vote against this bill, not because I am opposed to the majority of the provisions therein nor because I disagree with the principle of the legislation, but because this bill is another example of the disregard of the regular legislative process which we saw previously with the foreign aid bill when provisions not passed upon in the regular process were pressed into the bill by short cut of the regular procedure.

While it is true that the Committee did take action here, nevertheless, the Defense Department did not recommend the addition of the ships for China nor did the Department of State and, therefore, I want to show unhappiness with this process especially in this field where weapons are spread throughout the world.

I do want to make clear, however, that I am for adequate defense and assistance in proper cases where the full process of departmental review and recommendation has been followed.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

H.R. 15728

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding section 7307 of title 10, United States Code, or any other law, the President may extend on such terms and under such conditions as he deems appropriate the loan of ships, previously authorized as indicated, as follows: (1) Greece, one submarine (Act of October 4, 1961 (75 Stat. 815)) and, (2) Pakistan, one submarine (Act of October 4, 1961 (75 Stat. 815)).

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. KOCH

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KOCH moves to amend H.R. 15728 by striking the language on page 1, beginning with line 3 and ending with the period on line 9, and substituting the following therefor:

"That notwithstanding section 7307 of title 10, United States Code, or any other law, the President may extend on such terms and under such conditions as he deems appropriate the loan of one submarine to Pakistan previously authorized by the Act of October 4, 1961 (75 Stat. 851)."

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of my amendment for a very simple reason. It is this: I cannot in my mind justify our providing the Greek junta with arms and economic aid to oppress its own people. When we had the foreign aid bill before us last year, that was one of the items that I found most reprehensible and, indeed, incomprehensible. I do not even know yet how much moneys are being given to the Greek junta under that bill, because it is classified information. And when I discussed with colleagues the possibilities of doing something about striking out aid to Greece, they said it simply would be impossible to get the votes for such an amendment on the floor of the House.

I said to myself, "But why is it impossible to expect this Congress to bar military aid to Greece?"

It is not that we ought to require that every country be made over in our own image. It is not that before we give aid to a country it has got to have a democratic form of government. It would be nice if that were so, but, as far as I am concerned, this is not necessary. But I do believe that we should never provide moneys to a government that oppresses its own people.

I am not the only one who believes the Greek junta oppresses its own people. The Council of Europe, a very distinguished body that represents the countries of Europe, issued a report in November of 1969, and I quote them, when they said that "Torture is officially tolerated in Greece." That means that the Greek Government tortures its own people.

I am certain that no one in this room would ever say that they approve of torture, but it is happening and by supporting that government with military and economic aid we share the responsibility and we are condoning it. A NATO committee said—and we belong to NATO and we generally trot them out to talk about how we have to help our friends—that Greece is a "police state." Is there anyone in this Chamber who will stand up and say that we have a duty, an obligation to provide arms and aid to a state that oppresses its own people? We are not even talking about providing arms to Greece to prevent an external aggressive act against it.

I do not suggest that we depose the Greek junta. The people of Greece have got to do that. But, I suggest that we not aid the junta. We are asked to give them this submarine, just as we were asked to give them an unknown amount of assistance in the foreign aid bill last year, and I am sure we will be asked to do so again this year. I believe this is the time to call a halt. I, therefore, urge you to support this amendment.

Mr. RIVERS. I wonder if we can come to some kind of agreement on time. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this motion and all amendments thereto expire in 10 minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I object.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this motion and all amendments thereto expire in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY).

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, like other Members of this body, I have had a personal interview with Papadopoulos, the dictator of Greece. I have heard his story, and after hearing it, I assure you that I hold no brief for his regime. I think it is regressive, backward, and totalitarian. I think it is most unfortunate that Papadopoulos has not seen fit to schedule elections, to restore basic liberties, and to lift martial law.

But at the same time I think there is another overriding consideration here, and that is the importance of Greece to the NATO alliance. Greece occupies a very crucial position in that alliance. It is very clearly established, despite internal political deterioration, that so far as the alliance participation is concerned Greece has cooperated all the way through without any exceptions.

The submarine in question is a part of the Greek naval force. It has responsibilities well beyond its own waters. Greece occupies a very strategic position in the developing defense of the Mediterranean which has been so seriously threatened by Soviet advances.

Under these circumstances, while I admire the spirit in which this amendment was offered, I do think it would be a mistake to accept this amendment and thereby take away from the Greek fleet a vessel which does have military importance and which is now functioning as a part of our unified NATO military defense, which I might say is the most unique of all defense obligations any group of nations has ever pledged to each other. We have, in fact, pledged to go to war automatically to defend the territory of any member state of NATO which is attacked, and so has Greece. This is a very grave responsibility, and before we act to reduce the military effectiveness of any single member state of NATO, we ought to think very carefully—and I do not think this amendment reflects thinking.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. LOWENSTEIN)

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply saddened by the comments of my friend, the very distinguished gentleman from Illinois. I think the whole concept that we are somehow strengthening NATO by assisting the present government of Greece is very wrong, is precisely backwards, in fact. I am among those millions of people who supported NATO since its inception, as a barrier against Communist aggression in Western Europe. What has done most to weaken NATO over the years is the realization that the danger of Communist aggression against Western Europe has receded. What can now finally destroy it is the sense that is becoming a prop for other kinds of totalitarian governments, just so they call themselves anti-Communist.

Freedom in Europe is not strengthened by the destruction of freedom in Greece. How then can it be in the interest of freedom in Europe to add to the military strength of those who destroyed freedom in Greece? There is no danger of a Communist invasion of Greece. The only danger to the Greek Government is from its own people, their liberty snuffed out, their king in exile, their political and cultural leaders in prison under terrible conditions or silenced by the fear of prison.

We weaken NATO by contributing anything to the maintenance of this kind of government in a NATO country.

Further, we weaken the position of the United States in Europe and elsewhere when we become the chief supplier of military aid to a government that has become a pariah among Western democracies and a symbol of totalitarian repression among men concerned about freedom everywhere.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to add a point I failed to mention, and that is that the Nixon administration has very properly not seen fit to resume the shipment of tanks and other items of military hardware to Greece. I commend them for this policy.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are considering here a step which would take away something which is now part of the Greek military establishment.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, this House adopted a resolution not long ago that set free elections as our primary goal in Vietnam. What about free elections in Greece? Are we only for free elections where we have to send in half a million American troops and spend a hundred and thirty billion dollars to try unsuccessfully to force them on unwilling armies? If we are so big for free elections, could not we show our devotion to them where we could influence governments toward allowing them by withdrawing financial and military support instead of by pouring it in? Could not we start withdrawing such aid from Greece, where free elections have been snuffed out, and which faces no Communist aggression and so needs no further military aid—unless it is to be used against the Greek people?

The able gentleman from Ohio remarks that a submarine is not a tank and implies that therefore the Greek Government cannot use this piece of equipment against its own people. Who, in fact, can it be used against? Turkey? Is not it plain when you think about it that the chief purpose and value of leaving this submarine in the hands of the Greek Government at this moment is in fact to use it precisely against the Greek people, to advertise the fact that the U.S. Government supports their oppression? Is it not plain that this submarine is in fact designed to torpedo not Communist ships but democratic hopes?

This is generally a terrible bill. I must warn that if the Koch amendment fails, its bad effects will reach to the heart of NATO as well as to the heart of the Greek people.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS).

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment proposes to us a moral issue. It has been nearly 3 years since this small clique of colonels took over, seized in a coup d'état, the Government of Greece. There was no Communist threat at the time. This is something the Council of Europe determined officially.

The Greek military dictatorship is the first Fascist government to rise in Europe since the 1930's, since the governments of Hitler and Mussolini. It is really a very tragic thing to think that Greece would have that happen to her.

In the last 3 years there have been mass arrests, newspapers closed, and prison sentences, as well as savage torture—savage torture.

It really is a myth that there are Greek Armed Forces left to support us in NATO. Many of the NATO trained officers have been dismissed or are in jail, and they have been replaced by men whose only expertise might be in conspiracy.

The real problem is not one submarine, more or less. The real problem is that the people of Greece think that the CIA was heavily involved in the coup which took democracy away from Greece 3 years ago.

Our European friends who cherish democracy have expressed their disapproval of this position, but we have not.

We are still giving them large amounts of military aid. In 1966 it was $78 million. In 1967 it was $41 million. In 1968 it was $53 million. In 1969 it was $56 million.

We were warned by the gentleman from Illinois that Greece is a loyal NATO ally, but let us remember for a moment the preamble to the NATO constitution:

> The parties are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples founded in the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. YATES yielded his time to Mr. EDWARDS of California.)

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I thank the gentleman.

Does Greece qualify under the preamble? I believe the evidence is clear it does not.

Of course we should not intervene in Greece to try to restore democracy. We do not want another Vietnam.

As the gentleman from New York pointed out, this is Greece's problem more than ours, but we are intervening now by giving this police state large military aid, and the Greek people in the countryside and in the villages think that the United States is propping up the Junta.

The Senate, by a vote of 45 to 38, came close to removing military aid, to taking it away from Greece. I would hope we can do better than that in the House.

Approval of the amendment of the gentleman from New York would be a signal that America does still care about freedom and democracy in Greece, which is, after all, where democracy really began.

Mr. BURTON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to my friend from California.

Mr. BURTON of California. I rise to commend my distinguished colleague from California (Mr. EDWARDS) and to associate myself with his remarks.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I agree with the gentleman that our relationship with Greece does pose a very serious dilemma. The question is how far should we go in trying to impair the military capability in order to encourage reform of the Greek regime?

I would be curious to know how far the gentleman thinks we should go. Should we try to get Greece completely out of NATO? Would that not be the logical end result of the reasoning the gentleman has put forth? Does he believe we should go that far under these circumstances.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. We are asking only for a very simple thing, and that is to stop military aid to Greece. Perhaps that would be enough to give the signal to the people of Greece that this police state is not being supported 100 percent by the United States.

This is what all of the exiles would like us to do. The most distinguished citizens of Greece have been exiled and are living in Paris and Rome and all over Europe.

Mr. FINDLEY. The Nixon administration persisted in the policy of halting additional military hardware sales to the Greek Government.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. The gentleman himself just read the statistics relating to the giving of ammunition and weapons by the Nixon administration to the present Government of Greece. This amendment is necessary to show that the United States does not believe the present Government of Greece ought to receive military assistance from us.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SIKES).

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, it has been pointed out that some of our European friends are objecting to the structure of the present Greek Government. Most of these countries have socialist governments, and one is Sweden, which is a haven for deserters from the U.S. forces. Now, I suggest that the Greek Government is a matter of that country's own internal affairs, but the defense of the free world is very much our affair, and this amendment would hurt the defense of the free world.

I question that most of us will want to return at the Easter holidays to our friends of Greek extraction in our own districts and say to them almost on the occasion of the Greek Independence Day celebrations that we in the Congress refused to help the Greek nation in their efforts to remain independent. These valiant people are an anchor to NATO's south. Yet the military forces of Greece are far behind in modernization. One reason for this is that the United States has failed to keep its word to make available to them new and modern weapons. It would be extreme folly, Mr. Chairman, to compound this situation today by a direct affront to a stanch friend which has demonstrated its willingness to stand with the United States. We should be doing a great deal more than we are doing to help modernize the Greek forces, and we should not under any circumstances take away the very small amount of assistance that is proposed in the bill before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GROSS).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GROSS yielded his time to Mr. HALL.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. HALL).

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, let us get it crystal clear that in this proposed legislation we have asked for the renewal of a submarine loan for the Royal Hellenic Navy. In addition to that, Greece's task force and destroyers need modernization and they have actually requested replacement ships to fulfill their NATO commitments. However, we have not requested additional ships in view of the military assistance program restriction on furnishing additional major items to that country at this time.

I want to make it particularly clear that in addition to helping the alliance, NATO south, and thereby helping ourselves, that we are asking for a maintenance of access on the part of the U.S. forces. We do have commitments; it is necessary that we keep them. Perhaps it has been blown out of proportion, but psychologically, symbolically, and practically the Greeks expect us to keep these commitments.

Why is it important that we consider increases to Greece? First of all, because it is in the western end of the Mediterranean. Second, I need not remind you that we have recently lost the Wheelus Air Force Base in Libya. Third, I know that whenever we have asked the Greeks, whether it be before the junta or afterward, for flyover rights, or for communication needs, that it has been granted on the basis that we are allies, we are freedom lovers, and we are anti-Communist.

There are valuable secondary considerations involved in this area. Think with me for just a minute, Members of the Committee, about Greece's importance as a logistical and tactical base, and this has been highlighted in recent years with France's disengagement from the alliance and, as has been brought out by the fact of the more recent invasion of Czechoslovakia, by the Soviet Union, and third by the increased Soviet Union's naval activities in the eastern Mediterranean, the use of their amphibious and helicopter landing ships, including the Moskva, and fourth, by the greater political sensitivity in other sovereign nations relating to the American presence there.

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALL. Now, continued U.S. presence, including command control and all communications of the 6th Fleet, are vital.

Mr. Chairman, let me put it to you this way: Greece has cooperated without question on contact use of airfields and overfly rights in the air bridge that was established during the evacuation of U.S. refugees from Israel in 1967, and from the Congo previously. We had better keep our presence there in view of the situation in the Middle East at this time.

Second, the Royal Hellenic Navy has become an active participant in the NATO exercises and, more particularly, in support of the alliance in their area.

Finally, I want to point out that ports in Crete, in the Hellenic Islands, and the mainland, provide a safe haven for units of the 6th Fleet and their crews, as well as sources of POL and ammo storage and needed training facilities, targets, and ranges. So much needs to be said in making a decision to authorize the continuation of this loan as signifying the attitude on the part of the commitment of the U.S. Government, that I find difficulty expressing it adequately.

Now, I will be more than glad to yield, having made my statement.

Mr. SIKES. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I would add to what the gentleman has said by stating that there are not many places left in that part of the world where the U.S. Fleet is welcome.

Mr. HALL. That is exactly what I was trying to point out, with the loss of our base in Libya, and with the decrease in the size of the 6th Fleet, and with the fluid situation of the world, and the nervousness of other sovereign nations about our presence, and finally the possible need to evacuate Israel, perhaps, or any other place where turmoil is liable to break out at any time, we must keep our 6th Fleet in places where we have suitable establishments.

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

The Chair recognizes the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RIVERS), to close debate on this motion.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, to begin with Greece has this submarine now. This permits the President to extend the loan. Greece has spent a million dollars on the submarine getting it ready for continued service. Greece is on the border of Yugoslavia, Albania, and Bulgaria and they are infiltrating her borders every day. They do not need to assault Greece by armed force. They are doing it from within. The loan of submarine is designed to keep military forces in NATO. What more do you want? They are faithfully fulfilling their mission to NATO. On the other hand, there is Papandreou who would like to be the head of Greece and everyone knows which side he is on.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I yield to the gentleman, of course.

Mr. ARENDS. I am glad the gentleman is making this point for the simple reason is that anything we do here today that would prove in time detrimental to the NATO forces in that part of the world would be detrimental to the cause of peace.

Mr. RIVERS. Of course, have you forgotten that it was the same man in that country, when that same crowd began to take over? Do not be surprised. Do not be fooled. If you vote to take this submarine out, it will be a signal to the world that the Nixon doctrine is not working. Nixon is doing a lot of things that we cannot put out here and tell you about. He is trying to bring about a lot of things that we know about, and this is only one of them.

We do not have too many of our friends left in these other nations. We have to have a place where we can put our submarine in a base in a country that will be with us.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KOCH), there were—ayes 10, noes 50.

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Clerk will call the roll.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to call for a quorum when a call for a teller vote is asked for and should be in progress at that moment—you cannot interrupt a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from New York made the point that a quorum was not present.

Mr. HÉBERT. No, no—the RECORD will show that he asked for a teller vote and then asked for a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the understanding of the Chair that the gentleman asked for a teller vote and then made the point of order that a quorum was not present.

Mr. HÉBERT. That is it—when he asked for a teller vote, he asked for a vote to be taken and that vote comes automatically. Having made that motion, he cannot get the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana that the Committee cannot do business without a quorum, and since it has been established a quorum is not present, the Chair has directed the Clerk to call the roll.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 58]

Adams	Edwards, La.	Murphy, N.Y.
Anderson, Calif.	Eshleman	Obey
Bell, Calif.	Fish	O'Neill, Mass.
Bevill	Flowers	Ottinger

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. PRICE of Illinois) having resumed the chair, Mr. DORN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 15728, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 329 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RIVERS. Is the first order of business the ordering of tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. When the point of order was made that a quorum was not present, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH) had demanded tellers. The question before the Committee is on the question of ordering tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Notwithstanding section 7307 of title 10, United States Code, or any other provision of law, the President may lend two destroyer escorts to the Republic of Vietnam and two destroyers and two submarines to the Government of Turkey and three submarines to the Republic of China in addition to any ships previously authorized to be loaned to these nations, with or without reimbursement and on such terms and under such conditions as the President may deem appropriate. All expenses involved in the activation, rehabilitation, and outfitting (including repairs, alterations, and logistic support) of ships transferred under this section shall be charged to funds programed for the recipient government as grant military assistance under the provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, or successor legislation, or to funds provided by the recipient government. The authority of the President to lend naval vessels under this section shall terminate on December 31, 1971.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FRASER

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRASER:

On page 2, line 3, strike out "and three submarines to the Republic of China"

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment to strike the authorization in the bill which would provide for the transfer to the Government of Taiwan, the Republic of China, three submarines. As indicated earlier in the debate in the committee, there are certain facts which I think are beyond any dispute.

Let us lay those out on the table first: First, the Republic of China has no submarines at present; second, it lacks any trained personnel; and third, it has no capability to repair submarines.

Moreover, this authority was not asked for by President Nixon.

Under Secretary of State Elliot Richardson told us last week on a visit to the Hill that in his judgment there had not been a sufficient case made for the transfer of these three submarines to the Government of Taiwan.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is agreed that at the present time Red China is not readying an invasion of Taiwan. The deployment of mainland Chinese troops is essentially defensive. That government lacks a navy adequate to carry on an invasion.

The problem with the transfer of these submarines to Taiwan lies, therefore, in the fact that these are unnecessary and that they would be an unwarranted expense. We can say, as the committee report suggests, it would be an expense to the Government of Taiwan. But the fact of the matter is, we are subsidizing the military establishment in Taiwan. If we add to the cost of that defense establishment, it simply means our money is going into the maintenance of these submarines. We ought not to kid ourselves about that. If we will say we are not going to give Taiwan any more assistance, then we could argue they are going to take over the operation of these ships—which will run $8 million a year.

This places at the disposal of a foreign government a new offensive capability, a new weapons system for them to do as they choose.

Mr. Chairman, the people on Taiwan today do not enjoy the full range of fundamental rights that we would like to see them exercise, but I think that condition is changing. There are many who are familiar with Taiwan's development who hold out hope that one day there will emerge a substantial degree of democratic self-government—and perhaps to a greater degree than we might expect to find in other developing nations.

But, Mr. Chairman, today Taiwan is a poor nation. Despite the fact there is very good economic growth, the per capita income on Taiwan is still only $300 a year. They are trying to maintain an oversized army, far in excess of what they need for defensive purposes, and now we propose to add to the size of that military establishment.

Mr. Chairman, supposing the Soviet Union were to announce tomorrow they were going to give three submarines to Cuba. Would we think that a friendly act? Would we say, well, that is the way it is, or would we be concerned? I think the fact is we would be concerned. Similarly, Red China, I think can reasonably interpret our announcement that we are proposing to give Taiwan three submarines capable of interdicting or harassing, capable of landing parties on the mainland, including spies, saboteurs, and landing parties as a threatening act. They may see this in that light.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, of course, I will not object to this request, but in the future I will object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, Red China today is hostile to the United States. Make no mistake about that. Red China today claims that Taiwan is an integral part of China. Make no mistake about that. But Taiwan agrees there is only one China.

The question is, Will the end of the Chinese civil war, which finds 2 percent of the Chinese population on Taiwan and 98 percent on the mainland, come in a blood bath, or will it come to an end with some kind of political accommodation or settlement?

I do not know the answer to that question.

But I want to say it is not in our interest nor in the interest of the Taiwan Chinese nor those on the Chinese mainland for us to exacerbate the situation.

The Taiwan Government does not need these submarines. Our President has not asked that they be transferred to Taiwan. This transfer comes at a time when I think, wisely, the Nixon administration is trying to build some bridges, trying to open some windows or some doors, if you will, to the mainland of China. As the Chinese acquire nuclear capability and the ability to deliver it against the United States, we must have the interests of the survival of this Nation in mind. We must try to moderate the Chinese regime and try to influence it to pursue an evolutionary course toward more openness and more moderation.

These three submarines go in the wrong direction. There is no good reason for loaning these submarines. They have not been requested by the President. There is every reason to put off this authorization until such time as the President asks for this authorization and until the matter is carefully reviewed.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. I should like to say the gentleman's statement is one of forthrightness. I believe it is clear. I am proud to associate myself with it. I hope many other Members, upon reflection, will do so as well.

Mr. FRASER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, all the amendment would do is to say, "Not this year. Let us wait until the President asks for this authorization; let us wait until we look at it with some care. Let us be sure, if we are going to do something of this kind, that it is consistent with our interests and promotes those interests as well as those of the Chinese."

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARENDS. Would the gentleman be inclined to vote for it if the President requested it?

Mr. FRASER. I should like to hear the President's reasons.

I might add, I have asked the President to indicate his position. The only response we have had is from the Under Secretary, Mr. Elliot Richardson, who has indicated he did not think a case had been made for the transfer.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in my view the inclusion of the language about submarines to Taiwan is unfortunate. It raises once more an issue that, in all probability, will not redound to the advantage of our ally on Taiwan and, perhaps, it will not redound to the advantage of President Nixon, either, in his efforts to establish and promote a new policy toward Communist China. The experience of the Congress in dealing wth the question of fighter jets should have been an ample warning of what lies at hand right now. It is very true that this is permissive language. It does not impose a mandate upon the President. But when the Congress, which is asked to speak in a legislative way, does so, the result has weight. The statement is noted not only in Communist China and Taiwan, but elsewhere around the world. I think we ought to realize in voting against this amendment that those who vote against it inevitably will be interpreted as being in a position critical of the President's new initiatives toward Communist China. Very clearly——

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I am glad to yield, of course.

Mr. RIVERS. Of course, the gentleman is quite conversant with the mutual aid agreement and treaty that we have with Nationalist China and the fact this bill only gives the President this authority if he deems to exercise it. There is nothing mandatory about it.

Mr. FINDLEY. I understand that. The gentleman will agree with me, I am sure, that when the Congress speaks with language like this in behalf of even permissive authority of the President that it has great weight and will be noted throughout the world.

Mr. RIVERS. The gentleman can read this. This is not the first time that we did this. We gave the President authority to give two destroyers to South Korea although he did not ask for it, but it was authorized.

Mr. FINDLEY. The gentleman will agree with me that there is no program now that will give them the right——

Mr. RIVERS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FINDLEY. Of course.

Mr. RIVERS. There is not anybody who knows more about the discussions that the Navy has had with Nationalist China than the President with regard to the Taiwan Straits. He knows this.

Mr. FINDLEY. I will say to the gentleman that he made a very serious mistake, if that is the fact, in including in the committee report the language on page 9 which says that they, meaning the Department of Defense, have not been asked about the question of submarines to China. The only reasonable conclusion anyone can draw from the presence of that language is that the committee did not seek a response from the Department of Defense because you were sure that the response would be negative.

Mr. RIVERS. Will the gentleman yield to me further?

Mr. FINDLEY. Of course.

Mr. RIVERS. That is absolutely 100 percent wrong. The representative of the Department of Defense was the Navy Department, a Captain Hagerman.

Mr. FINDLEY. Is that not a part of the Department of Defense.

Mr. RIVERS. The Department of Defense never testified on a bill of this character. One branch of the military is delegated to handle it, and that is the Department of the Navy. When this representative came over——

Mr. FINDLEY. Why do you say in the report, then, that the Department of Defense has no objection to other parts of this bill if they were never asked for their opinion on this legislation? Why is DOD's view included?

Mr. RIVERS. If we had to go to the Department of Defense for everything, then we would not need the Committee on Armed Services, and we are just not a rubberstamp.

Mr. FINDLEY. Why go to them on 90 percent and skip the other 10 percent?

Mr. RIVERS. I did not go to them; they sent over their representative. We did not go to them. However, we interrogated their representative and their representative said, "I think it would be good for the United States." And based on his testimony we supported it 100 percent unanimously, and I am very glad to clear that up.

Mr. FINDLEY. Why did you put it in the committee report at all?

Mr. RIVERS. I am very glad to clear it up for the gentleman because he does not know how it operates.

Mr. FINDLEY. I guess that is the fact. It is quite clear to all of us that the committee did not seek and get the view of the Department of Defense on submarines to Taiwan, because it would have been negative.

Mr. RIVERS. The representative of the Department of Defense was asked what his personal opinion was on letting Nationalist China have these three submarines——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. RIVERS

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close at 3:45 p.m.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SIKES).

(By unanimous consent Mr. HÉBERT yielded his time to Mr. SIKES.)

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MONTGOMERY yielded his time to Mr. SIKES.)

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LONG of Maryland yielded his time to Mr. SIKES.)

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HAGAN yielded his time to Mr. SIKES.)

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, I am most appreciative of the courtesy of my colleagues in yielding me additional time. The President has said in effect that we are not going to continue to fight other people's wars but that we will help to strengthen our allies by providing the weapons and the supplies which most of them obviously are unable to manufacture or produce for themselves.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment will be defeated.

Now, despite these assurances of help in weapons and equipment, the fact remains that we are doing very, very little in this field. Other than the South Vietnamese forces, U.S. military assistance has been limited and the equipment freqently is obsolescent. Everyone knows this but the American public, which sees no headlines that tell of the weakened defenses of most of our allies. Nor do we see headlines which tell the true facts of Communist support for the Iron Curtain countries. It is known that Communist military forces are, almost without exception, better equipped both from the standpoint of number of weapons and modernization than are allied forces. For instance, we and our allies in NATO hope to contain a thrust of 20,000 modern Soviet tanks with 7,000 allied tanks, many of them not fully modern, if war should come. Yet, next to South Vietnam, it is the NATO Forces North where the best and most modern allied equipment is found. Some of our allies are expected to make do on World War II equipment, and not much of that, notwithstanding the fact that two, and in some instances three, generations of new weapons and equipment have been developed since the days of World War II.

The amendment before the Committee to strike from the bill the authority to provide three submarines for Taiwan. Taiwan has no submarines, but it is well known that just across the straits are large Red Chinese naval forces which include more than 30 submarines. It is also true that Red China has capability and is manufacturing submarines with which to add to their already impressive fleet. Our own submarine fleet is spread thin. We have a worldwide commitment, and the threat to our fleet from Russian submarines is increasing daily. The Russians are again in the midst of a major submarine building program, and they are producing fully modern, quiet, fast submarines which are, in some particulars, better than anything we have.

This means that in time of serious trouble, our comparatively small fleet of modern submarines may be tied up elsewhere. In the early days of conflict, they could not be of much help to the Taiwanese forces. During those crucial first days, Taiwan could fall to an overwhelming strike by the Red Chinese. This their government recognizes. That is why they want even a limited number of submarines with which to counter the Red Chinese threat. It is not much that they are asking—just a few outmoded submarines which are of no more value to us. But the time may come when they will help Nationalist China to remain free and independent and to demonstrate that there are places in the world where capitalism still can succeed. It has been stated that the per capita income of Taiwan is only $300. It should be stated that this is several times as high as the per capita income of the Communist countries around Taiwan.

I would think that we would overwhelmingly support this effort to help a gallant friend; that we do not take a step which could help to cripple Taiwan's efforts to remain free of Communist control. Taiwan is one of the few countries in the world which has offered military forces to support the allied cause in Vietnam. Taiwan is one of the few countries in Southeast Asia which has no truck whatever with communism. Taiwan is one of the few places left where U.S. forces are welcome and where no strings are placed on our deployment or choice of weapons.

We do not have a better friend than Taiwan, and the presence of a strong, even though small, defense establishment in Taiwan provides one additional brake against Communist aggression. Adoption of this amendment would be a slap in the face to a country that demonstrates in every conceivable way its determination to stand with us and to combat communism.

There are some who say this is no time to help Taiwan. They do not want to risk offending Red China. Efforts are in progress ot establish better relations between the United States and China. If there is a way to establish better relations with Red China, it certainly does not lie in appeasement. It does not lie in weakening our friends. Red China is an outlaw nation. They are the principal supplier of weapons for North Vietnam. They are creating revolution in every country around their borders. They are building a military road deep into Laos and pointed at the border of Thailand, and to all intents and purposes, in this way they have annexed a big portion of Laos. They have shown no measurable interest in better relations with the West. They have done nothing to contribute to peace in the world. This is not a time to hurt a friend by helping an enemy. Taiwan is our friend. Red China is our enemy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GROSS).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GROSS yielded his time to Mr. HALL.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. RYAN).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. KOCH yielded his time to Mr. RYAN.)

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) asked a very significant question. Why was the Department of Defense not asked for a report on the submarine loan to Nationalist China? The answer to that question lies in the committee hearings at page 5857 when, in response to a request from our colleague, Congressman LENNON, that the committee obtain a written recommendation from the Department of Defense, the chairman said:

> If they (Department of Defense) come back and say they don't need it, then people on the floor latch onto it. I think we better do it our own way.

That clearly shows that the House Committee on Armed Services believed the Department of Defense would not make such a recommendation and, therefore, should proceed in its own way. I say it is time to stop that "own way." Doing it "our own way" added $54 million for a squadron of sophisticated jet fighter planes to Taiwan last December. Now it is submarines.

Let us look at another gem that appears in the hearings, I refer to page 5840, at which point our colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE) asked why the statement of the Director of the Bureau of Politico-Military Affairs, Department of State, had been classified, and in that discussion the chairman of the Committee on Armed Forces said:

> I tell you you can't trust these American people too much. Maybe you are right [to classify the statement]. Because it is pretty dangerous to give them any information. These are the only people you are denying this information to.

In other words, the only people being denied information are the American people. Who has the right to know the basis for military and foreign policy decisions if not the American people? I say, let us begin to trust the American people. Congress can no longer permit important decisions to be made behind closed doors without informing the American people of the justification.

These three submarines have not been requested by the Department of Defense; they are not needed militarily; and as a matter of foreign policy the proposed loan to Taiwan conflicts with the policy of the Nixon administration which is beginning to open the doors toward rapprochement with mainland China.

The President himself stated, in his state of the world message, that, in regard to mainland China:

> (I)t is certainly in our interest, and in the interest of peace and stability in Asia and the world, that we take what steps we can toward improved practical relations with Peking.

On March 16 the State Department spokesman, Robert J. McCloskey, announced a relaxation of the ban on American travel to China, stating that the United States would follow "a more liberal policy."

The sole justification for the loan of these three submarines is couched in military terms in the committee report—report No. 91-838, which states:

> This loan lets China (sic) replace the United States in the localization of the defense of an area where the communist Chinese have over 30 Whiskey class submarines and that providing the submarines permits China (sic) to continue having submarines to use in ASW (anti-submarine warfare) training.

This assessment of the Republic of China's military needs is purely the creation of the House Armed Services Committee. There is no indication that the Department of Defense subscribes to this assessment. In fact, as I pointed out before, the record of the hearings held on February 3 specifically show that the chairman of the committee rejected the suggestion that a written recommendation be obtained from the Defense Department.

It is difficult to understand how a committee can undertake a move of such consequence and intentionally avoid consulting with the executive, for fear that the executive might disagree with it.

What is even more, there is not even any indication in the hearings and committee report that the Republic of China has itself requested, or needs, these three submarines. And even had it made such a request, the hearings make clear that there are no trained personnel to run the submarines and to maintain them. In fact, the United States would have to set up special courses to train them. Hearing page 5853.

Any move which entails such serious military and foreign affairs implications deserves the most stringent analysis. The record is so barren of any such analysis that passage of the authorization for these vessels cannot be a responsible action on the part of the House.

What is more, the manner in which this authorization has been included in H.R. 15728 calls into the most serious question the functioning of this House and its committees.

Once again, the House Armed Services Committee has undertaken to construct foreign and military policy. Once again, the China lobby has come to the fore. History repeats itself quickly; only last December we were faced with a proposed foreign assistance appropriation providing $54,500,000 for the purpose of providing a squadron of F–4D aircraft to the Republic of China in Taiwan.

Again, in that instance, there was no request for funds for these aircraft; again no justification was offered, in that case before the Foreign Affairs Committee. The $54,500,000 was a surprise amendment adopted on the floor of the House after some very fancy footwork.

In view of the lack of justification and the manner in which the submarine loan for Taiwan has been brought to the House, the amendment to delete the three submarines should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM).

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make just two points: First, enactment by the Congress of the provision in this bill for three submarines for Taiwan is an act with acute foreign policy implications affecting our posture toward Nationalist China and the President's moves with regard to mainland China. Yet we have not officially heard from the Secretary of State, nor has the Committee on Foreign Affairs been given an opportunity to consider this important foreign policy question. This is irresponsible.

Second, argument has been made here that this transfer will simply relieve the U.S. Navy of the need for carrying out the same sort of a mission that these submarines will perform. But this overlooks the fact that in Nationalist Chinese hands, these submarines may conduct raids and other provocative action that could lead to extensive hostilities.

I hope the gentleman's amendment is adopted. If it is not, I will be constrained to vote against the bill as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS).

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONYERS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote in favor of the Fraser amendment to delete sending three submarines to Nationalist China.

I will do so because I believe there is little need by Nationalist China for submarines. But even more, the United States should use its resources to help Israel retain its freedom.

The present administration is fond of setting priorities, Mr. Chairman, and I think it is only proper to express my view of national priorities on the same day President Nixon expressed his.

The President has decided not to sell needed jet aircraft to Israel at this time. I disagree fundamentally with his reasoning. It is ironic at the least that on the very day he dashes the hopes and aspirations of a brave, heroic people, the Congress should consider extending the war force of a nation with less need than demonstrated by Israel.

If we must set priorities, then let us set them on the basis of human need, not on a cold and calculated diplomacy.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I take this time not to discuss the substantive issues that have been raised by the Fraser amendment but rather to complain as one Member of the House of Representatives about the way it is being handled. For example, I have only three-quarters of a minute to express to you the fact that in the very brief period allotted for debate of this amendment, my colleague from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER), has stated his case most ably. But what of the other Members that seek to be heard? What contributions would they have made if there were no attempts to prematurely cut off debate on this subject? If supporting our allies and warding off the threat of international communism is so important, why, then, need we limit debate? There ought to be the fullest discussion of the merits of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York. (Mr. LOWENSTEIN).

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe we have now heard just about everything in the peculiar and continuing saga of gifts for Nationalist China. Evidently we are determined to make it Christmas all year-round in Taiwan. We cannot even sell jets to Israel, we cannot pay a living wage to our postal employees, but we can give an air force to the Chiangs. And now we are told it is "appeasement" if we do not hand over a navy as well.

Does everyone understand? If the House does not vote to authorize giving things to Nationalist China that neither the President nor the Department of Defense have asked us to authorize giving, we will be guilty of "appeasing" someone, presumably Red China. We will, in fact, be soft on communism. The President is not guilty of appeasement for not asking for such authorization. Neither is the Department of Defense. But if we do not vote to give what no one outside the House has asked us to give, we become appeasers. I wonder if anyone really believes it is Red China we are in danger of trying to appease when this matter comes to a vote.

We are told it is ridiculous to suggest that a tiny naval force like this one might invade mainland China. But we are not told what a tiny naval force like this one will, in fact, do. Perhaps it will only harrass mainland China. And then if the tiger whose tail is tweaked strikes back, will this tiny force be transformed into an armada powerful enough to defend itself and Taiwan against retaliation? Or does its tweaking lead to our fighting?

Is there some reason we should now risk—or perhaps, seek—another battlefront in Asia? Are all these gifts to the Chiangs really only a kind of deranged and dangerous charity? Or are they, possibly, traces of a shrewd and deliberate effort to involve us in a new and grander confrontation with Communist China? Either way, this proposal does not have much to commend it. The President tells us we are trying to normalize relations with Red China. And surely it is clear by now that we should not be courting more wars involving Americans on or near the mainland of Asia. In view of these facts, is there any rational purpose that can be served by placing American naval and airpower under the direction of a government that is committed to waging a war of revenge against Red China?

If it is appeasement not to give the President authority he has not asked for to give ships to a foreign government pledged to use them in ways contrary to our own national interest, can you imagine what it would be if we do not fight to defend that government's right to use our ships against our national interest?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is too much to add to this debate. I am sorry that we do not have fuller participation under a more generous time arrangement than we have. One of the reasons I thought it was important to offer this amendment is so that we do not start automatically turning over military equipment to the different governments around the world. If our idea of how we are to relate to the rest of the world does not get looked at more carefully than we have looked at it in the past, we will find this country involved in military adventures which are not our interest, which the American people are going to be unhappy about. We need to look at these matters carefully and think about them as they affect our own security interest, and not just react automatically every time somebody calls for more military assistance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRAY).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BRAY yielded his time to Mr. HALL.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. HALL).

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that no Member of this body would want any member of the committee to think that these are new submarines we are suggesting be supplied to the Republic of China on Taiwan. They are old ones and, in fact, the reason that they were not included in the original request, according to information I have at hand and available to any Member to see, is that they were not in the reserve situation due to it being prior to the cutback in connection with this year's austerity.

I also want everyone to understand that this is not comparable to the question of jets to the Republic of China. Furthermore, I think this relieves the 7th Fleet from its patrol duty in the Straits of Formosa. I think it provides the Nationalist Chinese the capability of providing their own subsurface target ship for already in being antisubmarine warfare detection capability that they have from the air.

This is good. If it is not supplied by this means of depleting our Reserve Forces, rather than scraping them or putting them in mothballs, we will have to do it with the 7th Fleet in order to maintain this capability.

I repeat these are old, beyond the Whiskey-class-type submarines. At the present time the Chinese Navy does not contain this capability. We will maintain control, as I said in general debate, by the act of maintaining follow-on supplies and repairs of the submarines. These Chinese are people who fly jets, and they have one of the better armies of the world, and they have defended Quemoy and Matsu and their own shoreline of Taiwan against invasion, and they have the technical know-how to handle our sophisticated tanks, so certainly they can control our old Whiskey-class submarines and use them for detection of subsurface vessels, by their aircraft submarine detection system and warning setup.

Mr. Chairman, it will enable us to make our forces more thin and to deploy our Reserve Forces farther around the world. I certainly recommend this amendment be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BUCHANAN).

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I commend the committee for inclusion of these submarines for the Republic of China.

As the distinguished gentleman from Missouri made clear, there is a need.

As far as foreign policy is concerned, nothing could be better now—today—than that this Congress should say to the people of Nationalist China, that we do stand behind them, and although our President does seek to communicate with the Communist government on the mainland of China, this does not mean that we are turning away from or equivocating in our support of Taiwan.

The government of Red China is the most repressive in the world, and is possessed of a leadership as irrational as it is tyrannical. On the other hand, the government and the people on Taiwan are the depositories of the culture of China. The best hope for all the people of China is vested in the survival of those great values conserved in Taiwan even as Mao has sought to systematically destroy them on the mainland. In vivid contrast to the chaos and poverty of the mainland. Taiwan is blossoming like a rose, and is in many ways a model for the entire world of developing nations. If we are concerned about the welfare of all the people of China, we could render them no greater service than by underlining our continued support for the Republic of China, and our continued concern for the security of the government and people on Taiwan.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN).

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, for some months I have been calling attention to the spiraling international trade in arms. This trade has so often led to military adventures which could escalate into major wars.

I would like to go on record as being opposed to the authorization for the loan of three submarines to the Republic of China—Taiwan—which was included in the House Armed Services Committee report.

It would apear from the report, that the committee should have considered this authorization with more scrutiny. The Departments of State and Defense were not consulted about this particular authorization. There are various foreign policy implications in this particular loan and I would hope that before we decide this matter, that the appropriate departments would be given the time to evaluate this entire situation.

It is also interesting to note that the Nationalist Chinese do not have any submarines. They have no trained submarine personnel, nor do they have submarine training facilities or repair facilities at their disposal. I find it hard to comprehend the effectiveness of this authorization under the given circumstances.

Rather this authorization appears to be part of our "nonpolicy" toward the international arms trade and another step in the escalation of that trade.

I am hopeful that my fellow Members of Congress will see the implications that are involved in an unrestrained international trade in arms and I suggest that we vote in favor of deleting these submarines from H.R. 15728, until an appropriate and timely investigation can be made in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RIVERS) to close debate on this amendment.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion. The opposition to the loan of three submarines to China is based on the fear that the Chinese might use them to land saboteurs and infiltrators on the mainland of China.

Let me remind you that there is an existing mutual defense treaty between the United States and the Republic of China, signed on December 2, 1954.

This treaty pledges that the parties:

> Separately and jointly by self-help and mutual aid will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack and communist subversive activities directed from without against their territorial integrity and political stability.

In addition, article 5 provides, in part:

> Each party recognizes that an armed attack in the West Pacific Area directed against the territories of either of the parties would be dangerous to its own peace and safety and declares that it would act to meet the common danger in accordance with its constitutional processes.

This is a valid and binding commitment for the United States to help the Republic of China.

In ratifying the treaty, the Senate had the same fear that China might carry out raids against the mainland as is now expressed in connection with the submarines. Therefore, in the report on the treaty the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations said:

> It is the understanding of the Senate that the obligations of the parties under Article 5 apply only in the event of external armed attack; and that military operations by either party from the territories held by the Republic of China shall not be undertaken except by joint agreement.

Thus, the opposition's fear was taken care of by the Foreign Relations Committee in its report in 1954. This understanding was cemented by an exchange of notes dealing with this very point between the United States and the Republic of China as set forth in the Foreign Relations Committee report.

How would the opposition prevent the Chinese Communists from using its existing fleet of over 30 Soviet-built submarines from landing parties on Taiwan? We are giving the Republic of China the ability to provide its antisubmarine defenses against such raids.

In the President's recent report on the U.S. foreign policy for the 1970's, President Nixon again reasserted his Guam doctrine which held that in types of nonnuclear aggression the United States would furnish military and economic assistance but we would "look to the nation directly threatened to assume the primary responsibility of providing the manpower for its defense." That is exactly what we are doing in this case except we are providing China with the submarines, we hope in time, for China to learn how to operate them. They are being given to China at a time when our defenses are being diminished in the Western Pacific for fiscal and not diplomatic reasons.

All we are doing is carrying out the Nixon doctrine to help the Republic of China in its defense against an existing Communist Chinese threat of over 30 submarines already provided to Red China by the Soviets.

Mr. Chairman, we have a mutual agreement with Nationalist China which Nationalist China has faithfully upheld. She has never made an offensive move to embarrass us despite the aid we have given her.

Do Members want the world to believe that with three submarines—which will turn out to be training submarines—this country will invade China? How ridiculous can we get? They have planes and they can move with them every day, based on what is happening at Quemoy.

We questioned a representative of the Department of Defense. The U.S. Navy wants these. How far shall we go? How far must we go? We have hidden nothing from Members. It was unanimous from our committee. To knock these three submarines out now would be the most open and outrageous violation of the friendship existing between the two nations.

Building bridges to China? That is like building bridges to Cuba. We could not build a bridge to China if we stayed here forever. This is so ridiculous, it is ridiculous.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FRASER) there were—ayes 27, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. All new loans and loan extensions executed under this Act shall be for periods not exceeding five years, but the President may in his discretion extend such loans for an additional period of not more than five years. Any agreement for a new loan or for the extension of a loan executed under this Act shall be made subject to the condition that the agreement may be terminated by the President if he finds that the armed forces of the borrowing country have engaged, at any time after the date of such agreement, in acts of warfare against any country which is a party to a mutual defense treaty ratified by the United States. All loans and loan extensions shall be made on the condition that they may be terminated at an earlier date if necessitated by the defense requirements of the United States.

SEC. 4. No loan may be made or extended under this Act unless the Secretary of Defense, after consultation with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, determines that such loan or extension is in the best interest of the United States. The Secretary of Defense shall keep the Congress currently advised of all loans made or extended under this Act.

SEC. 5. The President may promulgate such rules and regulations as he deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair (Mr. DORN) Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 15728) to authorize the extension of certain naval vessel loans now in existence and new loans, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 876, he reported the bill back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FRASER. I was on my feet seeking recognition for the purpose of making a motion to recommit at the time the Speaker was beginning to move to the point of putting the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to be absolutely fair. The Chair believes the Members know that.

Without objection, the action taken on the question of the passage of the bill will be vacated.

There was no objection.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. CONTE

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CONTE. I certainly am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONTE moves to recommit the bill H.R. 15728 to the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 281, nays 66, not voting 83, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR HOUSE MANAGERS TO FILE CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 4148

Mr. KLUCZYNSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers on the part of the House have until midnight tonight to file a conference report on the bill (H.R. 4148) to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, on the rollcall just concluded I was unavoidably detained on hearings on the impact bill. We had educators from all over the country before the committee. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea."

PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained in the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs at the time of the last rollcall. Had I been present during the recording of the vote just passed, I would have voted "yea."

STOP BLACKJACKING THE POSTAL WORKERS

(Mr. KOCH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be outrageous to call in the Army or National Guard to break the strike of the postal unions. The strike is illegal and I do not condone it; however, the actions of the Chief Executive of this country, President Nixon, and his Postmaster General, Winton Blount, in bringing us to this impasse and in refusing to negotiate with the postal workers pending their return to work, while not illegal, must be condemned.

There is nothing in the law which prohibits the President from negotiating with the postal workers at this time even while some of their members are still striking. The postal workers are so correct in their demands for pay increases that I have yet to meet a single individual in the city of New York or here in Congress who does not agree that they are entitled to the immediate pay increases so long requested and so long deferred. This Congress is also not without blame. The respective committees of the House and Senate have permitted the President to use the pay increases as a blackjack to obtain the consent of the postal unions to the President's postal corporation bill. And the Senate succumbed to the President's threat of a veto. There is no question that postal reform is long overdue but it must stand on its own merits and should not be tied to the equitable salary demands of the postal workers.

I urge the President and his Cabinet members not to tarry and dillydally but to work through the day and night without letup over the bargaining table and arrive at an equitable salary agreement with the postal workers.

Instead of lagging so far behind in setting wage rates the Federal Government has an obligation to be a pacesetter so that it can encourage private industry to pay fair and reasonable wages. Unfortunately, the Federal Government is paying sweatshop wages to Federal employees so that some of them are eligible for welfare. It is to this country's shame that an estimated 7 percent of New York City's postmen are receiving welfare benefits because their salaries for full-time employment are so low.

Let us not add to the shame of this Government the additional blot which would never be forgiven or forgotten by calling out the troops.

POSTAL PAY INCREASES

(Mr. OLSEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. OLSEN. Mr. Speaker, the House has functioned very well on the proposition of hearing the postal workers on their request for a pay increase. As a matter of fact, we had hearings most of last year on the subject. My own bill, H.R. 10000, would have remedied their situation. It was introduced on April 19 and was heard by the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. That bill would have increased the postal employees' beginning salary to $7,500 per year from the present $6,176 starting point and would have increased their top pay after 6 years service from what is now $8,442 to $10,000. The present pay commences at $6,176 and after 21 years becomes $8,442. My bill would have changed the pay to commence it at $7,500 per year and after 6 years service reach $10,000. The bill approved by the House on October 18 was H.R. 13000. This bill would change the $6,176 commencement pay to $6,588 and after 6 years service reach $8,706.

H.R. 13000 went to the Senate and was passed on December 12 but was passed at a very reduced rate. I think the postal employees would have even accepted that bill passed in December by the Senate, but I do not think they will now.

I am inserting in my remarks an analysis of the provisions with a comparison of those between H.R. 13000 passed by the House and H.R. 13000 as it came out of the Senate for the benefit of all Members, but I want to say that because of this great time lag between last spring and now, with no adjustment in salaries, the postal employees have been grievously wronged, and we should correct the situation.

We should be very busy about pay and separate it from postal reform. Postal reform should stand on its own feet. This Congress should not be blackjacked into discussing postal reform and postal pay at the same time. We should discuss them each on their own merits and separately.

I have outlined the differences in my statement between H.R. 10000 and H.R. 13000 as passed by the House. Supplementing my remarks I set forth H.R. 10000; H.R. 13000 as passed by the House and by the Senate together with a text of comparison between H.R. 13000 as passed by the House and by the Senate.

The material follows:

H.R. 10000

A bill to reclassify certain positions in the postal field service, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 3512A of title 39, United States Code, is amended by changing the title to read:

"§ 3512A. Positions in salary level 3".

(b) Section 3513 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by changing the title to read:

"§ 3513. Positions in salary level 4".

(c) Section 3514 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by changing the title to read:

For each mile of route over 30 miles	25	25	25	25	25	25".

(c) Chapter 45 of title 39, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by adding a new section to read as follows:

"§ 3558. Longevity step increases

"(a) There are established for each employee longevity steps A, B, and C. For each promotion to a longevity step, each employee shall receive $500 per annum.

"(b) Each employee shall be assigned to—

"(1) longevity step A at the beginning of the pay period following completion of eight years of service;

"(2) longevity step B at the beginning of the pay period following eleven years of service; and

"(3) longevity step C at the beginning of the pay period following the completion of fourteen years of service.

For the purposes of this section, 'service' includes service performed by an employee before, on, or after the date of enactment of this section."; and

(2) by inserting in the table of contents—

immediately above—

"3559. Promotions.".

SEC. 3. (a) Section 3574 of title 39, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 3574. Nightwork

"(a) Nightwork is any work between the hours of 6 postmeridian and 6 antemeridian, standard or daylight saving time, depending upon which time is observed where the work is performed, and includes—

"(1) periods of absence with pay during such hours due to holidays; and

"(2) periods of leave with pay during such hours.

"(b) An employee shall be paid extra compensation for each hour of nightwork at the rate of 20 per centum of his hourly rate of basic compensation.".

(b) Section 3573(h) of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding a new clause to read as follows:

"(4) 'basic compensation' means the rate of annual or hourly compensation specified by law plus extra compensation for nightwork."

SEC. 4. (a) Each employee subject to the Postal Field Service Schedule or Rural Carrier Schedule, as the case may be, immediately prior to the effective date of this section, shall be given full credit for all prior satisfactory service and assigned—

(1) to numerical step 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, on the basis of one step higher for each 52 calendar weeks of prior satisfactory service;

(2) to longevity step A, B, or C, on the basis of eight, eleven, or fourteen years, respectively, of prior satisfactory service; or

(3) to the same numerical step which he had attained immediately prior to the effective date of this section if in steps 1 through 6;

whichever is appropriate and results in assignment to the higher step. Service credit in excess of the credit used to assign an employee to the appropriate step shall be preserved for further step-increase purposes.

(b) The assignment of an employee to a higher step or level by reason of the enactment of this Act shall not be deemed to be an equivalent increase within the meaning of section 3552(a) of title 39, United States Code.

SEC. 5. The foregoing provisions of this Act shall become effective on the first day of the first pay period which begins on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

H.R. 13000

A bill to implement the Federal employee pay comparability system, to establish a Federal Employee Salary Commission and a Board of Arbitration, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Salary Comparability Act of 1969".

SEC. 2. Sections 5301 and 5302 of title 5, United States Code, are amended to read as follows:

"§ 5301. Policy

"(a) It is the policy of Congress that rates of pay for employees within the purview of this section be based on the principles that—

"(1) there be equal pay under each pay system for substantially equal work;

"(2) pay distinctions be maintained in keeping with work distinctions; and

"(3) rates of pay be comparable, on a national basis, with private enterprise rates of pay for the same levels of work.

"(b) Rates of pay shall be adjusted annually, in accordance with the policy set forth in subsection (a) of this section and the procedures prescribed by section 5302 of this title, for those employees subject to—

"(1) section 5332 of this title, relating to employees under the General Schedule;

"(2) part III of title 39, relating to employees in the postal field service;

"(3) sections 867 and 870 of title 22, relating to officers, staff officers, and employees in the Foreign Service of the United States; and

"(4) section 4107 of title 38, relating to physicians, dentists, and nurses in the Department of Medicine and Surgery, Veterans' Administration.

"§ 5302. Federal Employee Salary Commission; Federal Employee Salary Board of Arbitration

"(a) There is established, as a permanent agency of the Government, a Federal Employee Salary Commission, referred to as the 'Commission'.

"(b) The Commission shall be composed of 8 members and 3 associate members, as follows:

"(1) the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission or, in his absence, his designee, who shall be Chairman;

"(2) 1 designated by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget;

"(3) 1 designated by the Secretary of Defense;

"(4) 1 designated by the Postmaster General;

"(5) 1 designated by the organization of employees having the largest number of members in the General Schedule;

"(6) 2, one designated by each of the 2 employee organizations having the largest number of members in the postal field service;

"(7) 1 designated by an employee organization, other than an organization designating a member pursuant to paragraph (5) or (6) of this subsection, selected each year by the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission on a rotating basis after consultation with representatives of such employee organizations as the Chairman determines appropriate; and

"(8) 3 associate members, one each designated by employee organizations, other than organizations designating members pursuant to paragraph (5), (6), or (7) of this subsection, selected each year by the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission on a rotating basis after consultation with representatives of such employee organizations as the Chairman determines appropriate.

A member of the Commission has—

"(A) 1 vote, if designated under paragraph (2), (3), (4), (5), or (7) of this subsection;

"(B) one-half vote, if designated under paragraph (6) of this subsection; or

"(C) 1 vote to be cast only to break a tie vote of the Commission, if serving under paragraph (1) of this subsection.

Each associate member of the Commission is entitled to attend all meetings of, consult with, and be heard by, the Commission, on all matters, but does not have a vote.

"(c) The Commission shall, in accordance with the policy set forth in section 5301(a) of this title, after consultation with representatives of such agencies and employee organizations as it determines appropriate—

"(1) prescribe, and revise from time to time as it deems appropriate, a comparability pay survey—

"(A) which will develop valid comparisons of (i) the rates of pay for employees within the purview of section 5301(b) of this title and (ii) the rates of pay for the same levels of work in private industry; and

"(B) which shall be conducted annually by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor;

"(2) prepare annually a comparative statement of the rates of pay for such employees and the rates of pay for the same levels of work in private industry as disclosed by the comparability pay survey;

"(3) determine and prescribe, on the basis of information and data disclosed by the annual comparability pay survey, the exact national rates of pay for such employees which are necessary to effect the policy set forth in section 5301(a) of this title;

"(4) review, annually, the comparability of the rates of pay and step increase policies within and between the various pay systems for such employees, taking into consideration such matters as the Commission determines have affected or may affect the comparability, including, but not limited to—

"(A) within-grade rates of pay employees are receiving due to differing length of service requirements for step increases, step increases without regard to length of service, or different number of within-grade steps;

"(B) different rates of pay under the various pay systems for the same level of work;

"(C) pay distinctions not being maintained in keeping with work distinctions, the degree of responsibility placed, the scope and variety of tasks involved, or the extent of decisionmaking authority required; and

"(D) premium pay policies; and

"(5) except as provided in subsection (e) and subsection (g) of this section, prepare and submit annually to the Congress a report setting forth—

"(A) the comparison of rates of pay prepared pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection;

"(B) the exact national rates of pay for such employees prescribed by the Commission in accordance with paragraph (3) of this subsection; and

"(C) recommendations or legislation as may be necessary to achieve the comparability policy set forth in section 5301(a) of this title or to achieve comparability within and between pay systems for employees within the purview of section 5301(b) of this title.

"(d)(1) In the exercise of the authority and the performance of the duties vested in and imposed upon the Commission by this section, the Commission—

"(A) shall seek the views, in such manner as the Commission may provide, of such employee organizations as the Commission considers appropriate; and

"(B) give thorough consideration to those views.

"(2) All decisions of the Commission shall be by a majority vote. The votes shall be recorded. A record shall be maintained of the views, assenting or dissenting, of the members of the Commission. The record of votes and views shall be available for public inspection and copying pursuant to section 552 of this title.

"(e) If a member of the Commission determines, and advises the Commission, that the rates of pay applicable to the appropriate pay system, as the rates are prescribed by the Commission, are not in conformity with the policy set forth in section 5301(a) of this title, the Commission shall submit, not later than February 1 following that determination, the rates of pay to the Board established by subsection (f) of this section for consideration by the Board.

"(f)(1) There is established, as a permanent agency of the Government, a Federal Employee Salary Board of Arbitration, referred to as the 'Board', which shall be composed of 7 members as follows:

"(A) 2 Members of the United States Senate designated by the President pro tempore of the Senate, each from a different political party;

"(B) 2 Members of the United States House of Representatives designated by the Speaker of the House, each from a different political party;

"(C) 1 designated by the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission;

"(D) 1, who may serve not more than 2 consecutive years, designated by a majority vote of the presidents of the four employee organizations which have designated members currently serving on the Commission under paragraph (5), (6), or (7) of subsection (b) of this section with each president of the employee organization under paragraph (5) or (7) having one vote and each president of the organizations under paragraph (6) having one-half vote; and

"(E) 1 designated by a majority of the members of the Board referred to in paragraphs (A) to (D), inclusive, of this subsection from the membership of the American Arbitration Association, who shall be Chairman of the Board.

"(2) The Board shall consider the rates of pay submitted to it by the Commission pursuant to subsection (e) of this section and determine whether or not the rates of pay conform with the policy set forth in section 5301(a) of this title. If the Board determines that the rates of pay do not so conform, the Board shall prepare the rates of pay as will conform with that policy. The Board shall transmit to the Commission not later than the 30th day following the date the Board received the rates of pay submitted to it by the Commission, a report setting forth—

"(A) the decision of the Board with respect to the rates of pay submitted by the Commission;

"(B) the reasons for the decision of the Board; and

"(C) such rates of pay as the Board shall have determined to be necessary to conform with the policy set forth in section 5301(a) of this title.

The decision of the Board, and such rates of pay as it may prepare in accordance with this paragraph, shall be final and conclusive.

"(g)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Commission shall submit to the Congress the first report pursuant to paragraph (5) of subsection (c) of this section, based on the 1969 national survey of professional, administrative, technical, and clerical pay, not later than February 1, 1970, and subsequent reports pursuant to such paragraph (5) not later than February 1 of each year thereafter.

"(2) In the case of the submission of rates of pay by the Commission to the Board pursuant to subsection (e) of this section, the Commission, immediately upon receipt of the final and conclusive decision of the Board, shall submit to the Congress the decision of the Board and such rates of pay as the Board shall have determined to be necessary to conform with the policy set forth in section 5301(a) of this title.

"(h)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, all or part (as the case may be) of the rates of pay submitted to the Congress as provided in subsection (c)(5) or subsection (g) of this section become effective at the beginning of the first pay period that begins on or after the first day of the year in which the rates of pay are submitted; but only to the extent that, within 30 days after the rates of pay are submitted to the Congress—

"(A) there has not been enacted into a law a statute establishing rates of pay other than those proposed by all or part of such recommendations,

"(B) neither House of Congress has passed a resolution specifically disapproving all or part of the recommendations, or

"(C) both.

"(2) Any part of the recommendations, in accordance with express provisions of the recommendations, may be made operative on a date earlier than the date on which the recommendations otherwise are to take effect.

"(3)(A) The rates of pay of United States attorneys and assistant United States attorneys whose annual salaries are fixed pursuant to section 548 of title 28 shall be increased, effective on the first day of the first pay period which begins on or after the first day of the year in which increases become effective pursuant to this section by amounts equal, as nearly as may be practicable, to the increases provided pursuant to this section for corresponding rates of pay.

"(B) Notwithstanding section 665 of title 31, the rates of pay of employees of an Executive agency and of the government of the District of Columbia whose rates of pay are fixed by administrative action pursuant to law and are not otherwise increased pursuant to this section are hereby authorized to be increased, effective on the first day of the first pay period which begins on or after the first day of the year in which increases become effective pursuant to this section, by amounts not to exceed the increases provided pursuant to this section for corresponding rates of pay in the appropriate schedule or scale of pay.

"(C) This section does not authorize any increase in the rates of pay of employees whose rates of pay are fixed and adjusted from time to time as nearly as is consistent with the public interest in accordance with prevailing rates or practices.

"(D) This section does not impair any authority pursuant to which rates of pay may be fixed by administrative action.

"(4) Retroactive pay shall be paid by reason of this section only in the case of an individual in the service of the United States (including service in the armed forces) or the government of the District of Columbia on the day immediately following the close of the 30-day period specified in subsection (h)(1) of this section, except that such retroactive pay shall be paid—

"(A) to an employee who retired, during the period beginning on the first day of the first pay period which began on or after January 1, and ending on the day immediately following the close of the 30-day period specified in subsection (h)(1) of this section, for services rendered during that period, and

"(B) in accordance with subchapter VIII of chapter 55 of this title, relating to settlement of accounts, for services rendered, during the period beginning on the first day of the first pay period which began on or after January 1, and ending on the day immediately following the close of the 30-day period specified in subsection (h)(1) of this section, by an employee who died during that period.

Such retroactive pay shall not be considered as basic pay for the purposes of subchapter III of chapter 83 of this title, relating to civil service retirement, or any other retirement law or retirement system, in the case of any such retired or deceased employee.

"(5) For the purposes of paragraph (4) of this section, service in the armed forces, in the case of an individual relieved from training and service in the armed forces or discharged from hospitalization following such training and service, includes the period provided by law for the mandatory restoration of the individual to a position in or under the Government of the United States or the government of the District of Columbia.

"(i) Each member and each associate member of the Commission and each member of the Board is entitled to travel expenses, including a per diem allowance in accordance with section 5703(b) of this title. Each such member or associate member who is not a Member of Congress or an employee is entitled to pay at a rate equal to the per diem equivalent of the maximum rate of basic pay of the General Schedule for each day he is engaged in the performance of services for the Commission or the Board, as the case may be, except that the member from the American Arbitration Association may be paid the usual fees prescribed by that Association.

"(j)(1) Without regard to the provisions of this title governing appointments in the competitive service and of chapter 51 of this title and subchapter III of this chapter, relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates—

"(A) the Commission and the Board each may appoint an Executive Director and fix his basic pay at the rate provided for level V of the Executive Schedule by section 5316 of this title; and

"(B) with the approval of the Commission or the Board, as appropriate, the Executive Director may appoint and fix the basic pay (at respective rates not in excess of the maximum rate of the General Schedule) of such additional personnel as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Commission or of the Board, as applicable, and may obtain services of experts or consultants in accordance with section 3109 of this title, but at rates for individuals not to exceed that of General Schedule 18.

"(2) Upon the request of the Commission or of the Board, the head of any department, agency, or establishment of any branch of the Government of the United States may detail, on a reimbursable basis, any of the personnel of such department, agency, or establishment to assist the Commission or the Board, as appropriate, in carrying out its functions.

"(k) The Commission and the Board may use the United States mails in the same manner and upon the same conditions as other departments and agencies of the United States.

"(l) The Administrator of the General Services shall provide administrative support services for the Commission and the Board on a reimbursable basis.

"(m) The rates of pay that take effect under this section shall modify, supersede, or render inapplicable, as the case may be, to the extent inconsistent therewith—

"(1) all provisions of law enacted prior to the effective date or dates of all or part (as the case may be) of such rates (other than any provision of law enacted in the 30-day period in paragraph (1) of subsection (h) of this section with respect to such rates); and

"(2) any prior recommendations or adjustments which took effect under this section or prior provisions of law.

"(n) The rates of pay that take effect under this section shall be printed in—

"(1) the statutes at large in the same volume as public laws;

"(2) the Federal Register; and

"(3) the Code of Federal Regulations.

"(o) Any increase in rates of pay that takes effect under this section is not an equivalent increase in pay within the meaning of section 5335 of this title or section 3552 of title 39.

"(p) Any rate of pay that takes effect under this section shall be initially adjusted, effective on the effective date of such rate of pay, under conversion rules prescribed by the President or by such agency as the President may designate.

(q) The rates of pay of personnel subject to sections 210 and 213 (except subsections (d) and (e)) of the Federal Salary Act of 1967 (81 Stat. 633, 635; Public Law 90–206), and any minimum or maximum rate, limitation, or allowance applicable to any such personnel, shall be adjusted, effective on the first day of the first pay period which begins on or after the first day of the year in which increases become effective pursuant to this section, by amounts which are equal, insofar as practicable and with such exceptions as may be necessary to provide for appropriate relationships between positions, to the amounts of the adjustments made pursuant to this section, by the following authorities—

"(1) the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, with respect to the judicial branch of the Government; and

"(2) the Secretary of Agriculture, with respect to individuals employed by the county committees established under section 590h (b) of title 16.

Such adjustments shall be made in such manner as the appropriate authority concerned deems advisable and shall have the force and effect of statute.".

SEC. 3. The table of contents of subchapter I of chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking out—

"5302. Annual reports on pay comparability."

and inserting in lieu thereof—

SEC. 4. Section 3552(a) of title 39, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(a)(1) Each employee subject to the Postal Field Service Schedule and each employee subject to the Rural Carrier Schedule who has not reached the highest step for his position shall be advanced successively to the next higher step as follows:

"(A) to steps 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7—at the beginning of the first pay period following the completion of 26 calendar weeks of satisfactory service; and

"(B) to steps 8 and above—at the beginning of the first pay period following the completion of 52 calendar weeks of satisfactory service.

"(2) The receipt of an equivalent increase during any of the waiting periods specified in this subsection shall cause a new full waiting period to commence for further step increases.

"(3) An employee subject to the Postal Field Service Schedule who returns to a position he formerly occupied at a lower level may, at his request, have his waiting periods adjusted, at the time of his return to the lower level, as if his service had been continuous in the lower level.".

SEC. 5. (a) Each employee in levels 1 through 11 of the Postal Field Service Schedule and each employee subject to the Rural Carrier Schedule—

(1) who is in a step below the 2 top steps of his level shall be advanced 2 steps; or

(2) who is in either of the 2 top steps of his level shall receive basic compensation at a rate equal to his rate of basic compensation in effect immediately prior to the effective date of this subsection plus the amount of 2 step increases of his level.

Changes in levels or steps which would otherwise occur on the effective date of this subsection without regard to the enactment of this subsection shall be deemed to have occurred prior to adjustments under this subsection. Each such employee who receives an adjustment under this subsection shall commence a new full waiting period, for further step increase purposes under section 3552(a) of title 39, United States Code, on the first day of the first pay period which begins on or after July 1, 1970, and service by such an employee on or after the effective date of this section and prior to the beginning of such pay period in July 1970 shall not be credited for such step increase purposes.

(b) For the purposes of the initial application of section 3552(a) of title 39, United States Code, as amended by section 4 of this Act, credit for satisfactory service performed by an employee in levels 12 or above of the Postal Field Service Schedule since his last step increase prior to the effective date of section 4 of this Act, shall be granted in an amount not in excess of the amount of service required for a one step increase applicable to the step category of the employee.

(c) The Postmaster General shall advance each employee in level 12 or above of the Postal Field Service Schedule—

(1) who was in level 12 or above on the effective date of this section and who did not receive a two-step increase pursuant to this section;

(2) who is senior with respect to total postal service to an employee in the same post office (A) who received a two-step increase pursuant to this section and (B) who is promoted to the same level on or after the effective date of this section; and

(3) who is in a step in the same level below the step of the junior employee described in clauses (A) and (B) of subparagraph (2) of this subsection.

Such advancement by the Postmaster General shall be to the highest step which is held by any such junior employee. Any increase under the provisions of this subsection is not an equivalent increase within the meaning of section 3552 of title 39, United States Code. Credit earned prior to advancement under this subsection for advancement to the next step shall be retained for step increase purposes under such section 3552.

SEC. 6. Section 5545(c)(2) of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(2) an employee in a position in which the hours of duty cannot be controlled administratively, and which requires substantial amount of irregular, unscheduled, overtime duty with the employee generally being responsible for recognizing, without supervision, circumstances which require him to remain on duty, shall receive premium pay for this duty on an annual basis instead of premium pay provided by other provisions of this subchapter, except for regularly scheduled overtime, night, and Sunday duty, and for holiday duty. Premium pay under this paragraph is determined as an appropriate percentage, not less than 10 per centum nor more than 25 per centum, of such part of the rate of basic pay for the position as does not exceed the minimum rate of basic pay for GS–10, by taking into consideration the frequency and duration of irregular unscheduled overtime duty required in the position.".

SEC. 7. (a) Section 5942 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 5942. Allowance based on duty at remote worksites

"Notwithstanding section 5536 of this title, an employee of an Executive department or independent establishment who is assigned to duty, except temporary duty, at a site so remote from the nearest established communities or suitable places of residence as to require an appreciable amount of expense, hardship, and inconvenience on the part of the employee in commuting to and from his residence and such worksite is entitled, in addition to pay otherwise due him, to an allowance of not to exceed $10 a day. The allowance shall be paid under regulations prescribed by the President establishing the rates at which the allowance will be paid and defining and designating those sites, areas, and groups of positions to which the rates apply.".

(b) Notwithstanding section 5536 of title 5, United States Code, and the amendment made by subsection (a) of this section, and until the effective date of regulations prescribed by the President under such amendment—

(1) allowances may be paid to employees under section 5942 of title 5, United States Code, and the regulations prescribed by the President under such section, as in effect immediately prior to the effective date of this section; and

(2) such regulations may be amended or revoked in accordance with such section 5942 as in effect immediately prior to the effective date of this section.

(c) The table of contents of subchapter IV of chapter 59 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking out—

"5942. Allowance based on duty on California offshore islands or at Nevada Test Site."

and inserting in lieu thereof—

"5942. Allowance based on duty at remote worksites.".

SEC. 8. (a) Subchapter IV of chapter 59 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 5947. Quarters, subsistence, and allowances for employees of the Corps of Engineers, Department of the Army, engaged in floating plant operations

"(a) An employee of the Corps of Engineers, Department of the Army, engaged in floating plant operations may be furnished quarters or subsistence, or both, on vessels, without charge, when the furnishing of the quarters or subsistence, or both, is determined to be equitable to the employee concerned, and necessary in the public interest, in connection with such operations.

"(b) Notwithstanding section 5536 of this title, an employee entitled to the benefits of subsection (a) of this section while on a vessel, may be paid, in place of these benefits, an allowance for quarters or subsistence, or both, when—

"(1) adverse weather conditions or similar circumstances beyond the control of the employee or the Corps of Engineers prevent transportation of the employee from shore to the vessel; or

"(2) quarters or subsistence, or both, are not available on the vessel while it is undergoing repairs.

"(c) The quarters or subsistence, or both, or allowance in place thereof, may be furnished or paid only under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Army.".

(b) The table of sections of subchapter IV of chapter 59 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding—

"5947. Quarters, subsistence, and allowances for employees of the Corps of Engineers, Department of the Army, engaged in floating plant operations."

immediately below—

"5946. Membership fees; expenses of attendance at meetings; limitations.".

(c) The Act entitled "An Act to authorize the furnishing of subsistence and quarters without charge to employees of the Corps of Engineers engaged on floating plant operations", approved May 13, 1955 (69 Stat. 48; Public Law 35, Eighty-fourth Congress) is repealed.

SEC. 9. (a) This section, the first section, and sections 2 and 3 of this Act shall become effective on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) Sections 5, 6, 7, and 8 of this Act shall become effective on the first day of the first pay period which begins on or after October 1, 1969.

(c) Section 4 of this Act shall become effective on the first day of the first pay period which begins on or after July 1, 1970.

HOUSE	SENATE
Salary adjustment	Salary adjustment
A 2-step within grade adjustment for postal employees in levels 1 through 11 effective October 1, 1969, representing increases averaging 5.4 percent. (Sec. 5, p. 19).	A pay increase effective in January 1970 for employees under the four statutory salary systems (Postal, General Schedule, Veterans, and Foreign Service). The increases in the GS schedule, which also apply in similar amounts in other schedules, are as follows: 4 percent, GS 1–9; 3 percent, GS 10–12; 2 percent, GS 13–14; 1 percent, GS 15; and no increases in GS–16, –17, and –18. (Sec. 2–8, p. 26.)
Higher level employees (PFS–12 and above) will be given an earned step advancement on July 1, 1970, as a part of the accelerated advancement program authorized under sec. 4. (Sec. 5(b), p. 20).
Cost: Fiscal year 1970, $254.2 million; fiscal year 1971, $352.7 million.	Cost: Fiscal year 1970, $360 million.
Federal Employees Salary Commission established as a permanent agency to prescribe the guidelines for the annual pay comparability survey and to recommend adjustments annually, beginning February 1970, to the Congress for pay adjustments under the four statutory pay systems (Postal Service, General Schedule, Veterans' Administration, and Foreign Service).	No comparable provision, however the Federal Salary Comparability provisions (5 U.S.C. 5302) are amended to authorize the appointment of 4 representatives of employee organizations to participate directly in all phases of evaluating the pay comparability presentation to the President. (Sec. 9, p. 35).
The Commission composed of 8 members: 4 from the Executive Branch, the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, the Secretary of Defense, and the Postmaster General (or a designee of each); and 4 from employee organizations, 1 designated by the organization having the largest number of employees in the General Schedule, 2 designated by the two organizations having the largest number of employees in the Postal Field Service, and 1 additional member representing an individual employee organization. Each member would have 1 vote with the exception of the 2 designated from postal employee organizations who have one-half vote each. (Sec. 2, p. 2).
Federal Employee Salary Board of Arbitration established to rule on matters referred from the Salary Commission when there is a disagreement on the recommendations by a member of the Commission.	No provision.
The Board will consist of 7 members, 2 from the House, 2 from the Senate, 1 designated by the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, 1 designated by an employee organization, 1 designated by employee organizations and a chairman selected by the 6 from the American Arbitration Association. (Sec. 2(f)(1), p. 7).
Pay adjustments recommended by the Commission, or the Board as appropriate, will be submitted to the Congress each February, beginning in 1970, but the adjustments will become effective only after adoption by both Houses of Congress, within 60 days after submission, of a concurrent resolution approving such rates. (Sec. 2, p. 10).	Authorizes the President to make a comparability adjustment in July 1970 of the salaries under the four statutory pay systems based on the 1969 Bureau of Labor Statistics survey. Such adjustment may not be less than 3 percent. (Sec. 10, p. 36).
Cost: No estimate.	Cost: Fiscal year 1971, $720 million.

Miscellaneous fringe benefits	Miscellaneous fringe benefits
Postal employee step advancement will be revised to permit employees to reach the top pay step in 8 years instead of the present 21 years (Sec. 4, p. 18). Presently (39 U.S.C. 35552(a)) provides within grade waiting periods as follows: steps 2 through 7, 52 week between each step; steps 8 and above, 156 weeks between each step. The revision would reduce the waiting period to 26 weeks for steps 2 through 7, and to 52 weeks for steps 8 and above. Cost: Fiscal year 1971, $207 million. When fully implemented, $425 million per year.	No provision.
Premium pay is authorized for certain employees for Sunday, night, holiday, for overtime work. This provision applies primarily to border patrolmen, deputy U.S. marshals, Customs and Internal Revenue personnel, and Federal Bureau of Investigation. (Sec. 6, p. 21).	No provision.
Allowance at remote worksites is authorized, not to exceed $10 per day, to defray expenses of civilian employees assigned to duty at remote worksites. (Sec. 7, p. 22).	No provision.
Allowances for floating plant operations will be authorized for employees in the Corps of Engineers engaged in floating plant operations when the employees are prevented from boarding the vessel under circumstances beyond their control such as hazardous weather conditions, or while the vessel is in a shipyard for repairs. (Sec. 8, p. 23).	No provision.

LON C. HILL—AMERICAN

(Mr. DE LA GARZA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, a remarkable citizen of south Texas celebrated his 81st birthday March 14.

I am speaking of Mr. Lon Carrington Hill, the distinguished son of a distinguished father, known familiarly in south Texas as "Mr. Mose." His father established the town of Harlingen in what is now the 15th Congressional District of Texas. The son is a second-generation empire builder whose contributions to south Texas reach productively across the fields of agriculture, education, finance, industry, and human well-being.

Through a period of half a century Lon C. Hill has blazed trails of progress, economic development, and prosperity in my region. To his rugged determination and devoted leadership is due much of the credit for the fact that south Texas today is a pulsating empire with a population of more than 1 million, with a diversified and sound economy, and with an unlimited future.

This man deserves to be called Mr. South Texas, and this name is given him for many reasons. Mr. Speaker, the lifeline of our area is water—and "Mr. Mose" has done more to enlighten the people of our area about the necessity for conservation and careful utilization of the available water by building dams than any other single person. Years ago he sponsored and advocated the construction of Falcon Dam on the Rio Grande—a remarkable achievement. This was followed by the construction of Amistad Dam—and only recently he was responsible for raising money to pay the area's share of a project to remove the salinity from Rio Grande water—a problem which had threatened the very lifeblood of the area.

With all his personal attention to solving the problems of the area, this outstanding gentleman also worked brilliantly and diligently in the business world. Mr. Hill served as president of Central Power & Light Co. from 1939 until 1954 and as chairman of the company's board of directors until 1959. During this 20-year period the company grew and prospered—and so did south Texas, becoming an area of tremendous industrial strength and a new tourism frontier of national significance. Naturally, Lon Hill was in the midst of the action. He was instrumental in helping eastern industrialists to locate plant sites along the Texas coast, in boosting the south Texas tourist trade, and in joining wholeheartedly in a multitude of worthwhile civic endeavors.

South Texans honor Lon Hill for his service as chairman of the Corpus Christi Area Development Committee, member of the board of regents of Texas College of Arts and Industries in Kingsville, president of the Coastal Bend Tourist Association and the Corpus Christi Area Convention and Tourist Bureau, president of the Tex-Mex Holiday Council, trustee of the Southwest Research Institution and the Southwest Agricultural Institute of San Antonio, director of the Texas Research League, president of the Lower Rio Grande Valley Historical Society, member of the executive committee of the Lower Rio Grande Water Committee, and first honorary counselor of the Texas A. & M. Research Foundation. He has headed many successful fund drives for civic projects.

His honors have been many. All were well deserved.

"Mr. Mose" is a devoted family man—a husband and father whose prideful joy is his family.

He is loyal to his friends—and they are a multitude.

I am proud to salute Lon C. Hill on the occasion of his birthday—and proud to call him my friend. He is a great human being.

THE LOS ANGELES SCHOOL DESEGREGATION CASE

(Mr. CORMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, a recent Los Angeles Superior Court decision—the case of Crawford against Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles—has been given considerable attention nationally.

Judge Gitelson, who wrote the decision, has been subject to criticism and rebuke by a number of people, including the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Robert Finch. I suspect that much of this abusive comment comes from persons who may not have had an opportunity to read the decision in detail.

The subject matter involved in this case is of national importance. It deals with the constitutional right of every American child to be treated equally under the law. Although the text is long, I urge my colleagues to read it because it raises issues that are important to each of us in the House.

Neither I nor any other lawyer can predict what may happen to this case on appeal, but it does seem to me that the judge's decision is rooted in sound constitutional law and basic morality.

As for those who may be assessing political winds, I would hope that they too would avail themselves of an opportunity to read the decision carefully before making Justice Gitelson a prime target of their criticism.

The full text of the decision follows:

[Superior Court of the State of California for the County of Los Angeles, Feb. 11, 1970; Hon. Alfred Gitelson, judge]

MINUTE ORDER OF COURT'S INTENDED FINDINGS OF FACT, CONCLUSIONS OF LAW, JUDGMENT, AND FOR PEREMPTORY WRIT OF MANDATE

(No. 822, 854—Mary Ellen Crawford, a Minor by Helen Crawford, her Guardian Ad Liten; Dollie Ruth Miles, a Minor, by Anne Mary Miles, her Guardian Ad Litem; et al., for and on behalf of themselves and all similarly situated pupils attending schools within the Los Angeles School District, Petitioners, Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles, Respondent.)

This cause came on duly and regularly for trial (prior hearings having been had on December 14, 1967 and April 29, August 9, 13 and 15, and October 11, 1968) in this Department 19, Alfred Gitelson, Judge presiding without a jury, trial by jury having been duly and regularly waived, on October 28, 1968, and was heard on said day and on the 29, 30, 31 days of October, November 1, 4, 6, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 20, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27 and 29, of 1968, and February 3, 4, 5, 6, 19, and March 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, and April 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, and May 1 and 2, and June 9, of 1969.

Petitioners [Petnrs. or Students] appeared by Bayard F. Berman, Sol Rosenthal, Michael Bergman, A. L. Wirin, Fred Okrand, Thomas G. Neuson, Samuel C. Sheats, Herbert A. Bernhard, Lawrence Sperber, and Edward Medvene, by Bayard F. Berman, and during a portion of the time Sol Rosenthal, Michael Bergman and Loren Miller, Jr., their Counsel. (Messrs. William Pintala and Peter Smoot on "PETITIONERS' POST-TRIAL MEMORANDUM ON THE EVIDENCE". The Court is indebted to them therefor.)

Respondent [Board] appeared by Dr. Robert E. Kelley, Assistant Superintendent of Education, Dr. Robert Purdy, Associate Superintendent of Education, Sam Hammerman, Assistant Superintendent of Education, and by John D. Maharg, County Counsel, Clarence H. Langstaff, Assistant County Counsel, Raymond W. Schneider, Deputy County Counsel, Alfred C. De Flon, Deputy County Counsel, Ronald J. Apperson, Deputy County Counsel, Jerry F. Halverson, Legal Advisor to Board, by Jerry Halverson, Clarence H. Langstaff and Raymond W. Schneider, on or about December 29, 1968, and thereafter Alfred Charles De Flon took his place, its Counsel.

This cause was tried and heard upon:

(1) The "SECOND AMENDED AND SUPPLEMENTAL PETITION FOR WRIT OF MANDATE" [Pet.] (filed July 6, 1966) [the original "COMPLAINT FOR DECLARATORY JUDGMENT AND INJUNCTION" was filed August 1, 1963]. On July 19, 1966 the parties executed and filed their "STIPULATION * * * FOR WAIVER OF OBJECTION TO CONSIDERATION OF FACTS OCCURRING SUBSEQUENT TO FILING OF COMPLAINT". Thereby they did, among other things stipulate:

"(4) The parties hereto shall not file or make any motion herein or take any other steps intended or resulting in precluding any party from introducing in evidence or in precluding the court from considering as material and relevent, evidence pertaining to events occurring subsequent to the date upon which the first complaint was filed herein merely because said events occurred subsequent to the date which the first complaint was filed herein. The rights of petitioners, if any, and the duties of respondent, if any, shall be determined as of the time or trial."

On July 23, 1968, it was ordered: That though by the Stipulation (filed June 6, 1968) a dismissal without prejudice had been filed and entered as to the original Petitioner, Mary Ellen Crawford (first named), that because from the date of the filing of the Complaint (August 1, 1963) the action had been designated thereby and all filings made thereunder, the caption of the cause should retain for identification purposes only as the first named Petitioner the name Mary Ellen Crawford;

(2) "AMENDMENT TO PETITIONER'S SECOND AMENDED AND SUPPLEMENTAL PETITION FOR WRIT OF MANDATE" (filed June 11, 1969) [Amm. Pet.] [The Petition and Amendment thereto are hereafter collectively designated as Pet. unless otherwise expressly stated.]

It was stipulated by Petitioners and ordered (June 9, 1969), that all of the allegations of the Amm. Pet. should be by Board deemed denied, both generally and specifically, and all affirmative defense existing under law deemed pleaded thereto;

(3) "ANSWER OF DEFENDANT TO SECOND AMENDED PETITION FOR WRIT OF MANDATE" (filed October 14, 1966) [Ans.]. (The "SIXTH FURTHER AND SEPARATE DEFENSE" (page 5 of Ans.) was by the Court on August 9, 1968 overruled:

(4) "REPLY TO RESPONDENT'S ANSWER TO SECOND AMENDED PETITION FOR WRIT OF MANDATE" (filed July 23, 1968) [Rep.]:

(5) It was ordered: (a) That the rights, duties, and obligations of the parties shall be those existing at the time of trial and therefore no Supplemental Petitions of Answers need be filed; and (b) (12/14/67) That the period of time commencing on or about the first day of May 1963 (Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Equal Educational Opportunities made to Los Angeles City Board of Education (Court's Exh. 5A)) and thereafter shall be the period of time to be first tried and heard as to the issues involved; that no evidence prior to said date need be or should be offered by either party, and that in the event either party shall desire to do so, such party shall make a motion for leave to so do; and it would then be ruled upon by the Court.

Evidence oral and documentary was received. Argument was heard throughout the trial. Points and Authorities were filed prior to and at the close of evidence. [Though invited by the Court to so do, Respondent did not file, though Petitioners did file, a Memorandum on the Evidence. The Court regrets that Respondents did not do so. It would have possibly made the Court's burden less onerous.] The Court considered all of the foregoing.

The Cause was submitted to the Court for its decision. The Court being advised in the premises now makes and files this its Minute Order of its Intended Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, Judgment and Peremptory Writ of Mandate.

Findings of fact

I. The following allegations of the Pet. were admitted by the Ans. and therefore accepted by the Court as true:

I.1 "Respondent Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles (hereafter referred to as "Respondent") is a governing agency administering the public schools within the district." (Par. 5 of Pet., admitted by Par. III of Ans.)

II. The following facts were either stipulated to or admitted or conceded, and therefore accepted by the Court as true:

II.1 "1. Petitioner Dolly Ruth Miles was a fourteen year old Negro child attending Markham Junior High School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"2. Petitioner Verde Darnell Miles was an eleven year old Negro child attending Ritter Elementary School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"3. Petitioner Maryann Miles was a seven year old Negro child attending public school within the Los Angeles City School District.

"4. Petitioner David Rodriquez was a six year old child of Mexican descent attending public school within the Los Angeles City School District.

"5. Petitioner Patricia Ann Sanchez was a ten year old child of Mexican descent attending Soto Street Elementary School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"6. Petitioner Raymon Jose Sanchez was a twelve year old child of Mexican descent who was enrolled in, and who subsequently attended, Hollenbeck Junior High School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"7. Petitioner Raoul Joaquin Sanchez was a twelve year old child of Mexican descent who was enrolled in, and who subsequently attended, Hollenbeck Junior High School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"8. Petitioner Karen Patricia Lynn Wheeler was a five year old Negro child who was enrolled in, and who subsequently attended, public school within the Los Angeles City School District.

"9. Petitioner Loretta May was a fourteen year old Negro child attending Markham Junior High School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"10. Petitioner Lenard May was a twelve year old Negro child attending Markham Junior High School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"11. Petitioner Autumn Renee Wright was a five year old Negro child who was enrolled in, and who subsequently attended, Trinity Street Elementary School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"12. Petitioner Alfred Graylin Wright was an eight year old Negro child attending Mar Vista Elementary School within the Los Angeles City School District.

"IT IS FURTHER STIPULATED AND AGREED THAT:

"13. Annie Mary Miles, the guardian ad litem of petitioners Dolly Ruth Miles, Verde Darnell Miles and Maryann Miles is a Negro lady.

"14. Celia Rodriquez, the guardian ad litem of petitioner David Rodriquez, is a lady of Mexican descent.

"15. Josefa Sanchez, the guardian ad litem of petitioners Patricia Ann Sanchez, Raymon Jose Sanchez and Raoul Joaquin Sanchez, is a lady of Mexican descent.

"16. Kaye Wheeler, the guardian ad litem of petitioner Karen Patricia Lynn Wheeler, is a Negro lady.

"17. Lucille May, the guardian ad litem of petitioners Loretta May and Lenard May, is a Negro lady.

"18. Margaret Wright, the guardian ad litem of petitioners Autumn Renee Wright and Alfred Graylin Wright, is a Negro lady." ("STIPULATION" dated Jan. 26, 1970, Court's Exh. 79 for identification.)

II.2 "Respondent does not generally provide transportation for, open school permits." (Ans. to Interrogatory [Interr.] No. 7, (Pet's 31A.) [Hereinafter: Petitioner's Exhibits will be designated "P." followed by its number; Respondent's Exhibits will be designated "R." followed by its designation; Points and Authorities filed will be designated, as to Petitioner, "P. PT.A." followed by the date of filing, and as to Respondents, "R. PT.A." followed by date of filing.]

II.3 "Permit policies of the Defendant (see Exh. 3C) do not provide free transportation or its equivalent to any pupil who was granted a permit to transfer pursuant to said policy,' (Ans. to "REQUEST FOR ADMISSION NO. 12", (P. 31A, p. 14.))

II.4 "Exhibit [P.] 19A shows the date of original construction of each school listed in Exhibit A [of the Pet.]. It also shows the year the original school was replaced." (Ans. to Interr. No. 19, (P. 31A, p. 166.))

II.5 "With respect to each of the schools listed in Exhibit A [of Pet.], the total amount expended each year on capital improvements to said school, commencing with school year 1962–63, is indicated in Exhibit [P.] 21A." (Ans. to Interr. No. 21, (P. 31A, p. 166.))

II.6 "With respect to each of the schools listed in Exhibit B [of the Pet.], the total amount expended each year on capital improvements to said school, commencing with school year 1962–63, is indicated in Exhibit [P.] 21A." (Ans. to Interr. No. 22, (P. 31A, p. 166.))

II.7 "That the subject matter of this action is a matter of interest to Negro pupils and pupils of Mexican descent attending the schools listed in Exhibit A hereto." (Request for Admission No. 248 (P. 31, (p. 114) admitted by Res. Ans., (P. 31B, p. 379.))

II.8 "Defendant maintains no records of racial or ethnic breakdown of student body population prior to November, 1966. * * * The following factors were not studied or considered because they would involve a change in existing policies of the Board of Education:

"(i) The effect of possible pairings or other combinations of schools with revised grade patterns;

"(ii) The effect of other approaches to improving the ethnic balance in the relevant areas and the District as a whole."

(Part of Ans. to Interr. No. 151, (P. 31B, pp. 303,304.))

II.9 "Defendant admits that the number of Negro and Mexican-American pupils attending school in the District is too large to permit all such pupils to be parties to this action." (Portion of Ans., Interr. No. 245 (P. 31B, p. 379.))

II.10 "That all of the demands, plans, or requests specifically set forth in paragraph 16 of the Petition were made upon respondent." (Ans. to Request for Admission No. 279, (P. 31, p. 118; 31B, p. 391.))

II.11 That partial integration of the District would not be effective; and, "that the only way to have effective integration is at least district wise." That partial integration or attempted partial integration of the District, "for example, around the periphery of the ghetto, would not be an efficacious means of integrating these areas."

(Stip., March 27, 1969; Transcript, vol. 42, pp. 7751–7754, 7774, line 6 to line 14, p. 7775.)

III. The following facts have been heretofore judicially found and adjudged as existing, and the following principles and holdings of law adjudicated. The Court and the parties hereto are bound thereby. (Cal. Const., Art. I, Sec. 3; Auto Equity Sales, Inc. v. Superior Court (1962), 57 Cal. 2d 450.). Board as the agent and instrumentality of the State of California [State] (Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 16; 78 Supreme Court 1401, 1408; 3 L. ed. 2d 5, 16 (9/29/58)), is collaterally estopped from disputing the facts found and is bound by the law adjudicated thereby. (Art. I, Sec. 3, Cal. Const.):

(i) (Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka [Brown I] (May 17, 1954); 347 U.S. 483, 74 Supreme Court 686, 98 L. ed. 873) "Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments. Compulsory school attendance laws and the great expenditures for education both demonstrate our recognition of the importance of education to our democratic society. It is required in the performance of our most basic responsibilities, even service in the armed forces. It is the very foundation of good citizenship. Today it is a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment. In these days, it is doubtful that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of an education. Such an opportunity, where the state has undertaken to provide it, is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms.

"Does segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race, even though the physical facilities and other 'tangible' factors may be equal, deprive the children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities? We believe that it does."

"In Sweatt v. Painter (US) supra, in finding that a segregated law school for Negroes could not provide them equal educational opportunities, this Court granted relief in large part on 'those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school.' In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 US 637, 94 L. ed. 1149, 70 S. Ct. 851, supra, the Court, in requiring that a Negro admitted to a white graduate school be treated like all other students, again resorted to intangible considerations. '* * * his ability to study, to engage in discussions and exchange views with other students, and, in general, to learn his profession.' Such considerations apply with added force to children in grade and high schools. To separate them from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone. The effect of this separation on their educational opportunities was well stated by a finding in the Kansas case by a court which nevertheless felt compelled to rule against the Negro plaintiffs:

"Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to [retard] the educational and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial[ly] integrated school system.

"Whatever may have been the extent of psychological knowledge at the time of Plessy v. Ferguson, this finding is amply supported by modern authority. * * *

"We conclude that in the field of public education the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal. Therefore, we hold that the plaintiffs and others similarly situated for whom the actions have been brought are by reason of the segregation complained of, deprived of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment." (98 L. ed. pp. 880, 881.)

(ii) (J. R. Jackson, Jr., et al. v. Pasadena City School District, et al. [Jackson] (6/27/63); 59 Cal. 2d 876, 880–881.) "The segregation of school children into separate schools because of their race, even though the physical facilities and the methods and quality of instruction in the several schools may be equal, deprives the children of the minority group of equal opportunities of education guaranties them equal protection and due process of the law. (Citations.) In view of the importance of education to society and to the individual child, the opportunity to receive the schooling furnished by the state must be made available to all on an equal basis. Because of intangible considerations relating to the ability to learn and exchange views with other students, segregated professional schools have been held not to provide equal educational opportunities, and such considerations apply with added force to children in grade and high schools. The separation of children from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of race may produce a feeling of inferiority which can never be removed and which has a tendency to retard their motivation to learn and their mental development. (Citations.) * * * Improper discrimination may exist notwithstanding attendance by some white children at a predominantly Negro school or attendance by some Negro children at a predominantly white school. * * * A racial imbalance may be created or intensified in a particular school not only by requiring Negroes to attend it but also by providing different schools for white students who, because of proximity or convenience, would be required to attend it if boundaries were fixed on a non-racial basis. * * * even in the absence of gerrymandering or other affirmative discriminatory conduct by a school board, a student under some circumstances would be entitled to relief where, by reason of residential segregation, substantial racial imbalance exists in his school. So long as large numbers of Negroes live in segregated areas, school authorities will be confronted with difficult problems in providing Negro children with the kind of education they are entitled to have. Residential segregation is in itself an evil which tends to frustrate the youth in the area and to cause anti-social attitudes and behavior. When such segregation exists it is not enough for a school board to refrain from affirmative discriminatory conduct. The harmful influence on the children will be reflected and intensified in the classroom if school attendance is determined on a geographic basis without corrective measures. The right to an equal opportunity for education and the harmful consequence of segregation require that school boards take steps, insofar as reasonably feasible, to alleviate racial imbalance in schools regardless of its cause."

(iii) (U.S. of America, et al. v. Jefferson County Board of Education, et al. (3/29/67); 38 Fed. 2d 835; Cert. denied Oct. 9, 1967; 88 Supreme Court 72, 77.) "If Negroes are ever to enter the main stream of American life as school children, they must have equal opportunities with white children." (p. 389.)

IV. The Court additionally finds true:

(Though the Court has found that the facts of harm to minority students by segregated education and the principles of law applicable thereto have been judicially and finally found and adjudged, (III), it is nevertheless bound to make Findings on the evidence received.

Respondent contending that its segregated schools were de facto and fortuitous, asserted that none of the facts found and adjudication thereof in the decisions cited in III hereof were applicable to Board or its schools, insisted upon, and the Court granted to them, the right to introduce evidence thereon and in addition in support of their contentions, persisted in to this date, "It is Respondent's view that the federal constitution requires racial mixing in the schools if, and only if, the racial separation of students in schools is of a de jure nature, or if, and only if, in the case of de facto segregation, the academic achievement of the minorities in the school will be raised by racially mixing students and the achievement of the 'majority' will not be substantially reduced by such racial mixing." (R. PT. A., 10/14/69, line 27, p. 2, to 1.1, p. 3.) "In the view of the board of education it should provide to all students a minimum educational offering in such amount and quality that the average achievement of the racially higher achieving group will not substantially decline. In addition the school district should provide to racial minorities, to the extent that it has the financial wherewithal, educational offerings in addition to the basic minimum offering to attempt to close the gap between the average achievement of white students and that of the racial minorities." (R. PT. A., 8/22/69, p. 14.)

Petitioners, though of course agreeing with the Findings and adjudications set forth in the foregoing III, insisted that they had the right, and the Court granted to them the right, in light of Respondent's contentions, to introduce evidence assertedly impelling the same Findings of Fact and the same Conclusions of Law as in said decisions found and adjudicated. Therefore, the following Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law are based on the evidence introduced and received.

IV.I Throughout the following Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law:

(i) The word "segregated" as it refers to schools and the phrase "segregated school" without further description thereof, such as de jure or de facto or white, denote a school or schools in which the students are minorities (Negro, Mexican-American and Orientals and comprise all or substantially all or substantially in excess of 50% of the student body of such school or schools; and

(ii) The phrase "racial imbalance" denotes a school or schools whose students do not approximately or substantially conform to the approximate racial composition of Board district; and

(iii) The phrase "segregated white" or "white segregated" or "white" denotes a school or schools whose students are all, or substantially all, or substantially in excess of 50%, white; and

(iv) (The citations of authority are not nor intended to be exhaustive, but merely illustrative. Reference to Exhibits or portions of the Transcript are not intended to nor are they inclusive of all of the Exhibits or of all portions of the Transcript applicable to the particular Finding or Conclusion for which they are cited. They are merely illustrative;) and

(v) Board being an agency and instrumentality of the State of California [State], the word "State" or "State action" or "State involvement" refers to action or omission by Board. State is not directly a party hereto; and

(vi) The word "Minority" designates and includes students of Negro or Mexican-American or Oriental ancestry; and

(vii) The word "Board" as used refers to and designates the Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles as an entity, and therefore includes and also refers to the Executive Staff and the Members of Board [Members]. (The Members of Board are part-time employees. Their task is monumental, including ultimate responsibility for: approximately 775,000 students attending grades K–12; 434 elementary schools, 73 junior high schools; and 54 senior high schools; an area of approximately 711 square miles; receipts and expenditure per school year of approximately $730,000,000; and approximately 48,000 employees. They must, administratively, necessarily rely entirely upon their Executive Staff, the Superintendent of Education, Assistant Superintendents, Associate Superintendents and the Assistants to each thereof (the Executive Staff is large). (R. Exh. 372, 372A, 372B, 372G). Members do not have a "Watchdog" or "Efficiency Expert" or "Expeditor" or "Executive Officer" or "Economist" or "Business Administrator" accountable only and directly to them. Members can adopt what resolutions they may be advised, generally proposed by the Executive Staff [Staff], but are essentially entirely dependent upon Staff for the fulfillment thereof, and by reason of the alleged expertise involved generally accept Staff's reasons, excuses and rationalizations for the nonfulfillment thereof. The Findings hereinafter of acts, omissions and bad faith on the part of Board in its failure and omission to integrate its schools are not intended to nor are they Findings of personal bad faith or personal acts or omissions on the part of the Members of Board, but rather of the operations of the Department which may or may not have been known to the Members.)

IV.2 That Petitioners and all of class on whose behalf the Petition was filed and proceedings had are citizens of State, free from any disability, qualified to and attending and entitled, by law, to equal educational opportunities in the public schools of Board, free from discrimination, directly or indirectly, by Board.

IV.3 That prior to 1966, Board did not officially assemble nor collect ethnic data of its schools. It only commenced to do so when required by State in 1966.

IV.4 In 1966, of a total of 441 Elementary Schools:

(i) 165 were minority segregated. Thereof: 52 were Mexican-American segregated; 74 were Negro segregated; 1 Oriental segregated; 17 Mexican-American and Negro segregated; 3 were Negro and Oriental segregated; 6 Mexican-American and Oriental segregated; 4 Mexican-American, Negro and Oriental segregated.

(ii) 191 were white segregated schools, and

(iii) 80 were in various stages of racial imbalance but not segregated.

IV.5 As of 1968: the racial imbalance in the Elementary Schools increased; segregated schools became larger in number of minority students; enrollment of white students generally increased in the white schools and generally decreased in the minority segregated schools.

IV.6 Six new elementary schools were opened between 1966 and 1968: three were white; two were Negro; and one Negro and Oriental.

IV.7 In 1966, of a total of 73 Junior High Schools: 24 were white; 9 Negro; 1 Negro and Mexican-American; 2 Negro and Oriental; 5 Mexican-American; 1 Mexican-American and Negro; 31 racially imbalanced.

IV.8 Between 1966 and 1968, two new Junior High Schools were opened. Both thereof were white (Laurence—1512 white, 64 minorities; Bethune—1585 white, 44 minorities).

IV.9 In 1956, of 56 Senior High Schools, 16 were white; 8 were Negro; 4 were Mexican-American; 8 were Mexican-American and Negro; 3 were Negro, Mexican-American and Oriental; 15 were in various stages of racial imbalance.

IV.10 Three Senior High Schools were opened in 1967. They were Negro and Mexican segregated (Locke—1821 Negro, 3 white, 19 Mexican-American and 2 Oriental. Riis—307 Negro, 1 "other nonwhite". Ross—47 Negro, 8 white, 20 Mexican-American.

IV.11 One Senior High School was opened in 1968: Crenshaw, with 2321 Negroes, 98 Orientals, 41 Mexican-Americans and 35 white.

IV.12 The schools which were segregated, minority and white, in 1966, and have and will remain segregated, caused to and will continue to be caused to so remain by Board, by its mandating neighborhood school system, including site selection mandating school attendance areas and boundaries of such schools, transportation policies, and restrictive, impracticable and non-effective, for integration transfer policies.

None of the schools opened subsequent to 1966 were designed to, in location or school attendance boundaries, effectuate desegregation or integration in education.

IV.13 In our present society the opportunity for an equal education, as a minimum equal to that afforded the socio-economic advantaged, in our public schools is indispensable to a meaningful life; to the preservation of our democracy, our form of government and society. Its deprivation from any segment of our people is a denial of their rights as a human being, the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness as citizens of our State and Country. "Education is a basic right because it is indispensable to the development of human beings." (Robert M. Hutchins, The Center Magazine, Nov., 1969, p. 90.) Education is the developing and training of the mental, physical, moral, cultural, philosophical and sociological powers and capabilities of the human being. "A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence being essential to the preservation of the rights and liabilities of the people * * *." (Cal. Const., Art. IX, Sec. 1.) There is an inalienable right on the part of every child in our State to an education. Therefore, in partial fulfillment thereof, and of the duties thereby imposed on State and Board, attendance in school is compulsory. (Edu. Code, Ch. 6, div. 9, pt. 2.)

The right existing, a duty is imposed upon Board to provide such education within its district. That duty to provide education, the right of all students thereto, includes the right to and the duty of Board to provide to all of its students an equal educational opportunity, being concomitant with equal protection of the law, due process of law. Separate, with allegedly separate but equal facilities, is not equal education. Therefore the duty on the part of Board to provide integrated education so that all of its students—white, Negro, Mexican-American, Oriental—receive together the same equal educational opportunities. The duty of Board is affirmative, not negative. (Art. I, Secs. 1, 2, 3; Art. IX, Secs. 1, 5; Cal. Const. "Bill of Rights", 5th and 14th Amm., U.S. Const.) "The education of the children of the State is an obligation which the State took over by the adoption of the Constitution." (Piper v. Big Pine School District, 193 Cal. 664, 668–669 (1924).)

IV.14 Board is an agency, an instrumentality of the State for the local operations of the State School System and for the observance and performance of the constitutional duties and obligations of State. (Hall v. City of Taft, 47 Cal. 2d 177, 181–182 (1956).) " * * * the state, because it had undertaken through school districts to provide educational facilities to the youth of the state, was required to do so in a manner which avoided segregation and unreasonable racial imbalance in its schools." (Mulkey v. Reitman, 64 Cal. 2d 529, 537 (5/66).)

State and therefore Board may not therefore use its funds to create or maintain or perpetuate segregated education. (Art. IX, Sec. 5, Cal. Const.; Edu. Code 5001 et seq., 8001 et seq.; Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 434 (1893).)

IV.15 Negro and Mexican children suffer serious harm when their education takes place in public schools which are racially segregated, whatever the source of such segregation may be. Negro and Mexican children who attend predominantly Negro or Mexican schools do not achieve as well as other children—Negro, Mexican and White in integrated schools. Their aspirations become more restricted than those of other children. They do not have as much confidence that they can influence their own futures. When they become adults they are less likely to participate in the mainstream of American society, and were likely to fear, dislike and avoid white Americans. It "affects their hearts and minds in ways unlikely ever to be undone." It applies equally to segregation not compelled by law (allegedly de facto) as when compelled by law (allegedly de jure). The harm results not alone from the deprival of equal educational opportunity, but additionally in the attitudes which such segregation generates and the effect of those attitudes upon motivation to learn and achieve. Negro and Mexican children are caused to believe that their schools are stigmatized and regarded as inferior by the community as a whole. Their belief is shared by their parents and by their teachers. Their belief is founded in fact. (Racial Isolation in Public Schools, p. 193, P. 436.)

Education is one of the most important functions of State and local governments. That finding was and is the basis for the conclusion and the imperative of Art. IX, Sec. 1, Cal. Const. (1849). Therefore the mandate, "The Legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement." Compulsory school attendance laws (Edu. Code. Sec. 12101, et seq., ch. 6, pt. 2, div. 9) and the great expenditures for education (Board for its District alone within our State, approximately $730,000,000 per fiscal year) demonstrate the importance of education to our democratic society.

Equal educational opportunity is the foundation of the right to be a human being, of good citizenship, the wakening of the child to and motivation for cultural values to help him adjust normally to his environment, to prepare him for later training, the ability to support himself and his subsequent family, to enjoy his life, his liberty and to pursue happiness. It is doubtful, though there may be some exceptions, that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of an equal education. This does not mean that any gifted child or any child having a greater capability to learn may or shall be deprived of his or her opportunity of learning more. It does mean that every child shall have the equal opportunity to learn to the best of his or her ability. That opportunity must be made available to all on equal terms. (Brown v. Jackson.) "In a society such as ours, it is not enough that the 3R's are being taught properly for there are other vital considerations. The children must learn to respect and live with one another in multi-racial and multi-cultural communities and the earlier they do so the better. It is during their formative school years that firm foundations may be laid for good citizenship and broad participation in the mainstream of affairs. Recognizing this, leading educators stress the democratic and educational advantages of heterogeneous student populations and point to the disadvantages of homogeneous student populations, particularly when they are composed of a racial minority whose separation generates feelings of inferiority." (Booker v. Board of Education, 45 N.J. 161, 212 Atl. 2d 1, 11 ALR 3d 754, 763 (1965); Hobson v. Hansen, 259 Fed. Supp. 504, 506; Ev. Code Sec. 452 (a), (b), (h).)

IV.16 Segregation of children in public schools deprives the children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities and this irrespective of whether the segregation be described or classified as de facto or de jure.

This Court finds as a fact from the evidence introduced in this cause that, "If Negroes [and Mexicans] are ever to enter the mainstream of American life as school children, they must have equal educational opportunity with white children." (U.S. v. Jefferson County Board of Education, 380 F. 2d 385, 389 (U.S. 5th Circuit, 3/29/67) Cert. denied, 88 S. Ct. 72, 77, 10/19/67.) Integrated education affords better educational opportunities to both minority and majority students. (Trans., pp. 8635, 8636, 8051, 8053.)

IV.17 Minority students in minority segregated schools do not receive equal educational opportunity measured either by educational inputs or outputs. There are significant disadvantages. Board knew or had reasonable grounds to know thereof. (R. 32D, P. 43–C–1, 36, 31B, 34B, 43A, 53; Trans., pp. 1405–08, 1409–16, 2676, 3022, 7885 to 7927.)

Minority segregated schools do tend to result in low aspirations, low achievement, lower educational competition and attitudes, to institute disbelief in ability to learn and a lack of qualifications.

The segregated schools, plant, teachers, physical facilities are in fact of less quality.

Segregated education tends to induce and create both on the part of the minorities and majority racial intolerance, misunderstanding, suspicion and fears. "Integration of education tears down the misunderstanding and fears that are based on ignorance of what the other person is really like." (R. 32J, 140–141.) The opportunity thereby to learn that all persons are human beings, to alleviate the fears, ignorance, prejudices and a bias otherwise existing, the teaching thereof and the opportunity to learn thereof is as much a part of the educational opportunity of the majority as of the minority. Only thus can the democratic ideals of equality, worth, freedom and dignity of every person be taught or experienced. (P. 15, R. 32J, Trans. pp. 8634–8665, 12055–12069.) It results in schools of predominantly low socio-economic status. It adds a stigma both to the minority pupil and the minority segregated school he is compelled to attend. The stigma is inimical to achievement and tends to erode further educational aspirations of the segregated minority.

Segregated education results in the assignment of grades within the segregated school unrelated to real performance. It causes and results in higher dropout rates of minority students. (P. 47, 31B (McCone Commission Report, pp. 55, 56).)

IV.18 There can be no equality of education "input" without integrated education. Only thereby will all students receive the same basic "inputs", to-wit, plant, books, teachers, curriculum and facilities so that each shall receive his just share. That is the equality of education, the equality of "inputs" and the opportunity of general educational "output." The latter is substantially affected by the former.

Though it is true that generally educational "output" is personal to each student dependent upon many factors as human beings, and the law does not and could not legislate equal ability to achieve, Board may not justify its lack of equal opportunity in "input" by the alleged superiority of "outputs" of the white students.

Board postulates that having a group, white, whose "output" makes a better showing for Board and its educational system that it therefore should concentrate thereon and only from any excess funds attempt to achieve through integrated education the same "outputs" by the minority. That may be Board's educational concept, but it is not the constitutional concept for equal opportunity to learn, to be able to achieve, the right not to be discriminated against, the right initially to be fed equal "inputs" at the source of the stream of man's humanity.

IV.19 Board has, since at least May of 1963, by and through its actual affirmative policies, customs, usages and practices, doings and omissions, segregated, de jure its students, in that it has knowingly, among other things:

(i) Adopted and slavishly practiced and adhered to its policy of selecting and purchasing sites and building neighborhood schools without regard to integration. It did so within racially imbalanced, segregated and ghetto areas; knowing and intending that the students of the area were required to attend thereat; the establishing of mandatory attendance areas and boundaries around said neighborhood schools perpetuated and created segregated schools; and (ii) Set its school attendance areas and boundaries without regard to creating racially balanced integrated schools. The attendance boundaries were knowingly set, knowing, or having reasonable cause to know, that the school affected thereby would either become or be perpetuated as a minority segregated school or a white segregated school or a racially imbalanced school. Board knew that its rights and powers to establish school attendance areas was and is subject to constitutional guarantee of equal protection and due process. (Jackson, supra, p. 879); and (iii) Never adopted or instructed or directed its staff, including the department establishing the school attendance boundaries, of any definition of educational integration or desegregation or racial balance or racial imbalance. (Court's 5–D–3); and (iv) Board did not establish any Feeder School Policies so as to create integration or desegregation or racial balance. It knew, or in the exercise of reasonable care should have known, that the policies established by it perpetuated or created racial imbalance and segregation; and (v) Established transportation policies for its students which in fact perpetuated and created segregation. Students living within 2½ miles of a neighborhood school were not provided with transportation. Board knew that many if not all of socio-economic disadvantaged students could not afford private transportation to schools outside of the area of nontransportation, and therefore that its transportation policy would cause all, if not substantially all, thereof to attend the segregated neighborhood school; and (vi) Consistently taken the legal position that it would only expend sums to create racial balance (though it had not officially defined what constituted racial balance) and would only affirmatively attempt to create, other than by token effort for public relations purposes, integration from surplus funds, surplus to all of its programs which it deemed necessary for the accomplishment of educational "output", which surplus funds it defines as that given to it by outside grants, either Federal or State; and (vii) Constantly taken the position, without first having made any true, in-depth study of the cost thereof, that the cost of providing integrated education would wrongfully require it to be compelled to divert such large financial or other resources from academic programs that the academic achievement of the pupils will literally suffer a significant decline. (Court's 5–D–3 (3/3/69)); and (viii) Contends, asserts, and acts thereunder, that separate but allegedly equal schools are equal educational opportunity; and that, unless and until it is compelled by the Court to do otherwise, that is what it will continue to provide to its students. The Court finds that throughout the period of time involved Board's separate but allegedly equal schools were not equal in fact, either as to plant or facilities or teachers or curriculum, and that Board has not made available to all its students equal educational opportunity. Board still asserts and contends, educationally and legally, that integrated schools are not reasonably necessary to equal educational opportunity; and that there is no legal mandate, constitutional, Federal and/or State, or Statute of State, imposing any duty upon it to desegregate its segregated schools or to remedy racial imbalance in its schools or to integrate its schools, and that it will not so do unless and until it, in its absolute, arbitrary and uncontrolled discretion, believes it to be "feasible" to integrate its schools (R. PT. A., 10/14/69, pp. 2, 3, 14, 16, 24, 25; R. PT. A., 5/1/69, pp. 4, 5); and (ix) Has expended the stupendous amount of taxes received by it in maintaining, protecting, or creating its segregated and racially imbalanced schools; and (x) Deliberately chose to assign and compel students to attend schools on the basis of geographic criteria when it knew that, having knowledge of the residential patterns, the assignments would perpetuate or create racial imbalances and segregation.

Board had, and knew that it had, the power and had the duty specially imposed by law, though denied by it, to adopt school assignment policies that incorporated other than geographical criteria, policies that would rectify the existing racial imbalances, that would create or tend to create racial balance and integration. It had the power and duty to select school sites for that aim, purpose and end. It had the power and duty, though it denied that duty, to readjust attendance zones and areas and to select school sites to meet and overcome the effect of population movement. It knew, or should have reasonably known, of the population movements within its district. Board did not execute those or any of these powers or perform those, or any of these duties specially imposed by law.

IV. 20 Board asserts as its obligation and duty:

"The respondent board of education is concerned primarily with school effects—with students' achievement. It views school inputs not as ends in themselves, but only as factors which affect students' achievement. For purposes of illustration, suppose it to be true that there exist in a school district one group of schools whose student bodies are composed predominantly of white students and another group of schools whose student bodies are predominantly Negro (or other minority) students. Suppose also that the average achievement of white pupils is substantially greater than that of Negro students. Using achievement as the criterion of equal educational opportunity, it is obvious that Negro students do not have equal educational opportunity because they are not achieving as well on the average as white students. What are the school district's obligations under such state of facts? As viewed by the respondent board its obligation is to raise the average achievement of the Negro students as close as it possibly can within the limits of its available resources to that of the white students. Again, viewing equal educational opportunity in a substantive sense—in terms of educational results—the board should allocate its resources to student education in such manner as to minimize the disparities between the average achievements of Negro and white students. On the other hand respondent board does not believe it to be its obligation to effect equality of educational achievement by so withdrawing academic offerings from white students that the average academic achievement of white students diminishes to the level of achievement of the Negro students. To use a rather extreme example for illustrative purposes, the respondent board would not consider it proper to reduce the basic high school offering to a three-period day, and then use the monies thus saved for compensatory education of Negro students.

"In the view of the board of education it should provide to all students a minimum educational offering in such amount and quality that the average achievement of the racially higher achieving group will not substantially decline. In addition the school district should provide to racial minorities, to the extent that it has the financial wherewithal, educational offerings in addition to the basic minimum offering to attempt to close the gap between the average achievement of white students and that of the racial minorities." (R. PT. A. 8/22/69, 1. 11, p. 13 to 1. 16, p. 14)

No credible evidence was introduced by Board, and the Court finds not true, that the educational abilities of the Negroes and Mexicans are inherently or genetically inferior to the whites. Board's said position is based upon an erroneous assumption, to-wit, that the educational opportunities made available by it in the minority segregated schools is in fact equal to that offered in the white school.

It is true that the minority children have not been taught as efficiently and effectively, with emphasis, compassion and understanding at their schools as the white school. "American education is most undemocratic when it accepts ideas of inferiority." (Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, Editor, Psychologist, President of Metropolitan Applied Research Center, N.Y., Nov. Bulletin of the Council for Basic Education.) (Though it was not received into evidence, Dr. Clark's standing and expertise is such that his opinions are entitled to consideration. The Court therefore quotes the following portion thereof: "I do not know of a single situation in which minority group children have been taught efficiently, effectively and with compassion and understanding and skill, in which their performance has not been at or close to the norm of the performance of other children equally well taught. * * * I think that the people who propose special education, special this, special that, for minority group children are violating the law of parsimony. When equal conditions have been established and it is found that the children do not respond, then and only then are we justified in looking for special methods, special techniques. * * * If children are taught well, they don't need it [compensatory education]. Every compensatory education program that I know of is merely a program in which these children are being taught. The critical variable is that children who previously have not been well taught are now, under the guise of some special program, being taught well * * *."

("Arthur Jensen by his claim that the reason for the failures of compensatory education can be found in the lower I.Q.'s of minority group children * * * hasn't been attacked enough. It is an insidious article; that is, it is an insidious approach. Scientifically, it is preposterous. Dr. Jensen doesn't know what he is talking about when he talks about genes, about genetic determination. The whole area of genetics is so complex, so unexamined. In this complicated and mysterious area of biology, geneticists are only beginning to understand the relationship between gene patterns and physical characteristics. They are a long way from understanding the relationship between genetic determiners and psychological characteristics. I don't think Dr. Jensen is a racist, he's just naive. Apparently, he has never understood the work of Franz Boas or Otto Klineberg and the cultural anthropologists, who, as early as the 1930's, were presenting evidence to show that the significant variable in understanding differences among human beings was not, as far as we know, inherent biological determinants, but the complexity of social and environmental forces that interact with whatever biological potential exists in particular individuals." (Wall Street Journal, Dec. 26, 1969.))

Board has not in good faith created, studied, analyzed, tested and understood the effects upon education of integrated schools or racially balanced schools which have been operated for a school [K. to 12] generation or other substantial period of time. Its alleged conclusions are based solely on tests in its low socio-economic segregated schools, schools in which the educational opportunity was not equal to the educational opportunities of the white segregated school.

IV.21 No credible evidence was introduced by Board proving, and the Court finds not true, that the offering and extending of equal educational opportunity to all by integrating schools would reduce either the educational "inputs" or "outputs" or motivation or achievement of the white students or that it would require Board to withhold from them any academic offerings.

The right, inherent, to an education, equal educational opportunity by and through equal integrated schools so that the opportunity to learn received by one is received by all, cannot be denied or abridged upon the fears or assumptions or grounds, if it existed: that whites are superior in learning ability and therefore have rights to a white segregated or superior or better education than minorities; or that the whites will be held back or deprived of educational opportunities; or that the average academic achievement of white students [will] diminishes to the level of achievement of the Negro students by integrated education. (R. PT.A., 8/22/69, p. 13) Citizenship, its rights and duties, knows no color. Schools, equal educational opportunity, should know no color between its students. There is no right to the duty specially imposed by law upon Board prohibits, minimization of cost of education of the minorities, whether socio-economically disadvantaged or not, so as to enable the alleged "racially higher achieving group" to achieve higher grades, receive better, higher-quality education, greater achievements, and be prepared for a better life than the minorities, and at their expense. Only when all, equally, have been provided with equal educational opportunity and, the minorities requiring it, created by the heretofore segregated education, have received educational offerings in addition to the minimal offers to attempt to close the gaps between the average achievement of the white student and that of the racial minorities, will Board have performed its duty imposed by law.

Board's policy and action thereunder to perpetuate in favor of the white students the disparity which it has found to exist and which it has caused to exist or continue to exist by segregated schools is educational discrimination. It is a denial of equal protection of the laws, of due process of law, of the inalienable and constitutional rights, the right to be a human being.

Board having only provided to "* * * all students a minimum educational offering in such amount and quality that the average achievement of the racially higher achieving group will not substantially decline" was and constituted state action of discrimination against the minorities in favor of the whites to perpetuate the disparity existing and caused to exist by Board through segregated education.

IV.22 Additionally to the constitutionally imposed prohibitions and duties, similar duties and prohibitions, the duty to integrate, prohibition against segregation in education, are imposed upon Board by our State Statutes.

After the commencement of this action, State Board adopted its Rules 2010 and 2011. (Rules 2010 of St. Board of Education; Court's 10A, 10B (filed 2/21/69, effective 3/21/69.)) Though adopted subsequent to the commencement of this action, in fact during the trial hereof, Petitioners' rights and Board's duties are to be determined, adjudged, as of the date of trial and judgment herein. The Rules have the force and effect of statutes. (Viner v. Civil Service Comm. (1943), 59 Cal. App. 2d 458, 465; Bruce v. Civil Service Board (1935), 6 Cal. App. 2d 633, 637; Duke Holner, etc. Liquor Co. v. Martin (May, 1960), 180 Cal. App. 2d 873, 884.

IV.23 Board also "is of the opinion that prejudice, bias and misunderstanding in society may tend to be reduced through closer contact of individuals of different races and cultures." (R. PT. A., 10/11/68, p. 2, 11.16 to 18.)

IV.24. Even if the doctrines and contentions of Board were legally valid and based on true principles of education, they are inapplicable. The segregated schools of Board are not equal in plant, or facilities or teachers, or curriculum with the white segregated schools.

IV.25 There is in fact no difference in terms of education, equal educational opportunity and educational discrimination, between de jure and de facto schools. The harm, the denial of equal educational opportunity, is the same. (Trans. pp. 1886, 1887, 2727, 2977–78, 3047–49, 3467.)

(Respondent attempts to differentiate Brown I and its progeny and Jackson and its progeny upon the ground, primarily, that each related to de jure segregated schools as distinguished from de facto segregated schools, contending that all of its schools, if any segregation or racial imbalance exists therein, which it does not admit, are de facto and not de jure. The findings of fact of each thereof as to the educational detriments of segregation were not related to or predicated upon de jure or de facto segregation, but segregation itself.)

"School segregation is 'inherently unequal' by any name and wherever located," found as a fact in U.S. v. Jefferson County, supra, (p. 389). It is true that the Court therein did "leave the problems of de facto segregation in a unitary system to solution in appropriate cases by appropriate Courts." "This Court did not 'excuse' neighborhood schools in the North and West which have de facto segregation. No case involving that sort of school system was before the Court." Having found and held that:

"School desegregation cases involve more than a dispute between certain Negro children and certain schools. If Negroes are ever to enter the mainstream of American life, as school children they must have equal educational opportunities with white children."

its reference to de facto segregation were restricted to the question of legal "solutions". This Court agrees:

"The Negro children in Cleveland, Chicago, Los Angeles, Boston, New York, or any other area of the nation which the opinion classifies under de facto segregation, would receive little comfort from the assertion that the racial make-up of their school system does not violate their constitutional rights because they were born into a de facto society, while the exact same racial make-up of the school system in the 17 Southern and border states violates the constitutional rights of their counterparts, or even their blood brothers, because they were born into a de jure society. All children everywhere in the nation are protected by the Constitution, and treatment which violates their constitutional rights in one area of the country, also violates such constitutional rights in another area. The details of the remedy to be applied, however, may vary with local conditions. Basically, all of them must be given the same constitutional protection. Due process and equal protection will not tolerate a lower standard, and surely not a double standard. The problem is a national one." (Dissenting opinions, Gewin and Griffin B. Bell (Circuit Judges), U.S. v. Jefferson, 380 Fed. Rep. 2d 397–398.)

IV.26 From an educational standpoint, to achieve greater understanding, reduction of prejudice, minimization of racial conflicts, a better and greater educational opportunity, it is sounder to integrate minority and majority children when they enter kindergarten or elementary school and give them an integrated education experience all the way through public schools rather than keeping minority and majority children in segregated schools until they reach junior high or senior high school. Board knew thereof. P. 43–C, p. 204; Trans. pp. 8170–77).

IV.27 Board's alleged open enrollment policies (Second and Further Separate Affirmative Defense, par. I of Ans.) was not and is not a policy of integration or desegregation or of corrections of racial imbalance. It was and is not even a technique for the achievement of any thereof.

It was and is not mandatory. Integration, the creation of racial balance, the elimination of racial imbalance, must be mandated.

It was and is not a "right" of transfer, but only a "privilege" of transfer on the basis of "first come, first served." It was not equal.

A plan and its methods, means, mechanics and techniques of integration, of desegregation, of remedying racial imbalances and creating racial balance must be designed to and work and achieve its objectives. It did not. (Court's Exh. 5A, pp. 14–18; R. 14A, Trans. pp. 1764–71.)

No provision was or is made for the transportation of students from the "sending school" to the "receiving school". Board knew that the socio-economic disadvantaged could not avail itself of any alleged privilege to transfer without transportation being made available to them by Board. The effect of the alleged policy was to permit white students attending racially imbalanced schools to transfer to white schools. (Trans. pp. 1965–67, 7364–65, 4827–4828, 4831–4843, 5414–15, 5442–5461, 6046—48.)

IV.28 Board, in its failure and omission since Brown I (1954), Brown II (1955), Jackson (1963) and the adoption by State Board of its original Regulation 2010 (October 23, 1962), to thereafter with all due and deliberate speed, in good faith, give to all students, white, Negro, Mexican, Oriental, equal educational opportunity in integrated schools so that every student of the District would be given substantially the same educational factors, both tangible and intangible, as every other student of the District and so that there be only schools, not white or Negro or Mexican or Oriental, has been guilty of bad faith, the failure to exercise the highest of good faith, the good faith that a trustee, and Board is a trustee (Pass School, et al. v. Hollywood, et al., 156 Cal. 416, 420 (1909)), owes to its beneficiary.

IV.29 Board has and has a duty, in all matters relating to the education of its students, to act in the highest of good faith. (CC § 2228.) A knowing, deliberate omission or refusal to perform a duty specially imposed by law by reason of the relationship existing, without just cause or excuse, and thereby denying to the beneficiaries that which is justly owing, is bad faith.

Fifteen and a half years have elapsed since Brown I. Approximately seven years have elapsed since the original adoption by State Board of Rule 2010. More than six years have elapsed since Jackson. Six years and seven months have elapsed since the filing of this proceeding. Though "[t]he Board of Education reaffirmed its responsibility to provide equal educational opportunity to children of all races, religions and cultures on June 7th, 1962, when it adopted the motion establishing the Ad Hoc Committee. The Board felt and feels that it has followed a policy directed toward the goal of equality in that the pupil-teacher ratio, basic curriculum, books per student, and transportation rules are equally applied throughout the District. It is conceded, however, that this formula falls far short of providing true equality for thousands of children who enter our schools from educationally and economically disadvantaged environments. They are in no way able to compete equally with children living under more favorable circumstances." (Court's Exh. 5–A "PREFACE", p. 1), and thereafter the Ad Hoc Committee recommended to Board (May 20, 1963):

"The Committee recommends that the Board of Education adopt the following statement of policy:

"The Board of Education believes that equality of opportunity in the total community for all ethnic groups is a desirable goal for our society. Therefore, the Board establishes a formal policy of providing equal educational opportunity for all pupils regardless of racial or socio-economic background, recognizing that equal opportunity is best achieved in schools which provide pupils an opportunity for interaction with persons of differing cultures and ethnic backgrounds.

"In furtherance of this policy the Board recognizes an obligation to act positively within the framework of its educational responsibilities, at all levels and in all areas of the school system)

"a. By encouraging actions and programs designed to maintain in the Los Angeles City Schools a position of leadership in the avoidance of segregation or discrimination in such matters as school boundaries; student discipline; educational and vocational counseling; teacher placement, transfer, and promotion; and any other matter affecting equal educational opportunity)

"b. By insuring that all such policies are continuously and clearly communicated to all school personnel and to the public."

(Court's Exh. 5–A, pp. 2–3), it was not until approximately four years later (December 21, 1967) that Board purportedly adopted the Ad Hoc Committee's Recommendation (Court's Exh. 5–C, pp. 1–4), resolving, among other things, that "Further, in order to clarify its position, that the Los Angeles Board of Education accepts Directive No. 1 of the 1963 Ad Hoc Report as policy. In addition, the Board of Education sets as its goal an integrated system at all levels and divisions and instructs the staff to develop every feasible technique and program to accomplish this goal." Board did not take and has not taken any meaningful steps nor adopted any meaningful means or methods or mechanics or techniques therefor, nor even to this date adopted definitions of "integration" or "desegregation" or "racial balance" or "racial imbalance".

On February 13, 1969, State Board adopted its Amended Rules, Secs. 2010 and 2011 (Title 5, Calif. Admin. Code), to become effective March 1969. On March 3, 1969, Board adopted its Superintendent's recommendations and interpretation of said Rules, to wit:

"* * * The Superintendent therefore construes Sec. 2010 to mean that each school board shall seriously and earnestly engage in an 'effort to prevent and eliminate racial and ethnic imbalance' WHERE FEASIBLE, and that prevention and elimination of such imbalance shall be one of the principal or primary goals of the district. The State Board did not say that the prevention and elimination of racial and ethnic imbalance shall be the first, and if necessary, the exclusive priority of each school district. [Emphasis ours.]

"Inference may be made from Sec. 2011 (a) (1) that the State Board regards a school to be in ideal or perfect racial and ethnic balance where the respective proportions of ethnic and racial groups in each grade of the school are precisely the same proportions that such racial and ethnic groups represent in the total school district pupil population. Sec. 2011(a), subsections 1 to 4, seem to require each district continually to strive, insofar a [sic.] seems feasible, to achieve this ideal racial and ethnic balance. However, the Superintendent does not construe Sec. 2011 (a) to require a school district to neglect its academic program in seeking to achieve such concept of ideal racial and ethnic balances, * * *.

"* * * The Superintendent further construes Secs. 2010 and 2011 to require the School District to racially and ethnically balance school populations, and ideally, grade populations within schools, where feasible. The extent to which the achievement of ethnic and racial balance is feasible is a decision legally committed to the Board of Education. The Board is to make its decision by weighing the feasibility factors specified in Sec. 2011(c), including the items set forth in subsections 1–4, in the manner there stated.

"In summary, the Superintendent interprets these Rules to mean that the Board of Education is not required by Secs. 2010 and 2011 (as amended) to allocate its financial and other resources to the achievement of racial and ethnic balance if student academic achievement would likely suffer any significant decline because of any required reduction in the academic programs. * * *" (Emphasis ours.) (Court's Exh. 5–D–3.)

Notwithstanding said Resolution, Board did not then undertake or make the study, and has not formulated any plans, "for the relief and amelioration of racial and ethnic imbalance existing within some of the schools of the District". Approximately one year has elapsed from the adoption of said Resolution.

The Court hereafter concludes that the duty imposed upon Board, constitutionally and under 2010 and 2011, to desegregate and integrate its schools, district-wide, is absolute, not merely to "seriously and earnestly engage in an 'effort to prevent and eliminate racial and ethnic imbalance' where feasible" in the opinion of Board or only "seem[s] to require each district continually to strive, insofar a [sic.] seems feasible" to Board "to achieve this ideal racial and ethnic balance".

Board had and has no right to condition, a condition precedent, its duty to the time when, in its opinion, integration would be "feasible", that is, when and only when it may feel that it has "excess" funds, excess to its segregated education, and when it, in its absolute, arbitrary and uncontrolled discretion, may determine and resolve that "the academic achievement of the 'minorities' in the schools will be raised by racially mixing students and the achievement of the 'majority' will not be substantially reduced by such racial mixing." (R. Pt. A., 10–14–69, pp. 2–3); because, it asserts, "its obligation is to raise the average achievement of the Negro students as close as it possibly can within the limits of its available resources to that of the white students. * * * [to] allocate its resources to student education in such manner as to minimize the disparities between the average achievements of Negro and white students. * * * [and not] to effect equality of educational achievement by so withdrawing academic offerings from white students that the average academic achievement of white students diminishes to the level of achievement of the Negro students * * *

[and, therefore,] it should provide to all students a minimum educational offering in such amount and quality that the average achievement of the racially higher achieving group will not substantially decline * * * [and thereafter] should provide to racial minorities, to the extent that it has the financial wherewithal, educational offerings in addition to the basic minimum offering to attempt to close the gap between the average achievement of white students and that of the racial minorities." (R. Pt. A., 8–22–69, pp. 13–14.)

Board is still committed to its policy, contrary to the duty specially imposed by law: that separate but equal is equal; and that no duty exists on its part to affirmatively seek, cause and create integration; and that neither constitutionally (U.S. and State) or statutorily (Reg., State Board, 2010), do minority students have any right to education by and through racially integrated schools. (R. 32B, R. 32D, R. Pt. A., 8–22–69, pp. 6, 14, 23; R. 373–2; Trans., pp. 12082–83.)

After the adoption by Board of its Resolution (Court's 5–C), hereinbefore set forth, the Court prepared its "COURT'S UNDERSTANDING OF REPRESENTATIONS OF COUNSEL FOR RESPONDENT'S INTENTION AND MEANING OF COURT'S EXHIBIT 5–C" (November 29, 1968). The Court thereby stated its understanding thereof as:

"(1) That the Board 'recognizing that equal opportunity is best achieved in schools which provide pupils an opportunity for interaction with persons of different cultures and ethnic backgrounds' 'establishes a formal policy of providing equal educational opportunity for all pupils regardless of racial or socio-economic background' by and through 'an integrated system at all levels and divisions.'

"(2) Therefore, the Board: 'recognizes an obligation to act positively within the framework of its educational responsibilities, at all levels and in all areas of the school system; adopts Directive 1 of the ad hoc Committee Report of 1963'; and 'instructs the staff to develop every' 'feasible technique and program to accomplish this goal' of an 'integrated system at all levels and divisions.'"

The Court requested confirmation thereof by Board. Board did not make any reply thereto until May 1, 1969. ("RESPONDENT'S POSITION RE EQUAL EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY AND DESEGREGATION".) It did not directly or unequivocally agree with the aforesaid construction of its said Resolution (allegedly "Director 1"). It purported not to have an understanding of the phrase "equal educational opportunity". It conceived "of at least three different sets of conditions constituting school district activities that may be indicated by the phrase". Included therewith was: "(1) One such set might be that every pupil of the district is presented with precisely the same educational factors, both tangible and intangible, as every other pupil of the district * * *"; and, as to that, Board was of the position "that there would be little point in seeking 'equal educational opportunity' according to the first set of conditions postulated". There is incorporated herein, hereat, verbatim, the said statement of the Board's position.

Board, notwithstanding its said Resolutions, Motions and Directives, is still committed to the policies that, unless and until it is "clearly demonstrated that integration has a substantial effect on student achievement in a positive sense", and when and only when it (in its arbitrary and uncontrolled judgment) so decides, would it "put our money into integration". (Trans. pp. 11106–07, 11412–13.)

That, by reason of all of the facts herein found, true and not true, Board, in its denial to Petitioners and the class in whose behalf the Petition was filed of equal educational opportunities by integrated education, has been and is guilty of bad faith.

IV. 30 Board will not, unless ordered so to do and supervised therein, within any reasonable period of time, formulate and adopt a Master Plan, including methods, manners, means, mechanics and techniques for the consummation thereof, for the integration of its schools.

IV. 31 Board's unwillingness and refusal to racially integrate its schools, unless compelled to do so, is in part based on fears and genetic assumptions—Fears: that the costs of integration, which costs it does not know, will financially compel a reduction in the educational inputs and therefore outputs of the majority; that integration will reduce the motivation and therefore the achievement of the majority and reduce the learning capability average of the majority to the assumed lesser-learning capabilities of the minority.

Board has not made any comprehensive, in-depth, good-faith study of the costs or effects of integrated education. Its data is from segregated minority, disadvantaged, low socio-economic schools with its high-advantaged, high socio-economic, white, segregated schools. Board did not introduce any credible evidence to support its fears and assumptions. The Court finds them not founded in fact and not true.

IV.32 Board may not, cannot, constitutionally, federal and state, justify segregated education, a denial of equal educational opportunity, upon the basis of maintaining a status quo or other desire to create or achieve an alleged superior educational race or majority. It was and is the very purpose of the constitutional requirement of equal educational opportunity not only to allow but to require the rendering of the same equal educational inputs to all students so as to assure to all equal rights to be a human being and better qualified to understand and be a part of society and the country.

IV.33 Board knew, actually and constructively (Westminster School District of Orange County v. Mendoza (April 14, 1947, corrected August 1, 1947) 161 F. 2d 774, 776–79, 780–81), that no Statutes of State or Rules or Regulations of State Board provided for or allowed segregated schools or required or allowed such adherence to neighborhood schools which would create or maintain or perpetuate segregated schools.

Board has and does maintain, perpetuate and create segregated schools and a segregated school system by slavish adherence to its neighborhood school policy and foundless hopes of voluntary integration. (Court's Exh. 5–A; Trans. pp. 1798, 2707–08, 3808–39, 1387–91, 1969–74.)

IV.34 Board made no racial summary of its schools until the year 1966, when directed to do so by State Board. (Trans., p. 11816.) Prior thereto, it collected such data only by general geographic automobile survey. Board knew or should have known that it could not comply with its constitutional duties without such data. Board had been requested, commencing with on or about 1962 to collect and collate such data. (Trans. pp. 11818–22.) Board knew or should have known, upon the original adoption (1962) by State Board of its Rule 2010, that it could not comply therewith without the collection and collation of such data.

IV.35 The new school sites selected by Board after 1963 were not selected to achieve integration in its schools. Board has not done so to this date. It has not, to this date, promulgated any definitions thereof nor instructions to its staff as to the selection of sites therefore. (Trans. pp. 3939, 4162–68, 4267–87, 11709–10.) Therefore, Board's staff were unable to and did not select sites to achieve integration. Eighteen school sites were acquired and schools built and completed between May, 1963, and January, 1968. (R. 148A, 36A.) Prior to the acquiring of the sites and the building of the schools, no consideration was given to alternate sites which would have had substantial effect upon racial balance. (R. 148B; Trans. pp. 3902–08, 4212, 4475.) The staff of Board, by reason of the failure and omission on the part of Board to define "integration", "segregation", "desegregation", "racial balance", "racial imbalance", and to instruct its site selection staff thereof, caused its staff to assume that racial balance was improved if only one white student was added to an otherwise segregated school. (Trans. pp. 3171–87.) No instructions were given to staff to consider, in changing attendance areas and boundaries, pairing of schools or consolidation of attendance areas and boundaries, or otherwise, to facilitate or create integration. (Trans. pp. 6092–96, 11708–10.) Board and its staff, in selecting, approving and resolving upon the creation or changing of attendance districts and boundaries, did not have any written data before it in approximately seventy-five percent of the sites selected prior to 1966 (Trans. pp. 4392–94), and, even in the remaining percentage thereof, did not have sufficient information upon which a decision for racial integration of its schools could be predicated.

IV.36 Board has, to the present time, knowingly and intentionally omitted, failed and refused to define and instruct its staff as to what it intended by "integration" or "racial balance" or "racial imbalance" or "equal educational opportunity." (Trans. pp. 4161–63, 7936–41, 8192–93, 9055–58, 11708–10, 12066–68.) It was not until on or about August 2, 1966, that Board talked about an experimental approach to integration in education (R. 32B, as distinguished from a/or any comprehensive plans for mandatory integration.

IV. 37 Board has since 1963 collected and spent billions in taxes, without calculably, affirmatively, actively and effectively seeking or attempting to achieve or achieving racial integration in any substantial part of its schools. The sums have, in effect, been expended to maintain and to perpetuate the segregation existing in its schools, without any progress for integration. Board rationalized its failure and omission so to do by asserting as hereinbefore found. Board's Directives, sounding as if it were in fact seeking and ordering integration, were solely for public relations, to attempt to keep the minorities pacified. (Court's Exh. 57; Trans. pp. 7984–94, 7996–98, 8032–44, 8047–50; R. 373–3B P. 35, p.5; R. 373–2, p.2) Board has not, since May, 1963, put into motion or maintained any effective integration program. (Trans. pp. 7893–7924.)

IV. 38 State Board's Rules 2010 and 2011 (Court's Exhs. 10–A, 10–B) are based on the recognition of the facts: That segregation or racial imbalance, however caused, is one of the fundamental factors contributing to the educational deprivation of disadvantaged children from minority ethnic groups. (Trans. pp. 9879, 9986.) That compensatory education programs are no substitute for integrated education. (Trans. p. 9982.)

IV. 39 The allegations of Paragraphs 1; 2; 3; 4; 6; 7; 8; 9; 10; 11; 12; Lines 14–18, p. 5, of Pet., of 13; 15; 16; 17; 18 and 19 of Pet.

IV. 40 The allegations of Paragraph 20 of Pet. (added by Amm. to Pet., Par. 1 thereof, filed June 11, 1969).

IV. 41 That to and only to the extent funds are granted to Board by the Federal Government or the State of Califorina, but not otherwise, Board has established and is operating compensatory educational programs for "its educationally or culturally deprived students, most of whom are from a racial minority group". (Lines 13–14, p. 2, of Ans.)

IV. 42 That compensatory educational programs are methods of substantial cost attempting to alleviate educational and cultural deficits sustained principally and substantially by the Negro and Mexican-American minority groups, "deprived students", students in segregated and racially imbalanced schools, by reason of the failure and omission by Board to, in the past, give to them equal educational opportunity by and through integrated schools.

IV. 43 That Board has "historically * * * selected its school sites and has built its school plants as close as financially possible to the center of the area in which the pupils live" (Lines 30–32, p. 2, of Ans.), neighborhood schools, without reference to integration and without regard to the effect of segregated education. That said school sites were selected and said school plants constructed and thereafter maintained within known segregated areas or areas which Board knew or should have known in the exercise of reasonable care and skill would be within a reasonable period of time a segregated area. That the attendance area zones had been and are selected without regard to the integration of Board's schools. "[A]ttendance area zone surrounding such school plants are based upon capacity of the school, safety and hazard factors, distance to be traveled between home and school, natural, geographic or other physical barriers" (Lines 9–12, p. 3, of Ans.), without regard to integration or the educational effects thereof, segregation or the educational effects thereof, or the rights of equal educational opportunity. The sites were selected, the schools were built, though Board knew or should have known, in advance, that their student body would be all or substantially all minority.

IV. 44 The instituting of this Petition for Writ of Mandamus in behalf of all of the students of Board similarly situated, the prosecution of this action, an involved and difficult one, requiring capable, experienced and diligent Counsel, was necessary, made necessary by Board, to compel it to perform the duties specially imposed upon it by law, to wit, to give to all of the students attending its schools, irrespective of race, color or creed, economic or social circumstances, equal protection of the laws, due process of law, equal educational opportunity, by rearranging, reestablishing, reconstructing, regrouping and otherwise as may be reasonably necessary therefor, its schools, so as to constitute racially unitary schools, not white, not black, not Mexican, not Oriental, but just schools.

Petitioners are but nominal petitioners in behalf of all students of Board. Petitioners could not, cannot, and should not be expected to, from their own resources, finance this proceeding. The research of the facts and law, the assembling of evidence (see for example P. 31), the preparation of briefs (see for example the Memorandum On the Evidence, 10–29–69), the selecting, interviewing and procuring of Experts to testify (for example: Dr. John Caughey; Dr. David K. Cohen; Dr. C. Wayne Gordon; Dr. Neil V. Sullivan; Dr. Dan W. Dodson), the taking of depositions (for example: Dr. Jack Crowther, Board's Supt. of Education; Arthur F. Gardner; Dr. Hugh C. Willett; Dr. Ralph Richardson; Mrs. Georgiana Hardy, Members of Board; Jewell Chambers, Member of Board) required the devoting of tremendous amounts of time of Counsel, aside from the trial. The trial for Counsel, was practically a twelve- to eighteen-hour day.

To undertake to pay the reasonable value thereof would require and is only within the financial ability of the rich. The Petitioners are not of that class.

It was therefore necessary for Petitioners to procure Counsel philosophically in accord, economically able to take the risk of, imbued with the same convictions, and therefore willing to devote the time, to make the time available and to undertake an unpopular cause, unpopular with the majority, for the protection of the rights of minorities, socio-economically disadvantaged, and therefore willing to undertake and to perform the substantial services required and involved upon, as to their compensation, a contingency, that is, if successful, for such sum, if any, as the Court might allow.

This is an equitable proceeding, having for its objective the compelling of Board to perform the duties specially imposed upon it by law. Without the undertaking of this cause by Counsel, without the allowing by the Court of reasonable compensation thereto, Petitioners and all others of the class for whose benefit the proceeding was filed would be at the mercy of Board.

It is necessary in our system of government that the governed be allowed to seek out, find and have represent them capable, experienced Counsel, willing to be a "watchdog" of the government as to the rights of the governed, always having in mind that where discretion is reposed, there lie the seeds of tyranny.

This proceeding is in behalf of and for the benefit and to protect the rights of not only the minority but the majority—though it is reasonable to assume that the majority will vehemently deny that fact. This type of proceeding is necessary to avoid, among other things, the possibility of any apartheid doctrine or policy in our country.

All of our people, whites, Orientals, Negroes and Mexican-Americans, will benefit by integrated living and experience in integrated schools, learning that race, color, creed, economic and social circumstances or station in life do not make anyone more or less than a human being. Integrated education will tend to teach all of the students to lose their fears of different races, their prejudice, their bias, their bigotry, to seek and do Justice, to walk humbly with their fellow beings, to love mercy, to temper righteousness with mercy, and to allow to every person their right to worship as they will. The parents, in participating in integrated educational processes, will also so learn. Board will learn of the benefit to all of its students by and from integrated education and will, hopefully, lose its assumptions of inferiority of one race when compared with another.

The right of Counsel to reasonable compensation should not be restricted or inhibited by a doctrine which limits the compensation of services of Counsel to causes which provide monetary recovery. The protection and preservation of the inalienable constitutional rights of any class of citizens, the enforcement of duties of government, imposed upon it by law, to its citizens, is at least as valuable, if not more so, than the recovery by litigation of money. Rights, particularly the inalienable constitutional rights, are a species of property. In a country of laws, the reaffirming, enforcement and preserving thereof, including the most sacred and invaluable of the rights, the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, to be a human being, for every person to receive the same equal protection of our laws, is one of the highest callings of Counsel; and when done in behalf of those otherwise unable to do so, the disadvantaged, Justice requires, demands, that they receive reasonable compensation therefor.

To the extent that there is recovered through this action by a large proportion of the students of Board (the minorities (1968) comprising approximately 349-thousand out of a total of approximately 775-thousand students of Board) substantial benefits, by causing Board to perform the duties specially imposed upon it by law, it raises the standard of the fiduciary relationship of Board to all of its students and so serves important considerations of public policy.

If the Court does not have, is denied, the power, the right, to allow reasonable compensation for the services of Counsel in causes like this and particularly when they skillfully, efficiently and effectively re-establish the rights of the class in whose behalf the action is brought, the bringing of such actions would be discouraged instead of, as it should be, encouraged.

Board had at its command in its defense practically unlimited resources. It appropriated a substantial sum to fight this cause. (Trans. p. 6908, Line 11, to Line 6, p. 6909; 6470, Line 21, to Line 11, p. 6472.) It had at its command County Counsel, able and experienced lawyers, and in addition capable, experienced private Counsel. (The Court commends all Counsel for a job well done.) Additionally, it used and made available to its Counsel the abilities, education and skill of its staff, among the very persons enjoined by law to render and perform the duties imposed by law sought to be enforced by Petitioners. It had daily transcript.

Board, as a Trustee, could have, and in the highest ideals of a trustee with the complete impartiality owed to all of its beneficiaries, should have, filed its own action or cross-complaint for declaratory relief to have the Court adjudicate its rights, duties and obligations to and among all of its students, assuming an imparial position, introduced all of the evidence available to it, and being willing, even desirous, of performing the duties imposed by law, asked the Court for a declaration thereof. Instead, it defended against the Petition, denied duties sought to be re-adjudicated, and caused to be performed. Its defense was strenuous, capable and hard.

Board would not have preformed the duties specially imposed upon it by law to grant to all of its students integrated, equal, educational opportunity but for this proceeding. To this very day, Board denies any such duties.

It is therefore reasonable, just, within the concepts of equity, the administration and preservation of Justice, and required by the conscience of the Court, that Counsel be allowed reasonable compensation to be paid by Board, and through it the peoples for whose benefit the proceeding was brought and prosecuted.

It is reasonably to be anticipated that Board will take an appeal from the Judgment herein. It is to be hoped that present Counsel for Petitioners will continue to represent them upon the appeal. Counsel shall be entitled to reasonable compensation therefor. It is, therefore, proper that the Court retain jurisdiction to, in the event of and upon entry of the final Judgment herein, allow to Counsel such additional compensation as may be just and reasonable under all of the circumstances for their services on such appeal. (Knoff v. City and County of San Francisco, 1 Cal. App. 3rd 184, 203–204 (October 27, 1969); Ball v. School Board, 321 F. 2d 494 (4th Circuit, 1963); Rolfe v. County Board, 282 F. Supp. 192 (E.D. Tenn. 1966) affirmed 391 F. 2d 77 (6th Circuit, 1965); Hill v. Franklin County Board of Education, 390 F. 2d 583 (6th Circuit, 1968).)

IV.45 The reasonable value of the service of Counsel for Petitioners, for the instituting and prosecuting of this proceeding to the date hereof and hereafter the preparation of the formal Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, Judgment and Peremptory Writ of Mandamus, the settlement thereof, and the reasonably certain to be made Motion for New Trial by Board, is the sum of $65,000.00, plus Petitioners' and Counsels' costs and disbursements herein.

IV.46 The Court retains jurisdiction to allow to Counsel for Petitioners reasonable compensation for their services on appeal and such other additional services which may be reasonably required to be rendered in any subsequent proceedings in this cause.

(There have been and are a number of persons of counsel for Petitioners. They shall agree, in writing, among themselves as to the participation of each in the fee allowed and hereafter, if any, allowed. In the event they are unable to do so, the Court retains jurisdiction to allocate the fees among them, based upon the contribution of each to the total of the services rendered. This cause was assigned to this Judge for all purposes. It is, therefore, to be anticipated that he will preside upon all subsequent proceedings herein.)

IV.47 The Court may not be, as Board asserts, qualified as an educator, nor should it, generally, interfere in the educational processes adopted by Board and taught to its students.

However, the adjudicating of constitutional and statutory rights and the enforcement thereof is within its jurisdiction, its powers, its duty and its honor.

IV.48 Board will only meaningfully adopt, in good faith, integrated education, a wholly unitary system of schools, as its aim, purpose and goal, with all due diligence and speed; will only evolve and adopt a Master Plan of and for integration, together with the manner, means, mechanics and techniques for the carrying out thereof, a plan, method, means, mechanics and techniques which will effectuate integration in Board's schools within a reasonable period of time, when commanded by this Court to do so.

IV.49 To attempt to assure the doing thereof in good faith and with all due diligence and speed; having in mind the long period of time already elapsed, during which Board has knowingly, deliberately failed and omitted to perform the duties specially imposed upon it by law; that, upon completion and adoption by Board of said Master Plan and of the methods, means, mechanics and techniques for the consummation thereof, it will be required to submit all thereof to this Court for its approval as conforming to law and the Peremptory Writ of Mandamus to be issued; to avoid the four to five years of hearings that have occurred in other cases (U.S. v. Montgomery Board of Education, 23 L. Ed. 2d 263, 272 (1969)); to avoid a repetition of the six years and nine months that have elapsed since the filing of the Complaint herein (August 1, 1963); Expert evidence (Evidence Code § 720) will be required by the Court to assist it in assuring the performance by Board of its said duties, and to assist the Court upon the review of any such Master Plan and the manner, means, methods, mechanics and techniques for the fulfillment thereof. Therefore, the Court's Expert shall be required to audit the proceedings of Board and to be of such assistance to it as may be within his power to assist Board in conforming to the Judgment and Writ of the Court and the duties imposed by law. "We were not content, however, to leave this task in the unsupervised hands of local school authorities, trained as most would be under the old laws and practices, with loyalties to the system of separate white and Negro schools." (U.S. v. Montgomery County Board of Education, 23 L. Ed. 2d 263, 268; Green v. County School Board, 391 U.S. 430, 439, 88 S. Ct. 1689, 20 L. Ed. 2d 716, 724 (1968): "There is no universal answer to complex problems of desegregation; there is obviously no one plan that will do the job in every case. The matter must be assessed in light of the circumstances present and the options available in each instance. It is incumbent upon the school board to establish that its proposed plan promises meaningful and immediate progress toward disestablishing state-imposed segregation. It is incumbent upon the district court to weigh that claim in light of the facts at hand and in light of any alternatives which may be shown as feasible and more promising in their effectiveness. Where the court finds the board to be acting in good faith and the proposed plan to have real prospects for dismantling the state-imposed dual system 'at the earliest practicable date,' then the plan may be said to provide effective relief. Of course, where other, more promising courses of action are open to the board that may indicate a lack of good faith; and at least it places a heavy burden upon the board to explain its preference for an apparently less effective method. Moreover, whatever plan is adopted will require evaluation in practice, and the court should retain jurisdiction until it is clear that state-imposed segregation has been completely removed.")

It is just, proper and provided by statute (Ev. C. § 731) that the reasonable compensation of said Court's Experts, as may be allowed by the Court, shall be paid by Board.

The Court, therefore, retains jurisdiction to, upon motion of either of the parties or upon the Court's own motion, appoint such Expert or Experts and to allow reasonable compensation for his or their said services. (The provisions of Chapter 3, Article 1, Article 2, §§ 720–733, of the Evidence Code shall be applicable thereto.)

V. The Court finds not true:

V.1 That "Respondent is as committed as Petitioners appear to be to the integration of the schools." (R. Pt. A., 10–11–68, p. 1, Lines 23–24; R. 373–3; Trans., pp. 8075–80.)

V.2 That "Respondent has made and will continue to make every feasible effort" or has been and is seeking or will seek every or any feasible means toward or to effect the integration of the schools or school systems. (R. Pt. A., 10–11–68, p. 2, Lines 1–2.)

The Court finds that Respondent will only do so when commanded by the Courts.

V.3 That "[c]ommencing with the large immigration of students of minority group derivation in the Los Angeles Metropolitan area, Respondent's basic policy has been, when confronted with two or more educationally sound courses of action, to select that course of action which is most likely to lead to school integration." (R. Pt. A., 10–11–68, Lines 8–12, p. 2.)

V.4 Respondent's view, the Court also holding it as contrary to law:

"* * * that the federal constitution requires racial mixing in the schools if, and only if, the racial separation of students in the schools is of a de jure nature, or if, and only if, in the case of de facto segregation, the academic achievement of the 'minorities' in the schools will be raised by racially mixing students and the achievement of the 'majority' will not be substantially reduced by such racial mixing." (R. Pt. A., 10–14–69, p. 2, Line 27, to p. 3, Line 1.)

That, under the duties specially imposed upon it by law, Respondent is only obligated to "provide to all students a minimum educational offering in such amount and quality that the average achievement of the racially higher achieving group will not substantially decline. In addition the school district should provide to racial minorities, to the extent that it has the financial wherewithal, educational offerings in addition to the basic minimum offering to attempt to close the gap between the average achievement of white students and that of the racial minorities." (R. Pt. A., 8–22–69, p. 14, Lines 9–16);

That it has any right, a choice, to create or maintain or perpetuate substantial allegedly de facto segregation because, in its alleged opinion, "a higher level of student achievement" will result than under integrated education. (R. Pt. A., 8–22–69, p. 24, Line 30, to Line 5, p. 25.)

The Court does find true that it [Board] has and will continue to so do until commanded otherwise by the Court.

V.5 that, no credible evidence having been introduced by Board so proving, the integration of Board's schools will significantly or substantially reduce the funds available for the education of its pupils.

V.6 That Board has not had available to it "any hard data indicating that classroom education as it is commonly understood will be enhanced through integration." (R. Pt. A., 10–11–68, p. 2, Lines 13–15.)

V.7 That racial imbalance and segregation existent in Board's schools since 1963 and thereafter is fortuitous. That the segregation in Respondent's schools is de facto and not de jure.

V.8 That, no credible evidence having been introduced by Board so proving, the educational ability or educational output of white students will be adversely affected by integrated education, either under the Rules of State Board (2010, 2011) or under the finding that integrated education requires not less than ten percent nor more than forty-nine percent of minorities, the residue being white, or by racially balanced schools, that is, wherein the percentage of minorities and whites in each school approximates the racial composition in Board's entire district. (Trans. pp. 967–69, 659–81, 1399, 2686–88, 3535, 3623; P. 43–C; National Conference, U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, pp. 280–84; Cohen, School Desegregation and White Achievement.)

V.9 That Board has not racially balanced all of its schools during the past years because it lacked or lacks funds to do so. That it could not have done so without sacrificing the academic achievement of the white or any of the students of Board.

V.10 That, no credible evidence having been introduced by Board so proving, integration would require massive expenditure of funds or that the costs thereof can only be created by substantial reductions in the educational processes.

The Court does find true: That when and only when Board evolves and adopts a Master Plan of integration, together with the manner, means, methods, mechanics and techniques therefor, and, as a part thereof, makes a thorough, unprejudiced study of the costs thereof, that is, the costs of the manner, means, methods, mechanics and techniques of putting said Master Plan into effect, will it know with reasonable probability the costs thereof. Upon the trial Board conceded that it did not claim impossibility of, or financial frustration preventing it from, if it was compelled by law to do so, integrating its schools. (Trans. p. 11092, Line 13, to Line 2, p. 11093.) That R. 379 is not credible proof either of the needs for or the costs of transportation. It is merely an exercise in mathematics. It is not predicated upon any, nor is it a, thorough study or plan, even though not a Master Plan, of integration. It was founded upon assumptions not justified by any of the studies of or for integration. It was caused to be prepared by Board during the trial of this cause as "an estimate" (R. Pt. A., 10–14–69, p. 14, Line 26) of the largest possible amount of possible costs of transportation to support its contentions (R. Pt. A., 5–1–69, p. 7) "that the expenditure of such sums upon certain specific current school programs would have greater beneficial effects upon achievement than expending the same sum for purposes of racial mixing." (R. Pt. A, 10–14–69, p. 14, Line 31, to Line 2, p. 15.)

V.11 The affirmative allegations of Paragraph IV of Board's Ana, excepting only that the Court does find true that, to and only to the extent that Board receives grants, federal and state, or mandated programs, does it establish and operate compensatory educational programs "for its educationally or culturally deprived students, most of whom are from a racial minority group."

V.12 The affirmative allegations of Paragraph V of Board's Ans., excepting only the Court finds true "that historically it [Board] has selected its school sites and has built its school plants as close as financially possible to the center of the area in which the pupils live", even though thereby it created or maintained and perpetuated segregated schools; and "that the attendance area zones surrounding such school plants are based upon capacity of the school, safety and hazard factors, distance to be traveled between home and school, natural, geographic or other physical barriers", without regard to integration and without regard to the affect upon equal educational opportunity of the students thereof by virtue of said schools being, or to become within a relatively short period of time, segregated schools.

V.13 The affirmative allegations of Paragraph VI of Board's Ans., excepting only that Board has had and does have policies of "issuing permits to pupils authorizing them to attend schools other than the school serving the area of their residence whenever there is unused capacity in such other schools"; but said policies do not provide transportation for disadvantaged children, did not educate the parents of minority students of the existence and benefits to be derived therefrom, were on a first-come, first-issued basis, and the alleged unused capacity was minimal, so that, in effect, said policies inured only to the benefit of the white students seeking to transfer to get out of a segregated or racially-imbalanced school into a white school.

V.14 The affirmative allegations of Paragraph VII of Board's Ans. Board introduced no credible evidence thereof. Board will not know whether the facts alleged by it therein are true unless and until it evolves and adopts a Master Plan of integration, together with the methods, means, mechanics and techniques thereof

V.15 The affirmative allegations of Paragraph VIII of Board's Ans.

The Court does find true: that the Bill of Rights, 5th and 14th Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, Article I, Section 11, Article IX, Section 1, of the California Constitution, and Rules 2010 and 2011 of the State Board require Board to grant to all of its pupils equal educational opportunity; that such equal educational opportunity can only exist in integrated schools; that to perform the said duty specially imposed upon it by law Board has the power to, and must, compel students to attend certain schools, to be designated by it, because of his race or color and to deny to students the right to attend a school selected by him or his parents solely because of his race or color. (United States v. Jefferson County, supra, p. 390.) Board stands in loco parentis to its pupils and is mandated by law to render to them said equal educational opportunities. Duties compelled by law confer all powers reasonably necessary for the performance thereof. A pupil has no right to select and determine the particular public school which he shall attend. That, since and only since 1966 when Board was mandated by State Board so to do, it has made a compilation of ethnic compositions of its schools. That its schools are approximately 561 in number (kindergarten, elementary, junior high, senior high), Board no longer having jurisdiction over junior colleges. That the area served by Board is approximately 711 square miles with a total student body of approximately 775,000.

V.16 The allegations of Paragraph IX of Board's Ans., excepting only that the Court does find true that Board has established a few insignificant pilot school programs, alleged integration, but did not make any in-depth analysis thereof so as to be enabled to determine the effect thereof. They were not, in fact, programs of or studies of integration, in that Board had never formulated or adopted any definition thereof.

VI. The Court makes no finding upon:

VI.1 The allegations, Line 22, p. 5, to Line 4, p. 6, of Petition. The Court hereinafter adjudging Board's duties specially imposed by law and ordering the issuance of a Peremptory Writ of Mandate directed to Board, ordering it to, in good faith and with all reasonable and due diligence, evolve and adopt a Master Plan, together with methods, means, manner, mechanics and techniques for the carrying out thereof, having for its objective and purpose the integration of all of its schools, and thereupon to present it to the Court for its approval as fulfilling said Writ and the duties imposed upon it by law, the Court should not and does not, in advance, make any findings thereon, excepting only that said Master Plan shall be applicable to the entire of Board's District Board is and should be allowed, in good faith, to evolve, evaluate and thereupon adopt the best and most expeditious Master Plan and the modes, means, manners, steps, mechanics and techniques for the integration of its District, which will work, and will have the burden, upon the return thereof to and hearings by the Court, to show that said Master Plan will work and will achieve such integration.

VII. In the event that any of the following Conclusions of Law are claimed or held to be Findings of Fact, they are by reference incorporated herein, hereat, verbatim.

As Conclusions of Law from the foregoing Findings of Fact

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. In the event that any of the foregoing Findings of Fact are claimed or held to be Conclusions of Law, they are by reference incorporated herein, hereat, verbatim.

II. That Petitioners and the class in whose behalf this proceeding was instituted and prosecuted did not and do not have any plain or speedy or adequate remedy at law. Their only remedy is this proceeding for Writ of Mandate to compel performance of a duty specially imposed by law.

III. The right to equal educational opportunity is an inalienable right, within the Bill of Rights, the 5th and 14th Amendments of the United States Constitution, and Article I, Sections 1, 3 and 13, and Article IX of the California Constitution, and State Board's Regulation 2010. The right of all students, K through 12 being involved herein, to attend school and to receive the opportunity to acquire an equal education, equal to the educational opportunity offered to all other students, irrespective of race, color, creed, economic or social circumstances, is a fundamental right, a legal right, a species of property, equal to, if not greater than, other tangible property rights, it being the right to be a human being, and requires that he receives said opportunity in integrated schools.

IV. Though, in its narrowest construction, the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is a limitation on, a prohibition of, State, and through it Board, action, it at the same time imposes a duty on the part of State and Board, as State's agency and instrumentality, that when any action is undertaken thereby it must conform to, effectuate and confer equal protection of the laws, due process of law, equal educational opportunity. Its actions need not be the sole cause of the denial thereof, to constitute a breach of its duties. Its duties specially imposed by said laws, and the prohibition thereof, are breached when discrimination "results" at least in part from its action which is sufficiently, to some significant extent, involved. (Mulkey v. Reitman (May, 1966), 64 Cal. 2d 529, 535–36.)

Board action, State action, was and is significantly involved in the discriminations existent within its segregated schools and segregated education so as to fall within the prohibitions of the 5th and 14th Amendments because:

(i) "* * * it had undertaken through school districts to provide educational facilities to the youth of the state, (and) was required to do so in a manner which avoided segregation and unreasonable racial imbalance in its schools" (Mulkey v. Reitman, supra, p. 537);

(ii) it lent its power and authority and finances and processes to create, maintain and perpetuate segregated schools and segregated education, and its action "discourages integration or instigates or encourages segregation" (Mulkey v. Reitman, supra, p. 540), even though that goal was not within Board's purposes. (Mulkey v. Reitman, supra, 537, "* * * it is established that even where the state can be charged with only encouraging discriminatory conduct, the color of state action nevertheless attaches." (p. 540.) "* * * state authorization to discriminate was no less state action than state imposed discrimination." (pp. 540–41.) "It is thus apparent that, while state action may take many forms, the test is not the novelty of the form but rather the ultimate result which is achieved through the aid of state processes. And if discrimination is thus accomplished, the nature of prescribed state action must not be limited by the ingenuity of those who would seek to conceal it by subtleties and claims of neutrality." (p. 542).) (Bell v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 226, 84 S. Ct. 1814, 12 L.Ed.2d 822, Opinion by Mr. Justice Goldberg, p. 833–36) (June 22, 1964):

"The Declaration of Independence states the American creed: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.' This ideal was not fully achieved with the adoption of our Constitution because of the hard and tragic reality of Negro slavery. The Constitution of the new Nation, while heralding liberty, in effect declared all men to be free and equal—except black men who were to be neither free nor equal. This inconsistency reflected a fundamental departure from the American creed, a departure which it took a tragic civil war to set right. With the adoption, however, of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution, freedom and equality were guaranteed expressly to all regardless 'of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.' United States v. Reese, 92 US 214, 218, 23 L ed 563, 564.

"In light of this American commitment to equality and the history of that commitment, these Amendments must be read not as 'legislative codes which are subject to continuous revision with the changing course of events, but as the revelation of the great purposes which were intended to be achieved by the Constitution as a continuing instrument of government.' United States v. Classic, 313 US 299, 316, 85 L ed 1368, 1378, 61 S Ct 1031. The cases following the 1896 decision in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 US 537, 41 L ed 256, 16 S Ct 1138, too often tended to negate this great purpose. In 1954 in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 US 483, 98 L ed 873, 74 S Ct 686, 38 ALR2d 1180, this Court unanimously concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment commands equality and that racial segregation by law is inequality. Since Brown the Court has consistently applied this constitutional standard to give real meaning to the Equal Protection Clause 'as the revelation' of an enduring constitutional purpose. [p. 833.]

"The dissent argues that the Constitution permits American citizens to be denied access to places of public accommodation solely because of their race or color. Such a view does not do justice to a constitution which is color blind and to the Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education, which affirmed the right of all Americans to public equality.

* * * * *

"The Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments do not permit Negroes to be considered as second-class citizens in any aspect of our public life. Under our Constitution distinctions sanctified by law between citizens because of race, ancestry, color or religion 'are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality.' Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 US 81, 100, 87 L ed 1774, 1786, 63 S Ct 1375. We make no racial distinctions between citizens in exacting from them the discharge of public responsibilities: The heaviest duties of citizenship—military service, taxation, obedience to laws—are imposed evenhandedly upon black and white. States may and do impose the burdens of state citizenship upon Negroes and the States in many ways benefit from the equal imposition of the duties of federal citizenship. Our fundamental law which insures such an equality of public burdens, in my view, similarly insures an equality of public benefits. This Court has repeatedly recognized and applied this fundamental principle to many aspects of community life.

"A few years later, in 1880, the Court had occasion to observe that the e Amendments were written and adopted 'to raise the colored race from that condition of inferiority and servitude in which most of them had previously stood, into perfect equality of civil rights with all other persons within the jurisdiction of the States.' Ex parte Virginia, 100 US 339, 344–345, 25 L ed 676, 679. In that same Term, the Court in Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 US 303, 307, 25 L ed 664, 665, stated that the recently adopted Fourteenth Amendment mu:t 'be construed liberally, to carry out the purposes of its framers.' Such opinions immediately following the adoption of the Amendments clearly reflect the contemporary understanding that they were 'to secure to the colored race, thereby invested with the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of citizenship, the enjoyment of all the civil rights that, under the law, are enjoyed by white persons . . .' Neal v. Delaware, 103 US 370, 386, 26 L ed 567, 570.

* * * * *

"In Strauder v West Virginia, supra, this Court had occasion to consider the concept of civil rights embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment:

" 'What is this but declaring that the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the States, and, in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color? The words of the amendment, it is true, are prohibitory, but they contain a necessary implication of a positive immunity, or right, most valuable to the colored race,—the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctively as colored,—exemption from legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of the rights which others enjoy, and discriminations which are steps towards reducing them to the condition of a subject race.' Id., 100 US at 307–308, 25 L ed at 665.

* * * * *

" 'The Fourteenth Amendment makes no attempt to enumerate the rights it designed to protect. It speaks in general terms, and those are as comprehensive as possible. Its language is prohibitory; but every prohibition implies the existence of rights and immunities, prominent among which is an immunity from inequality of legal protection, either for life, liberty, or property.' Id., at 310, 25 L ed at 666. (Emphasis added.)" (p. 836.);

(iii) Board has expended millions of tax funds for the protection, maintenance and perpetuating of its segregated schools, selecting and purchasing sites and building of schools in segregated neighborhoods, knowing that said schools would be upon opening segregated or racially imbalanced; and

(iv) it set attendance boundaries and mandated the school attendance at minority segregated schools of minorities, preventing or prohibiting or impeding them from attending white or substantially all-white schools (Ambler Avenue Elementary School, P. 33, p. 1, 2155; Hyde Park Elementary (Trans. pp. 4707 to 4718), P. 48, B. 4, P. 48, D. 4; Bethune Junior High School (Trans. pp. 4744–58), P. 48, E. 1, P. 48, E. 2; El Camino Real High School, P. 48, F. 1, F. 2, F. 3 (Trans. pp. 4858–60); Washington High School, P. 34, B. pp. 61, 63, 64; Lawrence Junior High School, P .48, I. 1; Van Gogh Elementary School (Trans. pp. 4905–57); Filmore; Vaughn; Pacoisa; Hadden (Trans. pp. 5100–5101); Burnside Avenue Elementary School, P. 4801 (Trans., p. 5150); Harding Street Elementary School, R. 148B., pp. 3 and 4; Muir Junior High School; O'Shea Junior High School; Carver Junior High School (Trans., pp. 5428–30); Crenshaw High School (Trans. pp. 5485–86, 5497–98, 5492–93); Frost Junior High School (Trans., pp. 5662–65); Wilson Senior High School (Trans., pp. 5728–32).)

The segregation, both white and minority, in Board's Schools was not, is not, de facto. It is de jure.

V. The labeling of segregation as de jure or de facto does not change the fact of segregation. Each is merely a legal designation, a legal handle in the formulation of duties. The duty to grant and give to all students, including the minority students, equal education opportunity, is affirmative, the counterpart of depriving by prohibiting.

The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments prohibited the denial of the rights thereof and imposed a duty on Board, at the very least, not to do anything to perpetuate the withholding of the rights, a duty not to do anything which in fact educationally discriminated against the right, a duty to in no manner or by any means aid in the deprivation of the right.

Therefore, was Board prohibited: from selecting sites and erecting and maintaining schools which perpetuated, if not created, segregation; from creating segregation by selecting sites and building schools, knowing that they upon opening thereof would be all or substantially all white or all or substantially all minority; from establishing mandatory attendance boundary areas which prevented or impeded the attendance of minority students at white schools; from denying transportation to socio-economically disadvantaged minority students to enable them to attend a school out of their segregated neighborhood.

The doing thereof by Board has factually, practically, a prohibition, a prevention, of the rights of its students and was de jure segregated education. (Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 68 S. Ct. 836, 92 L. Ed. 1161 (1948).)

It is practically impossible, in the creation and maintenance of neighborhood schools, and the mandating of attendance thereat, which are in fact segregated, and schools being created and maintained by tax money, to have only de facto segregation.

"Segregation in public education is not reasonably related to any proper governmental objective and thus it imposes on Negro children [all minorities] a burden that constitutes an arbitrary deprivation of their liberty in violation of the Due Process Clause and the Equal Protection of the Law Clause (5th and 14th Amendments of the United States Constitution)." (Bolling v. Sharpe (May 17, 1957), 347 U.S. 497, 501, 74 S. Ct. 693, 98 L. Ed. 884, 887.)

VI. The issue herein is not a social issue (R. Pt. A., 10–14–69, pp. 16, 18), but one of constitutional rights, whether separate but allegedly equal is equal. Board has great discretionary powers in determining the curriculum, the mode and manner of teaching, establishing and maintaining the public schools and the educational processes; and the Court will not impose its judgments thereon. But Board is a Trustee, a fiduciary, to all of its students, and owes to each of them a duty, in the highest of good faith, not to discriminate but rather to give and make available to all equal educational opportunity, not to give to one that which it denies or withholds from another, but equally, without favoritism, without preconceived assumptions of superior or inferior educational capabilities, without segregation, whether by reason of race, color, creed, economic or social circumstances.

The position of the Board that "the school district should compare the educational effects of a given number of dollars spent on one input with the educational effects of the same number of dollars spent upon another school input" (R. Pt. A., 10–14–69, p. 9, Lines 19–22), in deciding whether it will integrate education, overlooks its duty to all of its said students. The duty cannot be performed by favoring one race over another because of Board's belief, assumed, that minorities inherently are less educable. There can only be a true comparison of effect of expenditure of a given number of dollars spent on one input with educational effects of the same number of dollars spent on another input when all of the students have first had, and for a reasonable period of time sufficient to overcome the detrimental effects of the discrimination heretofore, equal educational opportunity, so that when dollars are spent on one input they will have been spent on all of the students having had the benefits of the same equal educational opportunity. (Only then, when all be treated equally, will we be enabled to disavor the cynicism and sophistry, "The law, in its magnificent equality, forbids both the rich and the poor from sleeping under bridges, begging in the streets and stealing bread." (Anatele France).)

VII. Nothing herein is intended to, nor shall it, prevent Board from expending any surplus funds, surplus after having first created equal educational opportunity, for special programs for all gifted children and other forms of higher educational processes.

VIII. Board, as an agency and instrumentality of State Board, is bound by and must comply with State's determinations and definitions of integrated education and its regulations thereon, they complying with the students' constitutional rights. (Pass School District, et al., v. Hollywood City School District (1909), 156 Cal. 416–18; California Administrative Code, Title 5, Rules 2010, 2011 (Court's Exbs. 10–A, 10–B); Edu. Code § 152; Art. IX, Calif. Const.; Gov't. Code §§11501 et seq., 11440 et seq.)

State Board, during the course of the trial, adopted, pursuant to the power vested in it (Edu. Code §152), its amended Rules 2010 and 2011. Neither the Fifth nor Fourteenth Amendments to or the Bill of Rights of the U.S. Constitution, nor Article I, Section 11, nor Article IX, Sections 1 or 5, of the California Constitution, nor any of the Sections or Divisions (Divisions 6 or 7 or 9) of the Education Code, nor Brown I or II, nor Green, nor Jackson, nor United States v. Montgomery County Board of Education, 23 L. Ed. 2d 263 (June 2, 1969), define "integration" or "racial balance" or "racial imbalance". It was left for the states to do so. Therefore, Board adopted said Rules to effectuate integration. They are binding on Board. Board must comply therewith.

Rules 2010 and 2011 being in fulfillment of State's duties, the Court must, if reasonably able to do so, construe them so as to be constitutional.

IX. Rules 2010 and 2011 should, therefore, be construed to provide and require:

2010. "• • • [T]hat [all] persons or agencies [County organizations (Division 3, Education Code), local educational agencies (Division 4, Education Code), etc.] responsible [under the Education Code] for the establishment of school attendance centers or the assignment of pupils thereto shall [mandatory] exert [put in vigorous action, do] all [every] effort [strength, force, power] to prevent and eliminate racial and ethnic imbalance [however caused or from whatsoever resulting] in pupil enrollment. The prevention and elimination of such imbalance shall [mandatory] be given high priority [a governing factor, control] in all decisions relating to school sites, school attendance areas and school attendance practices."

2011. "School District and State Responsibilities in preventing and Eliminating Racial and Ethnic Imbalance.

"(a) School Sites. Attendance Areas and Attendance Practices. In carrying [to carry] out [fulfilling] the policy of Section 2010, consideration [give effect to] shall [mandatory] be given to factors such as the following:

"(1) A comparison of the numbers and percentages of pupils of each racial and ethnic group in the district with their numbers and percentages in each school and each grade. [of the district]

"(2) A comparison of the numbers and percentages of pupils of each racial and ethnic group in certain schools with those in other schools in adjacent areas of the district.

"(3) Trends and rates of population change among racial and ethnic groups within the total district, in each school, and in each grade.

"(4) The effects on the racial and ethnic composition of each school [in the district] and each grade of alternate plans for selecting or enlarging school sites, or for establishing or altering school attendance areas and school attendance practices.

"(B) RACIAL AND ETHNIC SURVEY. The governing board of each school district shall [mandatory] periodically, at such time and in such form as the Department of Education [State] shall prescribe, submit statistics sufficient to enable a determination to be made of the numbers and percentages of the various racial and ethnic groups in every public school under the jurisdiction of each such governing board.

"(C) DETERMINATION OF RACIAL AND ETHNIC IMBALANCES AND CORRECTIVE PLANS. For purposes of these regulations, a racial or ethnic imbalance is indicated [exists, shown, denoted, pointed out, known, signified, evidence] in a school if the percentage of pupils of one or more racial or ethnic groups differs significantly [significant extent] from that in all the schools of the district. Insofar as reasonable feasible [capable of being done] in the development of corrective plans, the district should consider [conclude] that imbalance is indicated [exists, shown, denoted, pointed out, known, signified, evidenced] when the percentage of pupils of one or more racial or ethnic groups in a school differs by more than 15 percentage points from the district-wide percentage."

"Shall", wherever used, is mandatory. (Edu. Code § 36.)

(The definitions and synonyms inserted by the Court within the foregoing are from Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition.)

No discretion or right is vested in Board by 2010 to decide whether, in its opinion, integrated education will or will not affect the educational achievement of its students or whether or not, in Board's opinion, it is or is not "feasible" for board to comply therewith. Board is under a duty to comply therewith.

State Board does and must have the power to promulgate said Rules, for otherwise there could possibly be as many definitions and rules of integrated education, racial balance and imbalance as there are Districts within the State. The rules and definitions of integration, segregation, racial balance and imbalance must be uniform throughout the State for it is State action. Only if State Board should fail to define and provide for integrated education throughout the State, or if its definitions and rules were contrary to the constitutional rights of the students throughout the entire State, they being the students of State Board, may the Courts become involved, and then only upon a direct review thereof as provided by Gov't Code §11440. (CCP §1094.5.)

X. The Court does not have jurisdiction, in this proceeding, to review Rules 2010 and 2011, or promulgate a new or different definition of integration. Administrative remedy having been provided (Gov't. Code §11440), the parties must first exhaust this. It is a prerequisite, a condition precedent, to jurisdiction of the Court to review. (Abelleira v. District Court of Appeal, 17 Cal. 2d 280, 292 (1941); Clark v. State Personnel Board, 61 Cal. App. 2d 800, 802 (1943); Allen C. Woodward, III, et al., v. Broadway Federal, et al., 111 Cal. App. 2d 218, 220–(1952).)

Therefore, the Court may not herein determine whether: the "15 Percentage Points" is "Wholly Unsuited To Conditions In The Los Angeles City School District" (P. Pt. A., 3–3–69, P. 13); or that "it would produce more problems than it would solve. It would impose intolerable administrative and logistical burdens" (P. Pt. A., 3–3–69, p. 14, Lines 22–24); or that "the state yardstick is not grounded in the findings of the social scientists". (p. 14, Lines 27–28.)

Additionally, State not being a party hereto, any declaration or finding thereon or attempted adjudication thereof by this Court would inequitably affect or possibly jeopardize State's interests or rights, and the Court has no jurisdiction to do so. (CCP §389.)

Board also contending that said Rules are either wholly unsuited to the conditions existing in its District, unusable, would produce more problems than they would solve, would impose intolerable administrative or logistical burdens, has the right to, and, if they will prevent it from formulating a practical, workable Master Plan of integration, the duty to, petition State Board for a reconsideration of its said Rules. Petitioners have the same rights.

Petitioners' proposed yardstick, that is, "less than 50% but not less than 10% minority enrollment", is the finding of the federal studies of integration, and, if the Court were to find thereon, it would so find; but State Board has the first jurisdiction and right to consider the questions involved, including any claims, if any, of invalidity of its Rules 2010 and 2011. (U.S. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. 2d 189, 194–95 (1941).) This Court's jurisdiction and power is solely under Gov't. Code § 11440 and CCP § 1040.5. (Contractors' State License Board v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. App. 2d 557, 560–62 (1960); Caminetti v. Imperial Etc. Life Ins. Co., 54 Cal. App. 2d 514, 518 (1942).)

This Court is well aware of the horrendous period of time consumed in litigation such as this (August 1, 1963, to date), that a full generation, K–12, has elapsed since Brown I, and that minority students in Board's segregated schools have suffered not only a deprivation of their constitutional rights but as well in having received inferior educational opportunities; but, as we are a country of laws, the parties must comply therewith. Without law, there are no rights or liberties or a democracy.

XI. The fact that Rules 2010 and 2011 "have made little progress towards desegregation of" Board's schools (P. Pt. A., 3–3–69, p. 17) is not solely the fault of Board. It is the combination of the omission of State Board to enforce them and the refusal by Board to abide by and put them into operation until judicially forced to do so.

Therefore, "whatever plan is adopted [by Board] will require evaluation in practice, and the court should retain jurisdiction until it is clear that state-imposed segregation has been completely removed." (Green v. County School Board (May 27, 1968), 20 L. Ed. 2d 716, 724, 88 S. Ct. 1694, 1696.)

XII. Board has urged that, if integrated education be imposed within its entire District, whites will flee therefrom. Whether or not that be true, when integration be imposed upon the entire District, the Court makes no Finding thereon at this time; but the "fleeing of the whites", if it should occur, cannot and does not justify segregated education. Whites are not to be induced to, or caused to, remain within Board's District by depriving the minority of their constitutional, inalienable rights.

"The constitutional rights of respondents are not to be sacrificed or yielded to the violence and disorder which have followed upon the actions of the Governor and Legislature. As this Court said some 41 years ago in a unanimous opinion in a case involving another aspect of racial segregation: 'It is urged that this proposed segregation will promote the public peace by preventing race conflicts. [p. 15.] Desirable as this is, and important as is the preservation of the public peace, this aim cannot be accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created or protected by the Federal Constitution.' Buchanan v. Warley, 245 US 60, 81, 62 L ed 149, 163, 38 S Ct 16, LRA 1918c 210, Ann Cas 1918A 1201. Thus law and order are not here to be preserved by depriving the Negro children of their constitutional rights.

"• • • Thus the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment extend to all action of the State denying equal protection of the laws; whatever the agency of the State taking the action, see Virginia v Rives, 100 US 313, 25 L ed 667; Pennsylvania v Board of Directors of City Trusts of Phila, 353 US 230, 1 L ed 2d 792, 77 S Ct 806: Shelley v Kraemer, 334 US 1, 92 L ed 1161, 68 S Ct 836, 3 ALR 2d 441, or whatever the guise in which it is taken, see Derrington v Plummer (CA 5 Tex) 240 F 2d 922; Department of Conservation & Development v Tate (CA 4 Va) 231 F 2d 615. In short, the constitutional rights of children not to be discriminated against in school admission on grounds of race or color declared by this Court in the Brown case can neither be nullified openly and directly by state legislators or state executive or judicial officers, nor nullified indirectly by them through evasive schemes for segregation whether attempted 'ingeniously or ingenuously.' Smith v Texas, 311 US 128, 132, 85 L ed 84, 87, 61 S Ct 164. [p. 16.]

• • • • •

"• • • that the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution, and that principle has ever since been respected by this Court and the Country as a permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system. It follows that the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment enunciated by this Court in the Brown Case is the supreme law of the land, and Art 6 of the Constitution makes it of binding effect on the States 'any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.' Every state legislator and executive and judicial officer is solemnly committted by oath taken pursuant to Art 6, cl 3, 'to support this Constitution.'

• • • • •

"It is, of course, quite true that the responsibility for public education is primarily the concern of the States, but it is equally true that such responsibilities, like all other state activity, must be exercised consistently with federal constitutional requirements as they apply to state action. The Constitution created a government dedicated to equal justice under law. The Fourteenth Amendment embodies and emphasized that ideal. State support of segregated schools through any arrangement, management, funds, or property cannot be squared with the Amendment's command that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law. The right of a student not to be segregated on racial grounds in schools so maintained is indeed so fundamental and pervasive that it is embraced in the concept of due process of law. Bolling v Sharpe, 347 US 497, 98 L ed 884, 74 S Ct 693. The basic decision in Brown was unanimously reached by this Court only after the case had been briefed and twice argued and the issues had [p. 17] been given the most serious consideration. Since the first Brown opinion three new Justices have come to the Court. They are at one with the Justices still on the Court who participated in that basic decision as to its correctness, and that decision is now unanimously reaffirmed. The principles announced in that decision and the obedience of the States to them, according to the command of the Constitution, are indispensable for the protection of the freedoms guaranteed by our fundamental charter for all of us. Our constitutional ideal of equal justice under law is thus a living truth." (p. 18).)

Nor does white and Negro racism excuse Board's non-compliance. (Trans. pp. 7794–7801.)

XIII. Board's alleged open-transfer policies not having been designed to meet realistically desegregation, not being a plan of desegregation or integration, and segregation being the inevitable consequence thereof, is invalid. Open transfer plans must be reasonably designed to and must meet realistically the problems of desegregation.

XIV. Board is under a duty specially imposed by law to, in the highest of good faith: (i) with all due diligence and speed, evolve and adopt a meaningful Master Plan of integration, a plan that will realistically work within a reasonable period of time, having for its aim, purpose and object a racially non-discriminatory unitary school system within all of its schools as a whole and not merely for one or a group of schools, leaving others segregated; and (ii) as a part of said Master Plan, to evolve and adopt the methods, means, mechanics and techniques to make it work, and which shall work; and (iii) the Master Plan shall be made legally effective within and upon the entire of Board's District at one time, though the consummation thereof may require, and if it does State may do so, in steps, over a reasonable period of time; and (iv) the integration shall be in accordance with Rules 2010 and 2011 of State Board as now and hereafter existing. If Board cannot comply therewith within its District, pending the hearings on Board's petitions for the amendment or modification thereof so as to be practical and workable, Board's Master Plan of integration shall provide for and Board shall effectuate integration consisting of not less than approximately ten percent of minorities and not to exceed fifty percent of minorities in each of its schools. The transition to a unitary, non-racial system of public education was and is the ultimate end to be brought about" (Green v. County School Board, et al., supra, 722); and (v) therefore, the Master Plan shall, among other things, by its terms: provide for and the manner and means of its periodic public review, with reasonable notice to parents of children involved so that its schools shall at all times be integrated; and (vi) the Master Plan shall provide for, and the methods, means, manner, mechanics and techniques shall effect, the selection of new school sites and construction of schools for and they shall eliminate segregation and create integration.

XV. Therefore, Board shall, and a Writ of Mandate shall be issued herein commanding it to, on or before the 1st day of June, 1970, present to this Court, for its approval, in compliance with the Judgment of this Court and said Writ, upon notice to petitioners and, as shall be prescribed by the Court, notice to the parents of Board's pupils of the hearing thereon, said Master Plan together with the method, means, manner, mechanics and techniques thereof. Said Master Plan shall be designed for and be placed into operation prior to the school year commencing on or about September, 1970, so that in and during said school year and not to exceed under any circumstances the school year commencing September 1971, it be made effective as to all of the schools of Board.

Only a prompt start, diligently, in good faith, pursued, to eliminate racial segregation from Board's schools, can constitute good-faith compliance. Board is duty bound, and the Peremptory Writ shall command it, to devote every effort toward initiating the desegregation of, bringing about the elimination of racial discrimination in, its public school system, at and within the times aforesaid.

The Court retains jurisdiction to hear, approve or disapprove said Master Plan and its methods, means, manner, mechanics and techniques for the carrying out thereof.

XVI. Board shall not, and the Peremptory Writ shall command it not to, pending the adoption and approval of said Master Plan of integration, do anything, including, by way of specification and not by way of limitation, selection of sites, construction of new schools, construction of additions to existing schools, adoption or modification of transfer policies or transportation policies, adoption, changes or modification of school attendance boundaries, which will continue or preserve or tend to preserve the segregation presently existing in its schools. Board shall, during said period of time, only select sites, build schools, build additions to its existing schools, adopt or modify transfer policies, adopt or modify transportation policies and all other things for the purpose of integrating its schools and to desegregate these now segregated.

XVII. That Petitioners, through and for its Counsel and to be paid directly thereto, shall have and recover of and from Board, as the reasonable value of their services herein, the sum of $65,000.00, together with their costs and disbursements herein.

XVIII. The Court retains jurisdiction to, upon entry of final Judgment herein, allow to Petitioners for their said Counsel, and to be paid to them, the reasonable value of the services which may be performed by them from and after the entry of the Order on Motion for New Trial anticipated to be made by Board and until the Judgment shall become final.

XIX. Let a Peremptory Writ of Mandate issue, commanding Board as hereinbefore adjudged and commanding it to appear before this Court as aforesaid upon notice as aforesaid, on or before the 1st day of June, 1970, at the hour of 9:00 a.m., then and there to show cause what it has done to comply with said Writ.

XX. Judgment shall be entered accordingly.

(Counsel for Petitioners shall prepare the proposed formal Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, Judgment and Peremptory Writ of Mandate, substantially in accordance with the foregoing; shall serve them upon Counsel for Respondent, and thereupon lodge them with the Court. The preparation thereof shall not constitute an agreement therewith or acquiescene therein or waiver of any rights.

(The Court invites the attention of all Counsel to CCP § 634 and suggests their compliance therewith. Upon the close of the evidence, in lieu of oral argument, the Court invited and provided for the filing by all Counsel of Points and Authorities, including a review or Memorandum on the Evidence. Petitioners did so. Respondent filed Points and Authorities but no Review of or Memorandum on the Evidence. The Court assumes that Counsel for Board will avail themselves of the rights under CCP § 634, and requests that, with its objections to and requests for additional findings, it serve and file a Memorandum on the Evidence, which should include all evidence bearing upon the objections and requests.

(When, as and if the Judgment be entered, and the Peremptory Writ issue, unless Board shall procure a stay thereof, upon motion by the party or upon Court's own motion, a hearing shall be had as to the appointment by the Court of the Court's Expert or Experts, as hereinbefore found.)

(The Clerk shall send a copy hereof to each of the parties, to Petitioners by Bayard F. Berman, Michael Bergman and Sol Rosenthal; to Board by County Counsel, attention of Alfred Charles DeFlon, and to Jerry S. Halverson, Legal Advisor to the Board.)

Dated: February 11, 1970.

ALFRED GITELSON,
Judge of the Superior Court.

THE FACTS ABOUT PRAYER IN SCHOOLS

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, 7 years ago the Congress was wracked by fiery suggestions as a result of the Supreme Court's decisions on religion in our schools. From time to time certain groups and certain demagogic organizations picked up this hue and cry, trying to stir up the Nation that religion was dying and that belief in God had been banned.

After 7 years that have been demonstrated by foolishness and loose talk, it is refreshing that someone has written intelligently about the effect of the Supreme Court decisions.

I commend to the Members of the House the following article written by Mr. Louis Cassels, religion writer for United Press International, which appeared in the March 23, 1970, issue of U.S. News & World Report. I also call attention to the headnote in which Mr. David Lawrence, distinguished editor of the U.S. News & World Report, comments on the article. The article follows:

THE FACTS ABOUT PRAYER IN SCHOOL

(Note.—Here is a succinct article on prayer in schools distributed by United Press International for publication a few days ago. It deserves the attention of school authorities everywhere, David Lawrence, Editor.)

(By Louis Cassels, religion writer for United Press International)

Few legal opinions have ever been more widely misinterpreted than those handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court concerning prayer and Bible reading in public schools.

Even among school authorities and journalists, who should know better, the idea persists that the Court "banned" prayer and Bible reading from public school classrooms. It did not.

All that it held unconstitutional was the formerly widespread practice of beginning each school day with a miniature worship service, which typically included a devotional reading from the Scriptures and unison recitation of the Lord's Prayer.

This practice, the Court said, infringed religious liberty and transgressed the line of separation between church and state drawn by the First Amendment to the Constitution.

In the Engel v. Vitale case of 1962, the Court held that a public school may not require the recitation of an officially sponsored prayer as part of a classroom religious exercise.

In Abington School District v. Schempp the following year, the Court said that a public school may not require the reading of a portion of the Bible or the recitation of the Lord's Prayer as part of a classroom religious exercise. That is all the Court has forbidden public schools to do.

The Court went out of its way to emphasize that there is no constitutional objection to any of the following activities in public schools:

Use of the Bible as a reference work for teaching secular subjects.

Study of the Bible for its literary and historic qualities.

Objective instruction in comparative religion.

Study of the history of religion and its role in the advancement of civilization.

Reciting historical documents, such as the Declaration of Independence, which contain reference to God.

Singing the National Anthem or patriotic hymns, which include the composers' profession of faith in God.

References to God in patriotic or ceremonial occasions

Far from "banning" recognition of America's religious heritage, the Court went to unusual lengths to urge that public schools pay more systematic and effective attention to teaching about it.

"It might well be said that one's education is not complete without a study of comparative religion or the history of religion and its relationship to the advancement of civilization," the Court said in Abington v. Schempp. "It certainly may be said that the Bible is worthy of study for its literary and historic qualities."

What about "voluntary" prayers in the schoolroom?

If they are the private prayers of an individual, or the group prayers of students meeting on their own time and of their own volition, they are clearly permissible under the terms of the Court rulings.

But if they are part of an official classroom exercise conducted under the aegis of an agent of the Government (the teacher), they would violate the spirit if not the letter of the Court rulings.

Some school districts have inaugurated periods of "silent meditation" in which students are free to pray privately, to think deep thoughts, or just stare out the window, as they see fit. This practice has thus far encountered no objection from federal courts.

Other school districts—a UPI survey last fall indicates the number is substantial and growing—are simply ignoring the Court rulings and going back to the old custom of classroom worship services. This is clearly a defiance of the law as interpreted by the highest court, but a local school may get away with it so long as no parent goes to court to challenge the practice.

Relatively few school districts have had the courage and imagination to teach about religion and the Bible in the objective, constitutional way recommended by the Court. Some school authorities use the Court rulings as an excuse for avoiding what they see as a ticklish and difficult task—a dodge that helps to perpetuate public misunderstanding of the rulings.

Others say that no suitable curriculum materials are available. But this is no longer true. Plenty of good textbooks and course outlines are now on the market.

Any school district or Parent-Teachers Association seriously interested in learning what can be done in public schools—what is being done successfully in some schools—can obtain detailed information from the Religious Instruction Association, Inc., 4001 Fairfield Avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind., 47807.

STRIKE MUST BE DEPLORED

(Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the wildcat strike of postal employees now besetting various parts of our Nation must be deplored. At the same time one can sympathize with the plight of the postal workers who in some cases must go on welfare or take a second job to support his family. Nevertheless, the tactics being used by a minority of these workers should be soundly condemned and no action taken until normalcy is restored.

The question of a postal pay raise is elementary. These men perform a vital service for the economy and well-being of our Nation. Yet they have seen their pay rates fall steadily behind those of other federally employed workers. When a man must go on welfare to support his family despite working full time for the post office, then something is wrong.

But, Mr. Speaker, in great part the answer to the problem lies in the adoption of the postal reform legislation. The reform bill contains many of the provisions the postal workers are contending for. And yet, is it not ironic that they are the very one who have been opposing the reform bill with such vigor.

The reform bill would allow bargaining on a regional basis, it would provide for higher wages, for nonpolitical settlements, for grievance procedures, for arbitration, for a chance for promotion, and it generally offers many other benefits for postal workers.

Yet, the Democratic leadership in Congress has refused to bring the needed reform measures to the floor. The Postal Reform Act should be passed immediately. It is long overdue.

But there is another issue in this postal strike. And it is very simple. The strike is illegal. There can be no way to justify it. It is not only contrary to law, it violates a lawful court order. Postal workers have taken to the streets and neither the Congress nor the President should respond to the pressures of street politics.

Mr. Speaker, the frustration which the postal worker is experiencing today is a product of the same old political system which brought him to this point. Instead of taking to the streets illegally, he should be here lobbying for the postal reform bill so as to get this monkey off his back.

At any rate, I am not willing to vote for any bill granting additional benefits to any postal worker who is engaging in an illegal strike. I am just happy to note that the postal workers of the First District of Alabama have not engaged in such illegal activity.

GOVERNMENT MUST OPERATE POST OFFICES

(Mr. RARICK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, the current postal strike, which is not called a strike because to do so would be a felony crime serves to point up for all to see a serious and growing threat to our Government.

We have, in the past, enacted laws to cover exactly this sort of situation. There is no need for further talk here about the action or inaction of the Congress. The laws which we have passed—and they are the law of the land—are now being flagrantly violated. I refer particularly to 5 U.S.C. 7311 and to 18 U.S.C. 1918, which I include at this point in my remarks:

SUBCHAPTER II—LOYALTY, SECURITY, AND STRIKING

§ 7311. Loyalty and striking

An individual may not accept or hold a position in the Government of the United States or the government of the District of Columbia if he—

(1) advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government;

(2) is a member of an organization that he knows advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government;

(3) participates in a strike, or asserts the right to strike, against the Government of the United States or the government of the District of Columbia; or

(4) is a member of an organization of employees of the Government of the United States or of individuals employed by the government of the District of Columbia that he knows asserts the right to strike against the Government of the United States or the government of the District of Columbia.

Pub. L. 89–554, Sept. 6, 1966, 80 Stat. 524.

§ 1918. Disloyalty and asserting the right to strike against the Government

Whoever violates the provision of section 7311 of title 5 that an individual may not accept or hold a position in the Government of the United States or the government of the District of Columbia if he—

(1) advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government;

(2) is a member of an organization that he knows advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government;

(3) participates in a strike, or asserts the right to strike, against the Government of the United States or the government of the District of Columbia; or shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year and a day, or both. Added Pub. L. 89–554, § 3(d), Sept. 6, 1966, 80 Stat. 609.

Just who is running this country?

Many Americans have been aware for years that the important foreign policy decisions are not made by either the President or the Secretary of State, but by bureaucrats who have been imbedded in the State Department for years, no matter whether the President is Democratic or Republican. Worse, the decisions of these bureaucrats are actually made by a select group of real decision-makers outside of the Government, not elected, not even appointed, and frequently not even known. The whole sellout to "agrarian reformers" in Red China, repeated in Red Cuba, is an example of this seizure of power by individuals neither entitled nor in any sense qualified to wield it.

Recently we have seen the Department of Justice follow the trend and abdicate its policymaking functions to low level bureaucrats, particularly in the Civil Rights Division where radicals simply were attached to the public payroll to further the purposes of the radical organizations from which they came. Then, these same radicals contributed from their salaries to further the purposes of the radical organizations they were supposedly opposing. See my remarks, "Parallel Government," February 10, 1970, RECORD page 3295. The policies of the Department of Justice have been loudly and publicly attacked by its own employees—even in the courts where they were supposed to be promoting them.

Not long ago we saw the same kind of revolt in the HEW bureaucracy, where some 2,000 minor employees demanded an audience with Secretary Robert Finch for the purpose of making him alter the policies of the Department more to their liking. That intolerable spectacle was tolerated by those in authority in that Department. Even the ultimate removal of a high level employee who disagreed with the established policy—the Panetta case—was due to pressure from outside the Department.

In the Armed Forces we have seen deliberate and most dangerous infiltration—for the sole purpose of subversion. Whether we are talking about such a thing as a soldiers' union, or the seditious and subversive "GI Coffee Houses," or about the divisive cancer of "black power" in uniform, the idea is totally improper and cannot be tolerated—if we are to maintain a fighting force.

Now some of the postal employees have decided that they will ignore the law, ignore their individual oaths to their country, ignore the sound advice of their union officers, and blackmail the Congress into giving them more money from the Public Treasury. This is called extortion—and it is not a situation to be taken lightly. It represents to many of the informed Americans a probe for the purpose of determining whether the time is ripe for the disintegration of our system—for the long sought attack on the "establishment."

The genius of our system of Government—a sovereign Nation of sovereign States, governed by law, not men—is what is being tested. The time rapidly approaches when a decision must be made—whether our system shall continue or whether it shall be replaced by one keeping the forms, but not the substance of freedom. If we, the elected and responsible representatives of the American people do not make this decision—if we abdicate our responsibility—then the people will decide. The time for the Third Continental Congress may be approaching.

We know that if the people are truly sovereign, then those designated by that people to run their Government must do so. To let outsiders control the Government of the people is a violation of the sovereignty of the people. This is the disease which destroyed both the Third and Fourth Republics in France. It cannot be permitted to occur in the United States.

Strikes against the Government, by employees of the Government, and particularly those undertaken for the purpose of influencing policy decisions of the Government, amount to sedition and should be dealt with as such. There cannot be two governments in one land—and we have acknowledged that fact. That is why we enacted statutes to immediately fire and to punish as criminals those who undertake such strikes.

I call on the President to enforce the law of the land—to live up to his oath of office—to perform his constitutional duty—and to take whatever steps may be necessary to cause the Government to operate the postal service as it is charged to do. Like the war power, this is the subject of an unmistakable constitutional mandate from the people and from the States.

The operation of public schools and the internal organization of labor unions are of highly doubtful Federal interest under our system, but plainly, the mails must go through.

GILBERT ASKS ADMINISTRATION TO RECONSIDER ISRAEL POLICY

(Mr. GILBERT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, though we credit the Nixon administration with the most honorable of intentions, it is difficult to reconcile its present course in the Mideast with our Nation's long-established support of Israel's integrity.

It now seems clear that the present Arab course is one of attrition, to use raiding parties to provoke retaliation with the specific intention of depleting Israel's superior air might. The Arabs seemingly now have not only Russian equipment but Russian antiaircraft crews to man them. Russia also is supplying missiles to be used against Israel.

It is, Mr. Speaker, a chillingly shrewd appraisal of the military situation in the Mideast. While it is true that Israel's superior airpower now makes direct attack on that tiny nation a form of military suicide, if she cannot replenish her planes as they are downed, Israel soon will become vulnerable to the hostile hoards that surround her.

It is no idle fear that the present U.S. policy may play directly into the hands of the Arabs. Not only do we train Arab pilots here in the United States where we do not train Israel pilots, we apparently have sold jet fighters to Libya within the last 24 months. Now the administration has decided not to furnish Israel with new jet fighter planes until that isolated nation reaches some arbitrary breaking point.

Mr. Speaker, if we withhold our help until then, it may be too late to save Israel from annihilation. Israel has not survived these years because of parity but because of superiority. In the Middle East, parity is a code name for Israel's destruction.

Let us make it perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that our greed for Arabian oil has let us compromise our moral obligations in the Middle East. If the Israelis are belligerent about returning territories taken during the 6-day war of 1967, I daresay they have ample cause. The territories are not the roadblock to peace, nor in a sense, are the Arab nations who continue to agitate for Israel's destruction.

It is the powerful nations of the world, including ourselves, who are to blame for the perpetual crisis in the Mideast. As long as the Arab nations continue to receive arms, Israel must be armed. As long as Arabs and Israelis have armies, there will be wars.

The United States might be headed on the road to peace when it proposes de-escalating the arms race in the Middle East. But that precarious situation is not one where unilateral action can succeed. It will only result in additional bloodshed. Until we can reach accord with the Russians and other nations about a guaranteed reduction of arms on both sides, we simply cannot allow Israel's military might to be diminished.

Unless our present course of action is changed quickly, I fear we may be responsible for additional fighting in the Middle East. I urge the administration to reconsider its present stance as quickly as possible.

The President once asked us to consider not what he said but what he did. Mr. Speaker, we are watching closely.

MUTUAL FUND REFORM

(Mr. MOSS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, the Subcommittee on Commerce and Finance has begun markup on the pending mutual fund reform legislation. This legislation, in one form or another, has been pending before the Congress since 1967 and I am personally hopeful that we will be able to report out a bill in the very near future.

I want to commend to my colleagues the following article on the mutual fund reform bill by a distinguished and knowledgeable commentator, Mr. Henry Ansbacher Long. The article was published in the January edition of Trusts and Estates, as follows:

INVESTMENT COMPANY NEWS

(By Henry Ansbacher Long)

ENACTMENT OF FUND REFORM BILL SHOULD BE DELAYED NO LONGER

On July 31, 1967, almost two and one-half years ago, this columnist made his first of many visits to Washington to attend Congressional hearings on the proposed mutual fund reform legislation. Now, once again, the bill appears to be stalled because of a belated proposal of the industry for a self-regulatory association which, in the first instance, would determine the adequacy of management fees, and the refusal of the contractual companies to accede to what had been believed to be a compromise agreement with the SEC on the front-end load. We deplore such delays, particularly after the long-drawn out efforts of the Commission to arrive at an acceptable measure, weakened through it had been from the original draft. The self-regulatory proposal we deem primarily a "red-herring" merely introduced to insure defeat of the legislation.

The members of the House Ways and Means subcommittee now considering adoption of the bill, in fact, might well also insure its effectiveness by adding a prohibition against the investment in so-called "restricted securities" by all mutual funds. The potential inequities are too great where price is determined directly underlying asset value and redeemability is a primary consideration. A maximum percentage investment in such securities, a half-way measure, would not provide an adequate solution to the problem. While we would not excise the proposal for a stretched-out front-end load at the present time, we would exclude the corollary alternate provision for the load as it now exists with a three-year refund of sales excess over 15%.

SEC Chairman Budge's negative reaction to the industry's recent hastily conceived sketchy proposal for self-regulation and his plea for prompt passage of the legislation as currently drafted was well-publicized on his final appearance before Congressman John Moss' subcommittee in mid-December. Nevertheless, the Committee staff was continuing discussions at a subsequent meeting along with the Investment Company Institute, the NASD and, presumably, representatives of the Commission. Such discussion had involved the technical problems that might be encountered in establishing the association, far removed as yet from the negotiation stage. Congressman Moss, however, had not appeared too friendly to the idea, when it had been first proposed to his Committee at previous hearings in November by Robert L. Augenblick, president of the ICI. The latter had stated in his prepared testimony that the 1963 SEC Special Study of Securities Markets had concluded that "ideally, official self-regulation should be extended to include all elements of the securities business that feasibly can be regulated."

Mr. Moss did not recall, as did some other knowledgeable persons, that the ICI had rejected such a suggestion in the past, but he did ask "what recent events caused this consideration now" when, for 6 years, the industry had not followed up the idea. The fund executive was also disputed when he said that the presently drafted management fee proposal would "open the floodgates to litigation." The legislator responded that "during 21 years of legislative experience" he had heard this argument, but it had proved otherwise.

THE SILENT MAJORITY

In his testimony, Mr. Augenblick had emphasized that "the public is well satisfied with their mutual fund investments and there is no public dissatisfaction with costs." Chairman Budge, resuming his testimony in December, noted that Congress in the '40 Act had directed the SEC to make recommendations for legislation as industry growth created problems for the protection of investors. With the apparent dissipation of compromise, it was necessary to review full why the legislation was "vitally important to investment company shareholders, the one group who has not appeared before you because they depend upon the Commission to speak for them and the Congress to act for them." These mutual fund investors are a truly great silent majority. They represent the myriad number of mutual shareholders who have experienced the unprecedented almost uninterrupted rise in stock prices during the last two decades. But given a really prolonged decline in equity markets and a number of industry "happenings," they will become readily identifiable vocal number. If for no other reason, it would reflect more wisdom than has thus far been observed in these long-drawn out legislative proceedings on the part of the investment company industry were it to accept the reform bill as now drafted rather than, as Representative Moss has suggested, find itself subject to a more restrictive measure in the future.

The proposed compromise with the contractual plan sector of the industry is particularly apposite. The Commission initially was strongly in favor of The Front-End Load's abolition. Chairman Budge pointed out in his December testimony that, most importantly contractual investors pay commission substantially higher than do other fund investors. Even the statistics presented by the industry to indicate that the majority of such investors realize profits show that most do not complete their payments and pay actual commissions of 15 to 50 percent.

Testimony presented by the plan sponsors also shows the need for updated statistics in order that the Commission may review the background of its recommendations. Data presented in November was essentially the same as that used for three years before the Congress and for over twice as long with the SEC. Naturally the great majority of these investors showed a profit if they held their plans long enough since their programs were initiated in 1953. Commissioner Budge observed that "it is rather terrifying to consider the fate of the small investor paying a 50% load if we should ever encounter a real bear market again."

NORMAN DACEY'S TESTIMONY

But there did appear before the House subcommittee one witness for the great silent majority of contractual investors accompanied by a very live and unbiased set of statistics. If anyone can claim experience with the distribution of mutuals it is this veteran. Our first remembrance of him goes back to November 1936, for he was the fellow who topped the list of prize turkey winners when we, too, were trying to sell what were later to be known as mutual funds. That Norman Dacey is a controversial figure, there is no gainsaying, especially among the readers of this mgaazine, but to deny his expertise in the mutual fund area is not possible.

From the record of 350 contractual accounts on his company's books Mr. Dacey compiled a study showing the actual investment results from inception to liquidation. Dates of the accounts commence in 1952 and thereafter. Amount and number of monthly payments made plus the sum of income dividends and gains distributions reinvested were totaled equaling the cost of the plan for tax purposes. Subtracting the amount realized on liquidation gives the net loss figure for the account. Although slightly exaggerated, Mr. Dacey finds the average 5.9% return from dividends and gain distributions on all the accounts "not dissimilar to what the investors would have earned in a deposit account" and thus equates the account loss to the lack of "profit reward" which the investor experienced for having taken "the risk of equity investment." Excluded are plans terminated in three years or less. These are plans originated by First Investors Corp. invested in Wellington and Fundamental Investors.

Although conceding that perhaps contractual plans offered by other sponsors show happier results, Mr. Dacey avers that "everyone who bought these contractual plans lost money . . . We do have such accounts on our books which show a profit," he explained, "but they are accounts which have run from 15 to 20 years." He clinches his statistical presentation with the observation that "mutual funds are offered as an investment hedge against inflation and the years covered by his survey were the most inflationary in our history."

Mr. Dacey also had something to say about restricted stock "The respectable element in the mutual fund industry regards investment letter stock as an invitation to disaster. It cannot be valued," he told Mr. Moss' committee. "Its purchase by mutual funds should not be permitted." Mr. Dacey had brought suits against Mates Investments of Value Line Special Situations Fund and Enterprise Fund because of inadequate disclosures in their prospectuses on investment letter stock.

He noted in his Congressional testimony that the mutual is required to value its investments at the close of the NYSE each day but "if the restricted stocks in your portfolio cannot be sold, how do you determine their value?" He called attention to the "instant performance" of several funds during the last few years that had resulted from a hasty marking up of restricted stock purchased at bargain prices. Others tend to agree with Mr. Dacey. Oscar Lasdon, senior editor of The Bankers Magazine wrote in an editorial published last May in the Securities Regulation and Transfer Report that the SEC should outlaw further open-end purchases of letter stock. And in the questioning following his last prepared testimony, Commissioner Budge agreed with House Committee Chairman Moss that such shares should be excluded from Mutual portfolios. Inquiry has confirmed, however, that the Committee has no intention of dealing with this problem in the proposed reform bill.

OTHER TESTIMONY

David Silver, General Counsel of the ICI, explained during the recent program on mutual funds, presented in mid December by the Practising Law Institute of New York City, that the SEC did not prohibit the use of restricted stock by open-end investment companies (although suggesting a 10% portfolio limitation) because it thought the small investor should not be denied the opportunity such securities offered. Alan Gorden, senior vice president of Shareholders Management Co. which includes a closed-end company concentrating investments in restricted securities among the funds it supervises, noted the difficulty often experienced even by informed people in deciding whether stock was actually restricted.

The SEC will now require the identification of all restricted stock in fund prospectuses. As to the difficulties experienced by the Mates Investment Co. resulting from suspension in trading of Omega Securities which represented 16% of its asset value, this could have happened also had Mates held unrestricted Omega stock. However, Mr. Gordon failed to point out that other restricted shares accounted for another 21% of Mates' assets. Mr. Gordon suggested that the ICI, NASD and SEC get together and decide how restricted stock should be valued.

In another PLI panel concerned with management fees, Richard M. Phillips of the Washington law firm of Surrey, Karasik, Greene and Hill and former SEC assistant general counsel, questioned whether advisory fees had been reduced by 23% since 1946 because of competition. Rather he felt it had been due to the pressure generated by the many law suits, the Wharton School Study and the fear of impending legislation. Mr. Augenblick of the ICI had referred in his previous Congressional testimony to "the substantial decline in advisory fee rates and expense ratios" over the years and the "mounting competition in the mutual fund industry." He emphasized his industry's position thus: "We have never believed that this type of legislation in the management fee area was really necessary." We believe that in this testimony, alone, he negates any possibility of benefit to be derived from a self-disciplinary body that purportedly would regulate management fees. For is it not a reasonable assumption that the self-policing organization will be represented by ICI membership.

Chairman Budge devoted a substantial portion of his testimony to special comments on the ICI's statistical presentation concerning management costs borne by the mutual shareholder. Referring to the industry trade group's data as a "homogenized statistical universe," he went into specific cases to show that expense ratios were generally considerably higher than represented by the industry. As to the proposed self-policing unit, noting that its members "would gain nothing except immunity from judicial scrutiny of advisory fees," he stated:

"As the discussions our staff has had with the ICI have shown, it is doubtful that an objective standard could, in fact, be developed and applied fairly to such a diverse industry . . . The ICI recognizes that this may not work. They do not know just how they would propose to go about this self regulation . . . Another problem is the manner and extent to which unreasonable fees, in violation of the rules the Association may adopt, will be recoverable for the fund. Under the proposal the association could direct the repayment of unreasonable fees but the enforceability of such an order . . . is not clear. Further, the constitutionality of this approach is doubtful."

AT THE PLI SEMINAR

The proposal now in the draft bill that management "has a fiduciary duty to see that the management fee is reasonable" troubled Allan F. Conwill, former general counsel and Director, Division of Corporate Regulation of the SEC. No one knows what is meant by "reasonableness." Inclusion of this provision is going to result in a proliferation of suits. Further, if the Commission brings a suit, the court will feel that it has a special administrative expertise in this area that does not exist. But Richard M. Meyer of Pomerantz, Levy, Haudek and Block explained that the proposed bill was rather restrictive as to private rights of action. Defendants are limited to the actual recipients of the fee. Relative insulation of directors is not general in corporate law. In addition there is a one year statute of limitation. As to the relevant criteria in determining the reasonableness of the fee he listed ten factors: (1) Size of the funds and of the fee; (2) Expenses of the advisor; (3) Size of the advisor's staff; (4) Advisor's income from other funds; (5) Advisor's other income from the fund (e.g., brokerage); (6) Performance and risk assumption; (7) Fees of other advisors to investment companies, bank trust departments, etc. (Of particular importance may be the role of insurance companies and banks as they enter the mutual fund field; (8) Extent of any recapture of brokerage commissions; (9) Amount of consideration and analysis given by the directors; and (10) Effect of ratification and approval.

EIGHT NTS THESES CHOSEN FOR LIBRARY COLLECTIONS

The National Graduate Trust School chose eight of the 68 theses submitted by the Class of 1969 to be added to the library collections of The American Bankers Association and Northwestern University. Judgment is based on adequacy of research, readability, organization and the soundness of all conclusions as well as grammatical form.

The Class of 1969 is the third to complete the full three-year program at The National Graduate Trust School, held annually on the campus of Northwestern University by The American Bankers Association.

The list of bankers whose theses have been entered in the library collections follow:

Colin A. Browning, National Newark and Essex Bank, Newark, N.J.: "Why Pension Funds Should Buy Common Stock."

Benjamin S. Carroll, First National Bank, Birmingham, Ala.: "Federal Income Taxes and Trust Accounting For Timber."

Thomas L. Channell, Bank of California, Santa Ana: "Real Estate Investments In Trusts and Estates."

Joseph B. Crossan, III, Bank of Delaware, Wilmington, Del.: "Dividend Units: Their Treatment In Estates and Trusts."

RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

(Mr. TIERNAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. TIERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I am today placing in the RECORD the testimony which was submitted to the Committee for Improved Passenger Service at the meeting held in late February. We have held the record open for further statements from interested parties. To date, we still have no statement from the Penn Central Co.

Mr. Speaker, as is evidenced by the tremendous turnout at the February CIPS meeting, there is great need to revive rail passenger service in the New England region. I want to assure the Members of this body that this subject will not be allowed to die.

Within the near future, the CIPS membership will hold a followup meeting to discuss the different suggestions made at the February hearing. Out of this meeting will come a concrete proposal which a majority, if not all, of the New England congressional delegation can back. Before the year is out, we want the passenger trains back on the road to full, efficient and clean service.

The testimony follows:

TESTIMONY BEFORE COMMITTEE FOR IMPROVED PASSENGER SERVICE

Congressman TIERNAN. I am Congressman Tiernan and I want to welcome you here today. The difficulty we are facing is that we had a vote on the Floor and some of the members are still there. They will be joining us as soon as their responsibilities are relieved. We are pleased to have Senator Pell and Mr. Gibson with us. Governor Sargent will be joining us shortly. The purpose of this meeting today is to try to get ideas on what New England needs in the way of rail passenger service and hopefully to see if we can get some kind of legislation to come out of this meeting. I will serve as the moderator—allowing 3 minutes for each person to speak concerning the problem we are facing with regard to service on passenger trains, or ideas which you might have to help train service increase its efficiency. We will call on witnesses who have asked to testify. Please submit copies of your statements in full. The Committee intends to meet again in two to three weeks to come up with concrete suggestions that all in the New England area may get behind. As you know, legislation is now pending in the House where hearings were held this morning. Thank you for the responses which have been very good. I would appreciate all recommendations.

I would like to introduce Senator Pell.

Senator PELL. Congressman Tiernan deserves a vote of congratulations for working out the forum of this meeting.

Congressman TIERNAN. I want to thank Senator Pell because not only is he a colleague of mine, but he is one of the Members of Congress who has done such great work in this respect. I appreciate your comments. I would like to comment that we have Mr. Robert Nelson, the former Director of High Speed Ground Transportation in DOT, who is now at Brookings Institute, and serving here without compensation.

I would like to introduce Mr. Anthony Haswell.

Mr. HASWELL. I would like to give you my thoughts on several points discussed in the two New England Regional Commission reports, the first of November 1968 covering regional needs for all kinds of transportation, and the second of October 1969 dealing specifically with high speed rail service between New York and Boston.

The high speed report suggests that part of the construction cost of the new and improved track and right-of-way be raised through the sale of securities to the public. If for no other reasons than uncertainties regarding interest rates, ultimate construction cost, and projected ridership, I think that a sounder course would be to build the fixed facilities in their entirety as a public works project with private operators providing equipment and paying user charges.

Moreover, we must remember that the competing air and highway facilities have been financed in large part out of the public treasury. In the case of airports and the airways control system, only a small portion of these expenditures have been recovered by user charges. It seems questionable that private capital will rush in to build a new railroad in that kind of environment, no matter how favorable the projections are. We need look no further than the present situation of rail freight service. While the railroads continue to be willing and able to finance the purchase of new freight cars, they simply will not make the required investment to adequately maintain and improve track and roadbed. The result is that while freight cars and trains are getting longer, heavier, and faster, the track is steadily deteriorating and train derailments are skyrocketing. The conclusion is compelling that construction and maintenance of roadway and track must be a government function, while the financing of rolling stock and operation of trains can be left to private enterprise.

If the above conclusion is accepted, the next question is where the money is going to come from. Outside of the possibility of getting some grade crossing elimination funds, existing federal programs will not provide it. I suggest that either the mass transit program be broadened or a new "corridor" program be enacted to provide federal money on a ⅓-⅔ matching basis to states and/or regional agencies for this type of project. I would not hesitate to push for a general appropriation; this project is at least as important to New England as are waterway improvements to the midwest and multi-purpose dams to the far west.

The question is raised by United Aircraft whether or not the large investment required for this project will be prematurely rendered obsolete by the development of new technology such as tracked air cushion vehicles. I do not think so. The new right of way between New Haven and Providence might well be converted from a railroad to a tracked air cushion guideway—perhaps at the time the Stamford-New Haven bypass is built. Even if conversion is not feasible, I believe that by 1985 a new line would be useful for freight service only, and the improvements between New Haven and New York would continue to benefit both commuters and freight shippers. I think the present emphasis on routing freight via the Selkirk, New York gateway is only temporary, and that before too long a combined freight and transit tunnel will be built between Brooklyn and Staten Island, making the Shore Line once again the main freight artery to and from New England.

I am more optimistic than is the report on possibilities for revival of intercity rail passenger service in northern New England. When the Boston-New York service gets going, I think there will be an irresistible demand for good connecting service to and from the major cities of New Hampshire and Maine. Consideration should be given to building a tunnel between North and South Stations in Boston, a project that would benefit Boston area commuters and freight shippers as well as thru intercity passengers.

Congressman TIERNAN. Where is the money coming from? Are you suggesting that Mass Transportation or new carrier programs provide Federal money?

Mr. HASWELL. I would not start to push for a general approach. This project is as important to New England as to the midwest. The right of way between New Haven and Providence is most important and then new railroad lines might be connected.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you Mr. Haswell. I would like to introduce Reginald Whitman who is representing Secretary Volpe.

Mr. WHITMAN. I am representing Secretary Volpe and I am the Federal Railroad Administrator. I do not have a prepared statement. Passenger problems involve all of us. Something's got to be done and we have been very busy in this past year trying to do something about it. I came here today with members of my staff in the hope that we could take notes and garnish some ideas to be used in our long range programs.

Congressman TIERNAN. If I may interrupt you Mr. Whitman, for the gentlemen in the audience who might be interested, we will make a compilation of the testimony here today and make that available to anyone who is interested. We will also keep the record open for anyone who wants to submit to the Committee a prepared paper. We will keep the record open for two weeks after this hearing.

Mr. WHITMAN. I would say that I made a few notes as I was sitting here and one of the greatest opportunities of our governmental body is, I believe, the transportation field. I think it is a big one. Transportation is not an end in itself but it is a service, because most of our citizens use public transportation or transportation of some sort—it has a bearing on practically all urban and interurban problems.

I think that through the years probably we have had quite an imbalance, as Mr. Haswell pointed out, in that the railroads have not had the advantage of Federal assistance to the same extent as the other modes and they have thereby suffered. I think we are probably reaping this harvest today, and so to the extent that you gentlemen can bring to bear upon this, I think this is a point well taken and you certainly have my support.

Congressman TIERNAN. I appreciate your coming to the full committee today. I understand that you have other commitments with members of your staff. Senator Pell do you have any questions? Go right ahead, Senator, before I introduce you, I would like to acknowledge Senator Kennedy's presence. Senator Pell—

Senator PELL. Mr. Whitman, I believe from our own conversations and the wonderful hospitality that Secretary Volpe has given us that you have been very interested in the whole project. Nevertheless, there are two questions that really bother me. One, why do you not support the concept of $8.64 million more for prudence on the New England section of the New York passenger—New York—Penn Central Railroad? As you know, in hearings at the Appropriations Committee, Senator Stennis indicated he would consider this during the hearings on supplemental budget requests. The Transportation Department has indicated that they do not support this idea. Why is that?

Mr. WHITMAN. Well, I think that others in the Transportation Department really should answer this, but for my part——

Senator PELL. You're the railroad representative this directly concerns.

Mr. WHITMAN. I will try to answer the way I see it. This is a part of a very large problem and we have been focusing our efforts on the national aspects of it primarily, rather than the regional aspects. And that while we are advocating some type of railroad legislation, it has not been passed on as yet. This legislation, if it does come to pass, will be of a national nature rather than of a regional nature. For this reason, I think the feeling was that we should wait until we get the national picture a little more in focus, which may result in some regional priorities.

Senator PELL. But for eight years, I've been hearing let's wait until we do another study before we go further. It's been studied right down the line. It's been studied inside and outside and we can't do better than the Doyle Report of the late '50's. I still cannot get it through my head that if we can spend $8 million to upgrade the New Haven tracks, cut off 15 minutes up to 30 minutes before we're through on the time from New York to Providence to Boston, and the Congress is willing to appropriate these funds, why are you so reluctant?

Mr. WHITMAN. I agree with you. It has been studied to death and I think it is time to bring it into focus.

Senator PELL. One other question. I don't want to hog the time here. Through the years, and it was my bill originally that created it, I watched the Office of High Speed Ground Transportation under Bob Nelson's excellent leadership. Now it seems to me it is almost being dissolved and you no longer have the systems approach on this. What is the present status and what are your plans for the Office of High Speed Ground Transportation which concerns us and all of the New England corridor?

Mr. WHITMAN. Well, I don't agree that the Office of High Speed Ground Transportation is being deleted at this time. As you say, we have made many many studies, probably way too many. Now is the time to actually bring these into focus and actually do something about it. And while it may take a little different direction than studies, I would hope that in another year that you will be more complimentary than I know your feeling is today.

Senator PELL. I have no objection to what you're saying but I thought both these problems should be brought forth. Thank you.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you very much Mr. Whitman. I would like to call on Governor Sargent for any remarks that he might want to make.

Governor SARGENT. Thank you very much Mr. Chairman. Do you want me to sit here or at the table?

Congressman TIERNAN. I think that would be fine Governor.

Governor SARGENT. It's very comfortable. I see that the Senator's enjoying it. Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of the committee, I am very pleased and honored today to be with you. Earlier this month, I announced a decision to reverse Massachusetts' transportation policy, particularly with respect to the metropolitan area of Boston. A special Task Force—which I had appointed to reexamine the transportation programs of my state—concluded that insufficient attention had been given the development of balanced metropolitan transportation systems. Highway construction had dominated our transportation thinking; yet roads clogged by rush-hour traffic had demonstrated that highways alone were not the solution.

Consequently, I decided to develop an integrated and balanced transportation system for the metropolitan Boston region. At the same time, I am seeking changes in Federal transportation policies which are necessary if Massachusetts is to build such a system.

This situation, which Massachusetts faces on the metropolitan level, has similarities with the problems confronting medium-range intercity transportation. The highways are reaching their limits in terms of speed; and new ones are quickly filled in terms of numbers. The airways, too, are overcrowded and cannot continue to absorb all the slack. At the same time, Federal transportation funding policies preclude the growth of the one mode of transportation that can solve the medium-range intercity problem—high speed rail service.

We currently have two demonstration projects operating in the Northeast megapolitan corridor. The "Metroliner" between New York and Washington has proved successful, disappointing to many of us but successful in certain respects. The "Turbotrain" between Boston and New York has been confronted with substantial operating difficulties. However, the "Metroliner" has demonstrated the practicality of high-speed rail service.

Still, more steps must be taken if high-speed rail service is to become an everyday reality—not only between Boston and Washington, but also, for example, between Boston, Worcester, Springfield and Albany. Federal financial support must be forthcoming—in one form or another—so that rail service no longer is forced to operate at such a severe competitive disadvantage with respect to the airplane and the automobile.

The formation of the "Committee for Improved Passenger Service" is, I believe, an important step towards this goal. The Governors of New England have developed a working relationship to coordinate our efforts to maintain and improve rail transportation in the region. Perhaps, what we are seeking today is an emergency of a coalition of those in Congress, those executives in the state houses, and I see Governor Licht of Rhode Island here, and interested citizens that will be an important force in improving New England's rail transportation. I am pleased also to be submitting to you, Mr. Congressman, a statement from Walter Peterson, Governor of New Hampshire, with relation to this matter.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you very much Governor. At this time, I would like to call on the Governor of my state, Frank Licht.

Governor LICHT. Mr. Chairman and members of this distinguished Committee, I want to take this opportunity as Governor of Rhode Island to thank you for this opportunity to appear to discuss with you a matter of vital importance not only to my state, but to the whole of Southern New England. I think you are all familiar with the problems with which we are confronted and the progress we've made to preserve rail passenger service. Basically, we have employed two methods. One has been the partial tax relief which began in the early 1960's and with some modification has continued up until the present time. New York, Connecticut and Massachusetts have also provided various measures of tax relief.

In 1963, because of the cash attrition taking place in its finances, the New Haven required further assistance, and a second method of aid was inaugurated. This involved cash subsidy payments in the aggregate amount of $6,000,000 annually to keep the railroad in operation. In 1969, the payments were reduced, due in part to the fact that the Penn Central had taken over the New Haven operation.

All throughout the decade, however, both the New Haven and the Penn Central lost substantial sums of money in providing rail passenger service, and the threat of discontinuance has been ever present. And all during that period of time, the service has deteriorated, the equipment has deteriorated, passenger service has been faulty and unacceptable and we have been plagued with the problem not only with difficult passenger service but as well, freight service.

The vast majority of passengers on the thru-trains between Boston and New York travel in interstate commerce, and thus under both the supervision and the regulation of a Federal Agency. It is therefore difficult to understand why the railroad was forced, even in the first instance, to turn to the states through which it operated to obtain financial assistance necessary to keep it in operation.

The Federal government, through its various agencies, has long been aware of the dire financial circumstances of the carrier. In fact, the states, through their representatives, have made repeated pleas for the Federal government to assume a portion of the financial burden required to continue this rail carrier operation, but without success. On each occasion we at the state level have been reminded that there was no Federal statute under which cash funds could be provided for continuing this interstate carrier. Thus, this has evolved as a unique example of using state tax monies to keep in operation an interstate service, which is under the regulation of the Federal government.

Moreover, the payment of cash subsidies is providing to be an ever increasing burden on the tax resources of the concerned states, especially in light of the fact that the railroad has not really demonstrated a truly comprehensive effort to improve its passenger service. In short, the subsidy we have provided has resulted in neither greatly improved service nor in substantially improved facilities.

While passenger service is of critical importance, I would hope that you would include in your deliberations the question of the adequacy of freight service as well. Within the past week, some fifteen of Rhode Island's major industries met to discuss the present situation with regard to the railroad and to begin work on the establishment of what they believe should be guidelines concerning the expected performance of the railroad's freight service. They are most concerned with the availability of cars, the quality of the cars they receive, and the communication they have with the railroad company. As a matter of fact, I might tell this Committee that they do not even know where the cars are supposed to be delivering freight in this section of the country. At present, they are dissatisfied with service in each of these areas, and they believe considerable improvement is an absolute necessity.

I firmly believe that any approach toward the solution of the problems we now face in passenger service must be comprehensive. It must include careful examination of freight service. The other and equally important half of this entire railroad question.

As long ago as 1898, Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the United States Supreme Court in the famous case of Smyth v. Ames (169 U.S. 466, 544) said: "A railroad is a public highway, and none the less so because constructed and maintained through the agency of a corporation deriving its existence and powers from the state. Such a corporation was created for public purposes. It performs a function of the State. Its authority to exercise the right of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public."

And, if rail service were discontinued in Southern New England, the effect would be devastating. It would have a grave impact upon the public and the private sector. Our economy would most certainly suffer. As a matter of fact, talk of the break-down itself brought the New England Governors together and we took an inventory of what the situation would be if rail service was shut down. I am talking now not only of passenger service but also of freight service, and we have information that makes it very plain, not only to my state but all of the New England area, and I suggest that the whole nation will turn out to be a disaster in a short time.

If rail service were withdrawn, we would face higher transportation costs, which would presumably raise the prices of consumer goods. Abandonment of rail lines would severely inhibit the future growth of our economy, for any new industry relying on rail transportation for raw materials or component parts could not consider a Southern New England location. Many of our citizens depend upon the passenger service provided by the railroad, and many more are dependent for their jobs on the continued freight service of the railroad.

Increasingly, there is awareness at the national level that the Federal government has a responsibility in preserving rail service. That awareness, however, must take its place in action. Our need for intercity rail passenger and freight service will continue, but the many demands upon our state tax dollars mean that our ability to continue financial assistance is seriously in question.

Without Federal involvement, it is doubtful that either passenger or freight rail transportation can long be maintained in Southern New England. It is therefore, Mr. Chairman and Members of this Committee, my sincere hope that this session of Congress will not adjourn without coming to grips with this most important and most serious problem.

Congressman TIERNAN. On behalf of the Committee, Governor, I want to thank you for your testimony and for the help you have given this Committee. We appreciate you taking the time to come before us.

Governor LICHT. Thank you very much. I'm glad that you gave me this opportunity.

Congressman TIERNAN. At this time, I would like to call on my colleague, Congressman Harold Donohue, from Massachusetts, who will introduce the next witness to testify before this Committee.

Congressman DONOHUE. Thank you very much Mr. Chairman. Senator Kennedy, Governor Sargent, my colleagues in the House, my purpose in being here today is, of course, to support the position that each and everyone of you has taken with regard to the railroad situation. I'm sorry I overlooked you Senator Pell. I just want to say that it is a real pleasure and privilege for me to introduce three very distinguished gentlemen from my home state of Massachusetts: Mr. John Floyd, Chairman of the Worcester City Passenger Study Commission and Manager of the Transportation Department, Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Roy B. Hakenson, Massachusetts Legislative State Representative of United Transportation; and Mr. Lincoln Harrison, a member of the Worcester Rail Commission and Secretary of the Railroad Locomotive and Historical Society, Library of the Harvard Business School in Boston. Now these three gentlemen, Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, have been long and deeply concerned with the problem of rail transportation in our region and throughout the country. They could really be called pioneers in recognizing the problem and in directing public and government attention to the necessity of helping provide High-Speed rail passenger service to the people of our state and nation. I am certain that these three gentlemen will provide you, the members hearing this matter today, with very interesting and instructive information about this problem. May I first present to you for his testimony, Mr. John Floyd.

Mr. FLOYD. My name is John T. Floyd. I am Chairman of a Commission created by the City of Worcester to try to solve the problem of disappearing rail passenger service in our area. Participants in this Commission are the municipalities of Springfield, Westboro, Framingham and Newton. also the Joint Civic Agencies of Greater Springfield, as well as the Worcester Area Chamber of Commerce.

First, a brief tribute to Senator Pell, the father of the High-Speed Ground Transportation Program in the megalopolis corridor.

While the Metroliner continues to offer greater relief to airport and highway congestion in the New York-Washington segment of the Northeast Corridor, track conditions have prevented comparable progress in the Boston-New York end of the corridor, notwithstanding the recorded speed capability of the Turbo Train on the test in New Jersey (174.4 miles per hour). The High-Speed Program in New England needs help. The Boston-New York air route is the heaviest traveled in the world. Logan Airport will reach saturation by 1975 and no site has been selected so far for a reliever airport. Worse still, 35 percent of Logan boardings are destined for New York and flights are held frequently at Logan until the time slot is open at New York. Worcester is affected by the time slot problem at New York, and our flights are limited. Highway congestion and air pollution mounts. We propose a three step program. First—upgrading of the Shore Line to permit the Turbo Train to fulfill its purpose on that route. Second—recognition that the inland route between Boston and New York via Worcester-Springfield and Hartford, is only three miles longer than the Shore Line and almost a million more people. We therefore recommend, immediately following the Shore Line improvement, that the inland route be upgraded and comparable service instituted. Third—investigation of the economic feasibility of extending service up the Connecticut Valley from Springfield and from Worcester through Lowell, Lawrence, and Haverhill to Portland. The third phase to be developed after the improved service on the Shore Line and Springfield Line has demonstrated its ability to attract the business on a profitable basis.

We stress that the inland route via Worcester, Springfield and Hartford is at the center of population of New England and would also benefit southern Vermont and southern New Hampshire through fast highway connections. The inland route, or so-called Springfield Line, never had comparable service to the Shore Line and because the NY, NH & H as an independent railroad was only interested in total Boston-New York earnings via its Shore Line, and was not inclined to split the revenue with the Boston & Albany at Springfield. Now all southern New England is one railroad, Penn Central.

Senator Pell has recorded in the Congressional Record that he feels that a non-profit Transportation Planning and Operating Organization such as Geo-Transport, Inc., may be the solution to the problem in New England. Geo-Transport recognizes the need for the Inland route too, and proposes a loop concept between New Haven and Boston. Metroliners can and do operate through east to New Haven on occasion. We urge Federal support of Geo-Transport in setting up a comsat type consortium of public and private financing.

We emphasize that while there is only one string of cities between New York and Washington, there are two strings between Boston and New York. Intermediate cities need service. The Providence-New York travel market is one-tenth that of the Boston-New York market, but Providence boards 50 percent of the Boston travel on the Turbo Train.

In other words, because the Providence-New York elapsed time on the Turbo Train is more competitive with air than the Boston-New York time, Providence patronage is relatively greater. The same situation would exist at intermediate points of Worcester, Springfield, and Hartford, particularly the latter two cities with Bradley Field remote from both, compared to the distance from downtown Providence to Green Airport.

We in Massachusetts hope this year will see the enactment of Massachusetts House Bill #4349 to create a Boston-Worcester-Springfield Transportation Authority, which can work with the Connecticut Transportation Authority and the Federal government or other agencies to solve the problem in New England. Thank you.

Congressman TIERNAN. I want to thank you for your testimony and I think you will receive the award for being the fastest reader of the day. Your thoughts were well put. I would mention at this time, Mr. William Miller, President of GEO Transportation, sent his regrets. However, he will participate in the future with regard to our objectives.

I acknowledge Mr. Roy Hakenson.

Mr. HAKENSON. The New England end of the High Speed Ground Experimental Program needs help badly. True the Turbo Train is popular in that it has about 80 percent occupancy on its daily Boston-New York round trip.

Please remember that a key objective of the High Speed Ground Transportation Program is to relieve the major airports of short haul travel in the Boston-Washington megalapolis corridor. The Metroliner between New York and Washington operates six round trips a day and is offering some real measurable relief to air travel congestion between these two cities. Yet the New York-Washington air travel market (about 2800 per day) is smaller than the Boston-New York air travel market (3200 per day). Logan needs relief.

If the Turbo Train operated more frequently between Boston and New York and operated via both the Shore Line and the Springfield Line between Boston and New New Haven, connecting with Metroliner service at New Haven, in some instances, at New York in others, more passengers would be attracted from the airlines. Certainly the airline load would be diminished at Logan if passengers could board a Turbo Train for New York at Worcester. Over half the air travelers from Worcester for New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington journey to Logan.

As has been so clearly portrayed in Senator Pell's classic "Megalapolis Unbound", development of High Speed rail transportation in the Boston-New York-Washington corridor is a far less costly way to handle the traffic than building additional 10,000 foot runways and new airports.

Will truly High Speed rail service relieve the airports? The Japanese High Speed rail line, 325 miles between Tokyo and Osaka, took over a third of the airline business within a few years after opening. Business on this line continues to grow and the investment will be amortised.

The same situation occurred in England with the introduction of High Speed rail service between London and Liverpool, which is in the same mileage bracket as Providence-New York or Worcester-New York. One third of the airline passengers went to the rail. Not only were fast schedules introduced, but frequent service.

The situation in Massachusetts is now at a critical point as regards preservation of railroad rights-of-way. Because of a small state subsidy in Massachusetts, Penn-Central management has in the making a petition to the ICC to abandon all North-South service from Massachusetts to the Shore Line, with the exception of the Boston-Providence route. Specifically, I refer to Pittsfield-South Norwalk, Springfield-Hartford, and Worcester-New London. In fact, the Penn-Central management has stated that they may have to even seek authority to abandon the little remaining Boston-Worcester local passenger service. Herein lies the demonstration of the likelihood of loss of double track rights-of way needed for both thru service and commuter. The Massachusetts Turnpike Authority owns the right-of-way between Boston and Riverside. If Penn-Central were to abandon passenger service on this line, freight demands could be accommodated with a single track. Abandonment of one track would cause the unused portion of the right-of-way to revert to the Turnpike Authority, closing the door on future use of either thru service or commuter service.

May we point out that another witness for our commission has cited the possibility of eventual link-up of the Boston-New York inland route to the Merrimac Valley and Portland.

Already, through the foresight of Senator Cotton of New Hampshire, as reported in the press, the $10 billion mass transit bill has a rider permitting the State of New Hampshire to negotiate an agreement with the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority for extension of its service to Nashua, Manchester and Concord. This would tie into a Worcester-Portland extension of the inland route at Lowell and bring New Hampshire into the picture, not only at Dover but also at these Merrimac Valley cities.

At the New York end, Connecticut and New York have received authority from Congress to negotiate a take-over and lease-back of the railroad between New Haven and New York to improve passenger service on this four track division. The fastest commutation service in the country is the Penn-Central mail line between New York and Trenton. In either case, the commutation tracks are different from the thru service and commuter.

State and Federal governments are now already involved in the rail passenger problem. The railroad will not risk their freight obtained revenues to gamble on passenger services when interstate highways and airways exist to a large degree on Federal funding. It is time to correct the imbalance and solve the problems of highway and airway congestion, noise and pollution to a degree. High Speed rail will do this.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you very much. Before going on to the other gentleman, I would like to at this time acknowledge Speaker John McCormack and would like to mention also that this committee is a dues paying committee which is a strange thing in the Congress. We had all members pay a slight dues of $10 for Improved Passenger Service. The Speaker has paid his dues in full. Mr. Speaker would you like to say a few words?

Speaker MCCORMACK. Thank you, Congressman Tiernan and my distinguished colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, I have always felt that the less I talk, the more I will hear.

Mr. HARRISON. My name is H. Lincoln Harrison, formerly assistant to the Professor of Transportation, Department of Economics, University of New Hampshire, and at present Secretary of the Railway and Locomotive Historical Society Bake Library, Harvard Business School in Boston, Massachusetts. I have made one, two or three studies of transportation in each of the continents of the world except Australia. I am a member of the Worcester Rail Study Commission.

In 1957, I rode the "Mistrial," which is the French breakthrough train whose technology has been utilized all across Europe, and realized we had nothing in this country to compare it to. Three years past, I rode the Tokida Line from Tokyo to Osaka, over 325 miles in a little over three hours which took the title of the world's fastest train away from the "Mistrial," and knew we could not equal it in this country unless there was a radical change in the thinking in governmental circles of the United States.

Much public money has gone into airports and their related facilities which we may well be proud of. However, we have made it so attractive as to cause overcrowding in Metropolitan areas so that secondary landing areas are being considered 25 or more miles from destination and a 250 mile run could be a three vehicle trip—this is not good transportation.

More public money has gone into highways, starting with the promise of helping the farmer or isolated business to get their products to market, through a period of intercity building, to the present concept of national road network which has now built roads parallel, and within five miles, destination to destination, of most trunk railroads in New England. Road building continues at present along secondary rail routes. These roads are of help to our excellent bus industry and have an impact on the private car driver who may be tempted to commute longer distance to the city in his auto, adding to our major cause of air pollution and the congestion and parking problem of the inner city. Roads tend to build traffic to the fearable level of congestion at which point the ecological stress factor comes into play with possible cardiac or adrenal changes.

A public official finds it difficult to refuse a road he does not need or want if only 10% of the cost is to be borne locally and he sees it as a way to get back some of the money taken from his area. Hence most of the roads that are suggested get built even with the knowledge that the price of oils in New England are set above the world market price by national government policy.

Public money early went into the building of railroads followed by a long period when they were thought of only as a source of tax revenue on plant and structure they bought and built themselves. In one town where the railroad is the largest taxpayer, it follows that it pays the biggest amount of the support of the local airport. It is long past the time of tax revenue thinking. Railroads are a part of our transportation complex, and the National mobility potential, some of which they do better than anyone else, let us think of them in that context.

We need not be ashamed of our air industry or our highways but we do have the poorest rail travel facilities of any advanced nation I have been in around the world. We got to this position partly by the good things we have accomplished. When air service is improved, it will attract some highway and some rail users. A new highway presents new equations of choice to the private car owner (and we have the largest number of private cars in the world) some of whom will leave the air and rail routes. At this point, there should be a rail service improvement to maintain a balanced transport pattern (and except in this country there has been). No plan to eliminate one form of transport could be more effective than to continue to improve the alternative carriers over a quarter of a century. Fewer passengers produce lower revenue which leads to cancelled runs or connections, at which point the passenger must change his mode of travel. In January, my son was invited by Mayor Daley in Chicago to the opening of the new Logan Square rapid transit line. He went out on Penn-Central, and was to return to New York on the Lake Cities of the Erie. The train was dropped early in January, and he had to come back on the C&O B&O George Washington via Washington to New York.

At Mardi Gras he went to Cincinnati on Penn-Central and to New Orleans on L&N. He planned to return on the Crescent via Montgomery which no longer runs and used the Southern via Birmingham. Last week he tried to buy a ticket to New York from Tarpon Springs, Florida, the agent would only sell him a ticket to Jacksonville as the company wants the train off and does not wish to show a demand for thru New York traffic.

Are we ready to face the population explosion with an air and highway system alone? Probably the answer is "no". Ecology which we never worried about ten years ago will force and influence more and more of our decisions in the coming years, as will air pollution.

Among other things, railroads can (and do in other countries) handle commuter and intercity runs of up to 300 miles better than any other form of transport available, and the cost of upgrading to present standards of a dozen other countries will be only a fraction of what we have already spent on air and highway improvement. A basic pattern should include: Portland, Maine; Concord, New Hampshire; Boston, Worcester, Springfield, Massachusetts with Connecticut and New York.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you very much. I think Congressman Macdonald would like to ask a question.

Congressman MACDONALD. One of you indicated that a new Mass Transit Department would be formed.

Mr. FLOYD. We hope there will be one.

Congressman MACDONALD. What I wanted to inquire was how far had these plans been put into effect. I have been a member of the Authorization Committee that deals with railroad legislation for three years now. I served on the Sub-committee on Transportation and have heard nothing from the State of Massachusetts dealing with the great problem of commuter transportation. It would be helpful if they did have such a Department. In short, can you tell me how far away this is to becoming a reality.

Mr. HARRISON. Massachusetts House Law 4349 relates to this.

Congressman MACDONALD. Has the bill been filed? We are aware of the problems of transportation in the Western part of the state. Is your interest in these problems in Boston, Wellesley, Lowell, etc.? Which part of the state is covered by this? Don't you think it would be a pretty good idea to have something of this sort covered the entire state since it is a state problem? I think perhaps we in Congress should pay more attention to the problem by way of legislation as a state. I am not quite sure they live up to their objectives. I would suggest that you include all of Massachusetts.

Congressman TIERNAN. Acknowledged Mrs. Heckler.

Mrs. HECKLER. It is my understanding, and I stand to be corrected if I'm wrong, Governor Sargent has established a comprehensive task study commission.

Congressman MACDONALD. We have more commissions in study than passenger service.

Mrs. HECKLER. I must say that I agree with your frustrations over studies.

Congressman MACDONALD. I would rather have less commissions and more action.

Congressman TIERNAN. I want to remind all who have not signed the guest book, to please do so and indicate your address. We will try to keep you informed of testimony before the Committee. Anyone who has testified, please leave a copy of your statement so we can check it against the transcript.

Congressman TIERNAN. I would like to call on Mr. Burke to introduce some gentlemen who are here from the State of Massachusetts.

Congressman BURKE. We have James Loughlin of the Massachusetts State Labor Council, AFL–CIO and Executive Member of the New England Council, and Mr. Richard Fleming of the Massachusetts Port of Authority.

Mr. LOUGHLIN. I believe that the rail transportation in Massachusetts and New England should have a complete overhauling and face lifting. The rail passenger service needs an entire new type of service with modern, up-to-date trains and passenger cars. I believe that this is long overdue and that with the help of your committee we can get this through Congress with the necessary money appropriated and we will be able to have a good rail service. Thank you very much.

Congressman TIERNAN. Would you care to comment with regard to the compact?

Mr. LOUGHLIN. I have been associated with all of these since 1961. Mr. Kanell is the one who should answer these questions.

Congressman TIERNAN. How much are the states of Connecticut and New York receiving under contract?

Mr. LOUGHLIN. The Federal government is subsidizing $28 million.

Congressman TIERNAN. The state of Connecticut and New York will match it as I understand it.

Mr. LOUGHLIN. Yes.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you Mr. Loughlin.

I will now call on Mr. Goodfellow, President of the Association of American Railroads, with regard to their position.

Mr. GOODFELLOW. I appreciate the opportunity to be here. I will offer a statement if that is satisfactory to you. (The following is Mr. Goodfellow's statement.)

Since the end of World War II the use of intercity passenger trains has constantly and drastically declined. The intercity traveler has unmistakably demonstrated his preference for other modes of transportation which have enjoyed vigorous promotion through large expenditures of public funds. As businessmen, we've certainly taken a hard look at the future of intercity passenger trains in today's jet and automobile age. Reluctantly, we've had to conclude that the only likely future for such train service lies in the heavily populated corridors—between Washington, New York and Boston, for example.

While in the years following World War II the railroad industry made tremendous expenditures for new equipment and various promotional activities, it was unable to reverse this trend. Between 1946 and 1958, the Class I railroads of the United States and the Pullman Company invested $1,343,000,000 in passenger train equipment. They gave the American public the world's finest passenger trains. And they spent many millions of dollars promoting and advertising them. But during those same years, the railroads' share of the for-hire intercity passenger traffic dropped from 72.9 percent to 31.1 percent while the airlines' share increased from 2.7 percent to 38 percent. Even more significantly, the private automobile's share of the total intercity passenger traffic increased from 58.8 percent to 90.1 percent—and its stayed at about that level to this day.

This loss of business—I repeat—happened during a period when the railroads were pouring large sums of money into their passenger operations in an effort to hold their own against airline and automobile competition. The American railroads gambled heavily on the traveling public—and lost.

Congress recognized the serious nature of this problem and in the Transportation Act of 1958 established a procedure by which the railroad industry was enabled to discontinue many unnecessary passenger trains that were operating at substantial losses. Despite this Act, the railroad industry is being required today to operate many passenger trains which fail to earn their cost of operation. A recent study by the Interstate Commerce Commission revealed that the railroads incurred an avoidable loss of well over two hundred million dollars on intercity railroad passenger train operations in 1968.

No part of the private sector of our national economy should be made to bear the burden of enforced public service without just and adequate compensation for such service. When a public service is required to be performed by private enterprise and the users of such service do not pay the cost thereof, then the public nature of such service demands public payment therefor.

As applied to a particular railroad passenger train service, this principle means that when performance of such service is enforced by the public upon a railroad and the service does not pay its own way, then responsibility for the cost thereof should rest upon the body public.

If the railroad industry is to continue to provide intercity passenger train service, it is essential that legislation be enacted establishing means by which the industry may be relieved of the large losses which it sustains in providing this public service.

Two pending bills, S. 2750 and H.R. 14661, afford the most reasonable way to preserve passenger train service required by public convenience and necessity. Enactment of either would insure the preservation of passenger operations considered necessary while solutions to the over-all problem of moving people—involving all modes—are being worked out and the proper role of rail service determined.

At hearings before the House Committee on H.R. 14661 the Association of American Railroads was asked to submit its idea of a package bill. We subsequently did so, in the nature of suggested amendments to H.R. 14661 and a copy of such draft bill is attached. The bill, as drafted, contains the following provisions:

1. The payment of operating losses on any train ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be continued in operation.

2. Equipment required to perform the ordered service would, if not then owned by the carrier and reasonably available for such use, be furnished by the Secretary of Transportation.

3. The Commission would be authorized to prescribe standards of service on those trains which it ordered to be continued in operation.

4. Reasonable limitations, short of a moratorium, would be placed on the filing with the Commission of notices to discontinue trains.

We suggest that the CIPS support S. 2750 and H.R. 14661, or in the alternative, support the draft legislation described above and attached to this statement.

Congressman MACDONALD. I remember your testimony before the Committee about control being taken away from states.

Mr. GOODFELLOW. I do not know if I testified to take control away from states, but to have the Federal government step in.

Congressman MACDONALD. When you say the Federal government should step in to take control, what do you mean?

Mr. GOODFELLOW. The Federal government should take the loss.

Congressman TIERNAN. Do you have any other suggestions?

Mr. GOODFELLOW. If equipment is desired, then the Secretary of Transportation should take over. This is in a bill in Congress.

Congressman MACDONALD. We have heard often that many of the railroad lines deliberately cut off service not only on a certain line but at inconvenient times, they turn off air conditioning in summer and heat in winter. Have they never held anyone in a responsible position to account for this?

Mr. GOODFELLOW. I cannot speak for other railroad executives in this country but as for me, I have never in 13 years told anyone to do anything like that. A man may mistakenly turn off the air conditioning or the heat.

Congressman MACDONALD. Does your company's overall plan include stopping passenger service?

Mr. GOODFELLOW. We can no longer stand this loss from passenger service. The ICC has come up with costs that pretty well settle this squabble.

Congressman CONTE. On figuring those losses they want to be subsidized by the Federal government, would you take into consideration the bids and the use of freight trains?

Mr. GOODFELLOW. Most of the discussion on losses has been available. I will have to explain it to you if you want to hear it. A freight train runs 50 miles an hour and short amount of maintenance will keep it in service. If you want to run a faster train, you are going to have to put more money into it.

Congressman TIERNAN. Introduced Congressman KYROS.

Congressman KYROS. Thank you Mr. Chairman. I want to congratulate you and Mr. Burke for setting up this meeting. I am also delighted that the Speaker is here. I suggest we come out with some kind of prompt decision. We ought to consider all methods of financing.

(Mr. Kyros subsequently submitted the following letter from one of his constituents.)

OLD ORCHARD BEACH, MAINE,
February 27, 1970.

Representative PETER KYROS.

DEAR SIR: Just listened to an interview on Channel 6 concerning railroads. I agree with you 100%. I have to go to Boston every month and do not like bus or air travel. It used to be nice to ride the train but those days are gone but I believe can be revived. Nothing is lost by trying.

SAMUEL R. HENDERSON.

Congressman TIERNAN. Did you have someone from Maine you would like to introduce?

Congressman KYROS. Yes, Mr. William Fernald, Director of the Transportation Division, Maine Public Utilities Commission.

Congressman TIERNAN. Nice to have you with us.

Mr. FERNALD. Rather than repeat what Mr. Kyros said, I will say that the State of Maine is working closely with the Federal government on this. I am not in a position to make a public recommendation. Conditions change rapidly and the need for service is imperative. Thank you for listening to my views.

Congressman TIERNAN. A reminder again that the record will be open for two weeks and you may submit a statement. At this time, I would like to introduce Professor Poulsen of the University of Rhode Island. He is also the Director of the Research Center for Business Economics and is a Professor of Finance He has done quite a bit of work recently on a paper contrasting the financing of airports and airlines versus the support of transportation in the area of railroads. Professor Poulsen.

Professor POULSEN. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I had just finished a paper on the problem of hauling hogs by rail when I received your request to present a paper on hauling people by rail, so I will try to keep these two categories separate as I make my statement.

Congressman TIERNAN. You mean sometimes they are not kept separate?

Professor POULSEN. The New Haven, which I would like to refer to first, has lost money on freight service. Last year it lost $10 million on its freight service and $12 million on its passenger service. This was in 1968 for a total loss of almost $25 million. I used to send my students down to deck the New Haven's locomotives with flowers since the railroad was already dead before it was discontinued and became part of the Penn Central. Apparently, the New Haven has come back and has given more liveliness to the Penn Central. But, the 1969 financial report is a very unhappy one.

The ultimate conclusion I would like to present is to include the rail right-of-way as part of the Interstate Highway System. I think this would give Mr. Volpe and the road gang a very good opportunity to look at a chapter in their engineering books, to apply their road manual to rail rights-of-way and allow us to get Senator PELL'S straight high speed railroad system in operation in southern New England.

The problem that the railroads have basically is that they're property heavy. They have the right-of-way on which taxes are paid, as well as maintenance costs for the rights-of-way and the signal system. These costs are not borne by the trucking industry nor by the airlines. The Federal Aviation Administration has 4,000 Federally employed persons. Most of these employees are air traffic controllers.

When you begin projecting population figures to the year 2000, we will have 320 million people in this country and one-quarter of the United States population will be in this Eastern megalopolis. When you begin projecting the berthing of motor cars, the situation is perhaps just as bad. We have 120, excuse me, we have 87 million cars on the road now and by 1980, it is projected that we will have 124 million, an increment of 37 million cars. We have a rather irrational zero pricing policy for the use of highways which has resulted in an overuse of highway facilities.

The automobile of today is causing pollution of the air, it is presenting problems with noise and it is also taking a great deal of landspace for roads and parking. So I would like to suggest the possibility of instituting vehicle ration days; days of the week in which one would not be permitted to drive his car. This would basically take 1/7th of the cars off the road in one feld swoop. This would eliminate congestion, would eliminate air pollution, and of course would give an aid to the public transportation system in that those who could not drive their cars on a particular day would use rail, bus or air transportation and would give back, in Senator Pell's terms, some of the cross working hours which are lost while we drive our private motor car.

Secondly, the idea of a car-rail ferry system, whereby the motorist could bring his car to a marshaling yard, such as on Route 128 in Boston or near Providence on any large area, and place the vehicle on a rail car to be transported to the outskirts of say New York. This again would have a bonus of minimizing pollution and highway congestion. I think that completes the basic ideas of my system.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you very much Professor. Mr. Burke has a question.

Congressman BURKE. I would just like to comment with relation to the excellent statements our witnesses have made here today. According to highway statistics, the Division of the Bureau of Public Roads, the total highway expenditure in the United States for the five year period from fiscal 1965, and that includes 1970, was $24,753,000,000; for the expenditures towards railroads and passenger service, I doubt if it reaches even one-half million dollars. So you can see that while we have tremendous highways, there is really nothing along the lines of railroad passenger service.

Congressman CONTE. Mr. Poulsen, you intrigue my curiosity when you started banning automobiles from the road. It may be good and it may not be good. Do you have any details about who's going to do the banning and for what reason?

Professor POULSEN. Well the reasons are the pollution, noise and space problems connected with automobiles.

Congressman CONTE. I understand the reasons why we need less cars on the road. How are you going to say to at least 60,000 people: well, once a week, only 10,000 of you can use your cars?

Professor POULSEN. I would visualize that each car would have a different color number plate so that if you had a blue plate, you would not drive say on Thursday, while your neighbor might have a red plate and a car pool and you could travel with him on that particular day.

Congressman CONTE. Seven different kinds of registration in Rhode Island?

Professor POULSEN. No, seven different colors to indicate the day of the week when you might not use your vehicle. That would remove one-seventh.

Congressman CONTE. Who picks the people who get assigned the various colors?

Professor POULSEN. This could be at random or you could just pick your own color.

Congressman CONTE. What if everyone said well they didn't want to drive on Monday, which would you choose?

Professor POULSEN. Well it could become a lottery.

Congressman BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I might comment here that it isn't beyond the realm of possibility that in the future years a vehicle traffic will have to be banned from our urban areas just to clear the air so that we can breathe once a week because of pollution. I think that's what you might have in mind.

Congressman TIERNAN. Professor, your paper said in the fiscal year 1969, budget authority for the ICC was $24 million, whereas the FAA 1969 budget was $75 million, You make the point, which I think is very important, that the maintenance of the air traffic control system is fully at government expense, whereas the railroad has to maintain the safety devices that are required by the Federal government and by the states they operate in.

Professor POULSEN. What I'm suggesting in terms of making the railroad an Interstate Highway System is to allow them to join the socialized airplane companies that do not own the airport nor hire the controllers.

Congressman TIERNAN. Doctor, I want to thank you and I hope to have the benefit of some further assistance from you as we proceed along. The Senator has just joined us and I think we may have a question or two before I call on the next witness.

Senator PELL. None, except that I've long known and admired Dr. Poulsen and just put an article of his in the Record. Thank you.

Professor POULSEN. Thank you Senator. (Professor Poulsen submitted for the record the following statement.)

In classes at the University I provide my students at the start of each semester with a handout titled "Words of the 1970's." Many of the words are applicable to our concern here today: Megalopolis; Boswash; Northeast Transportation Corridor; SST; Metroliner. Adding some of the other words in the list: lasers; atomic power, ABM; and Age of Acquarius one gets the message. We are for better or worse on the sharply rising part of a graph whose vertical axis is labelled "change" and the horizontal axis, "time." The degree of change and the rapidity of change threaten the system as we have known it with a major breakdown. The problems of the 60's have not been solved by the turning of the calendar page to a new decade. Herman Kahn, amongst others, in his work "The Year 2000: A Framework for Speculation on the next Thirty-Three Years" (MacMillan Company, 1967), suggests some of the changes with which the transportation system must cope. By the start of the next century world population will reach 6 billion, while the U.S. will grow to 320 million. Of this total, one fourth (80 million) will bless the Boswash Megalopolis. Together with the growth of human population will come an ample birthing of new motorcars. By 1980, the AAA estimates motorcars in use will total 124 million compared with the present 87 million for a ten year increment of 37 million vehicles. If this forecast for the private sector proves correct, there will be required sizeable additional public investments in new roadways to be carved out of our diminished supply of parks, forests, playgrounds, marshes and city centers; enough to keep the "road gang" reasonably happy during this decade. The social cost side of this vehicle boom will be found in at least a troika of pollution factors—air, noise and visual—as well as the continued claim against an increasingly scarce resource—space.

In our cities and suburbs we have followed an irrational zero pricing system for highway users. In consequence of this policy, we suffer from severe highway congestion which leads to the demand for more highways to end the road overutilization brought about by the mistaken zero pricing policy.

In congested city centers, the pricing process has forced investors to recognize the high cost of horizontal space. The result has been tall buildings. On the other hand, the automobile industry and the motorist have not had to consider his economic fact of life and instead of tall cars we have cars 17–20 feet long, 6 feet wide but only waist high. Elsewhere I have proposed a graduated vehicle space use tax to counter this propensity to purchase space gobbling vehicles.

In view of the predicted increase in vehicle numbers and use, a manifestation of a latter day frontier of laissez faire spirit in a world far removed from either condition—the freedom to unlimited use of the motorcar—needs rethinking. A few years ago, Mr. Luther Hodges, then Secretary of Commerce, was most critical of commuter or vehicle space-use taxes, seeing in them a threat to "our right to come and go as we please". He saw this as "a heritage of our frontier days". This social nostalgia has been especially well described by Max Ways in The Negro and the City (New York, Time-Life Books, 1968). He points to the affluent white families who, seeking to live out the Jeffersonian dream, have "fled to the mini-meadows of the suburbs where each acts out the agrarian fantasy by owning a mini-farmhouse."

In the past an increase in the supply of motorcars has been met (with a lag) with an increase in roadspace. In the Galbraithian sense, the supply of vehicles has been the creator of demand for roadspace. A breach in this pattern is now developing. Recently Massachusetts Governor Francis Sargent decreed a virtual halt to roadbuilding and proposed the beginning of a balanced transportation system. A few days later (February 16, 1970), Governor Frank Licht of Rhode Island ruled out the construction of I895, a controversial segment of the Federal Interstate Systems. At the December sessions in Boston of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the suggestion was made that in the future not all demands should be met, especially if to satisfy such demands would foul the air or water or further glut the highways.

Goods and services are all rationed by a social invention called price. Those who are unable to pay the dollar amount required are excluded from the consumption of the product. For example, those lacking the means to purchase an automobile are offered the opportunity to use public transportation or to walk. Other limits to human activities have developed in the post-frontier days. These include zoning regulations, speed limits, licensing requirements, building codes, air pollution controls, etc. Vehicle ration days, days of the week when one would be denied the use of the family car(s), would be merely an extension of such controls. In this case it would provide for affluent motorcar users who are the major dispensers of air pollution and the moving power in forcing the carving of white commuter expressways through black housing areas, the opportunity to join the poor one or more days of the week in travelling via public transportation.

A number of bonuses would be forthcoming from such a vehicle ration system. These would include a sizeable cutback in air pollution and road congestion. One bus can transport 41 persons occupying some 200 square feet of roadspace (and no parking space) versus the 3,400 square feet that private motorcars for that many drivers would occupy. It would also be a boom to the passenger railroad traffic, causing those travellers who might make an intercity trip such as from Boston to New York by car, to turn to the rail service on vehicle ration days. Further, although automobile related employment would probably decline, the need for workers to build, service and man the rail and bus passenger equipment would grow sharply. Lastly, in Senator Pell's terms, it would recover some of the time lost from our Gross National working hours, as persons relieved of the burden of the motorcar on ration days could devote the time required for their trip by public transportation to reading or writing, work that could not be done in the private car enroute to its destination.

Despite limitations on vehicle usage, congestion and pollution problems will continue to grow. To mitigate these destructive forces a car rail ferry system would be especially useful. Such a system would allow the middle-aged love affair with the motorcar to continue with not too great a modification. The traveller in the Boston area, for example, desiring to go to New York City would be able to drive to a marshaling yard at Route 128 where he could put his car on one of a fleet of rail ferries operating on frequent and speedy schedules to an offloading point in the outskirts of New York City. Such a system would provide the same lineup of benefits as described above, but of course, would be especially beneficial to the railroad companies providing this different type of passenger service. When the new roads connecting major urban centers were completed, the driving time was drastically cut. For example, the New York-Boston trip time was halved. However, average speed on these and other routes has begun to fall, due to the number of vehicles using the roadspace and especially the large number of local users entering and leaving the expressways in Providence, New Haven, Stamford and Bridgeport. Escape from this speed-slowing congestion could be achieved at modest costs by an adjunct to the Interstate Highway System already in place and with ample excess capacity—the shoreline route of the New Haven region of the Penn Central put to use as a car rail ferry system.

Implementation of these proposals will require some period of time. In the meantime the passenger trains will continue to disappear and the rails will be pulled up unless prompt public financial aids are devised and put into effect. A look at the ills of the New Haven Railroad (NHRR) (now the New Haven Region of the Penn Central Transportation Company) reveals the difficulties which beset any railroad which provides passenger service.

Even though the NHRR traverses the heavily populated Boston-New York corridor, its long haul passenger business has declined year after year. Committed to the carrying of commuter traffic also, the losses by year have been:

Passenger losses

Year:
1960	$13,257,000
1961	12,293,000
1962	10,899,000
1963	8,587,000
1964	10,508,000
1965	9,886,000
1966	8,699,000
1967	10,281,000

Judge Anderson, Justice of the United States Court of Appeals and responsible for the bankrupt railroad, stated especially well the plight of the New Haven when he noted that "a train proceeding from New York to Boston has truck competition on one side, sea borne competition on the other and air competition overhead. All of these other forms of transportation directly or indirectly are subsidized. Meanwhile the railroad has to maintain the tracks, roadbed and other facilities."

At the Federal level and concerned with railroads, motor carriers, pipelines, etc., is the Interstate Commerce Commission. The stated purpose of the ICC is "to regulate carriers engaged in transportation in interstate commerce, including regulation of carrier rates and enforcement of statutes and regulations affecting carriers." In fiscal 1969, the ICC had 1906 employees and was supported by a budget authority of $24,664,000.

Similar sorts of concerns exist at the state level. For example, the Rhode Island Public Utilities is responsible for the protection of the public in its dealings with common carriers and is specifically responsible for the operation and rate structure of public utilities and common carriers (rail, motor, pipeline). These state functions required the employment of 109 persons and program expenditures of $228,238 in fiscal 1969.

On the other hand the agencies concerned with aviation affairs are mainly supportive of the activity. A look at the statement of purpose of the Federal Aviation Administration bears this out. Under the Act of 1958, "the administrator of the FAA was made responsible for the development and operation of a common system of air traffic control . . . the regulation of air commerce to promote its safety, the promotion and development of civil aeronautics . . . as well as the installation and operation of navigation facilities". For these supportive/promotional activities, the FAA in fiscal 1969 employed more than 44,000 persons with Federal budget support amounting to $705,383,000. Of this total, over $498,000,000 was devoted to the operations and maintenance of the air traffic control system.

In Rhode Island, the Division of Aeronautics employed in 1969, 143 persons with total state supported personnel services of $958,362 and operating expenses of $908,758. Net cost to the state after revenue collections amounted to $994,120.

I believe these comparisons bring out the regulatory aspect of Federal and state agencies concerned with rail and truck services and the supportive/promotional aspect of the public agencies concerned with the air transportation industry, an industry largely dependent on passenger business as is the NHRR.

A further factor to hamper the railroads is found in their property heavy condition. A recent study points out that property taxes have absorbed nearly 3.5 percent of rail operating revenues, but only 0.4 percent for motor carriers and 0.2 percent for air carriers. The property tax plight of the railroads is borne out at the annual meetings of the National Tax Association. While a whole session is spent discussing various aspects of railroad property tax problems, no sessions are devoted to the property tax problems of the trucking or airline industries.

Other current costs are also implied in the property heavy designation. These include expenses incurred for the replacement of ties, new ballast, snow removal, maintenance of the right-of-way, and the signal system, etc. A specific New Haven expenditure item, that for cross ties, is shown below:

Year	Cross ties replaced	Cost per tie	Total cost
1956	100,367	$3.76	$337,380
1960	106,359	3.87	411,609
1963	86,761	3.85	334,030
1964	84,465	3.77	318,433
1965	87,191	3.98	347,020
1966	97,974	4.97	486,931
1967	50,543	5.04	254,736

During the decade from 1957 to 1967, another cost, that of new rails for replacement of track, rose from $99.61/ton (1957) to $127.93/ton (1967).

Another measure of the property heavy designation and cost of the railway is seen in the investment in transportation property which has ranged from $292,509,000 in 1963 to $274,879,000 in 1967. The third largest cost to the railroad has been that required to be expended on the maintenance of the right-of-way.

Railroads all over the country are rushing to invest in non-railroad ventures following the path blazed by the Chicago and Northwestern Railway with its Northwest Industries Corporation. This conglomerate business now includes chemicals, wearing apparel (Fruit of the Loom), electrical components, and insulated wire and steel (Lone Star Steel). Although non-rail income continued to advance, the $9.9 million deficit from railroad operations reduced per share earnings in 1967 by $9.13.

Penn Central, another conglomerate, fared somewhat better on rail operations. However, of the $3.11 per share earned in 1967, only $0.67 came from rail operations. A similar story is seen in the case of non-rail income of the Santa Fe ($28 million), Northern Pacific ($24.5 million), and Southern Pacific ($57 million).

The New Haven had few of these non-rail sources of income to fall back on to buoy its income position. However, in a sense the plight of the New Haven as a railroad was the plight of all railroad operations. In the long run, the local problem may become more widespread. Even now several other smaller lines are almost ready to go the bankruptcy route.

How can the situation be remedied? It is my belief that a large part of the problem could be resolved if the New Haven and other railroads were made property light. Relieved of the heavy burden for the right-of-way in ties alone the New Haven has in place over 9,600,000 with a total replacement cost of $48,384,000, the signal system, and freight and passenger terminals, the railroad would be viable.

A start toward a solution to the rail passenger problems could be accomplished by bringing the same kinds of government support as cited earlier to the rail operation as have long been afforded competitive modes of transportation. In this respect, a railroad signal system is analogous to the air traffic control system and the stated FAA responsibility for installing and operating aids to air navigation and traffic control. To this end, it is proposed that the Department of Transportation be empowered to assume the responsibility for the installation, operation and maintenance of the railroads' signal system, thus relieving the railroads of the expenses associated with these activities.

Second, the Department of Transportation would take over all rail passenger (and freight) terminals and be responsible, as the FAA is for air facilities, for their operation, maintenance, design and construction.

The third and final proposal would entirely free the railroad industry of its property heavy disadvantages. This proposal would have the rights-of-way purchased for inclusion as a part of the Interstate Highway System and leased back to the railroads. Charges to the railroads could take the form of locomotive registration fees or a tax on diesel fuel, or both. Such charges would place the railroads in a position similar to that of interstate truck and bus operators who do not build or own their rights-of-way. Furthermore, Federal support of a 90/10 variety would allow the state highway departments to undertake to improve the rights-of-way so that they would be compatible with the high-speed passenger equipment as well as allowing speedier freight services.

It appears doubtful that passenger railroad operations in the Northeast corridor will remain viable in the face of rising land and real estate assessments and maintenance of way costs in this densely populated part of the country. As the values and costs rise, so will the local property taxes charged the railroads, thus giving further advantage to the buses and trucks using highways upon which no property taxes are payable. To allow those involved to take advantage of the basic efficiencies of the railroads, a quantum change in the way the railroad industry is viewed seems to be necessary. To begin the implementation of such changes by giving as much public support to passenger railroad facilities as that provided rail competitors, seems an especally good choice.

Congressman TIERNAN. At this time, I would like to call on another member of the panel, Mr. Ernest Gibson III, who is the Chairman of the Vermont Public Service Board. He has been most patient sitting here while other members of the panel and other witnesses have spoken. I would appreciate his comments in relation to what Vermont feels we might be able to do.

Mr. GIBSON. Thank you, Congressman Tiernan. I am very happy to be here today to participate in this panel. I think it is a very important matter. I think maybe a better person to be here in my place is my wife. She is most ardent and enthusiastic in trying to encourage the resumption of rail passenger service. I hear about it regularly from her.

I appear as a state regulator, on behalf of the state, a region which has no rail passenger service. Congressman Kyros mentioned that Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont presently have no rail passenger service. Vermont lost its last passenger trains in September 1966. Vermont has had other railroad problems in the past.

Some time ago, in the early 1960's, the State of Vermont was confronted with an abandonment petition of the Rutland Railway Corporation. This railroad was not in the passenger business, but it provided a vital freight service up and down the western side of the state. Abandonment of this service could have resulted in the relocation of a number of businesses, and this would have been a severe blow to the economy of the state. The Vermont Legislature, however, appropriated a sum of money to be used for the purchase of the principal portions of this railroad located in Vermont, and following negotiations, the state did purchase major segments of the railroad. These segments were, in turn, leased to two privately owned railroad corporations, which are continuing rail operations.

Although the State of Vermont was able to take positive action on its own behalf in that situation, it and any other state is unable to go it alone with respect to passenger service. The Rutland Railroad had rail connections with other railroads so that freight could get in and out. However, unless there are appropriate passenger connections at the borders of a state, it will not do a state much good to try to provide passenger service on its own to such points.

The State of Vermont would like to indicate here its support for the Railpax concept, and we would urge that this concept be expanded to include those areas of northern New England which do not now have any rail passenger service. I know that there is interest in Maine and New Hampshire in having service into the Boston area. Vermont also has a community of interest with Boston, and in addition, for years there was also excellent passenger service between Montreal and New York City through Vermont. We believe that service between the metropolitan areas of Montreal and Boston and Montreal and New York should be reinstituted.

We would ask that the planning and thinking concerning rail passenger service include at the outset the states of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont which do not presently have any rail passenger service, and I assure you that the Public Utility Commissions of these states will be glad to assist in this in any way possible. Thank you.

Congressman BURKE. Thank you very much. We will now hear from Mr. Richard T. Fleming, Washington Representative of the Massachusetts Port Authority.

TESTIMONY BY MR. FLEMING

The Massachusetts Port Authority has demonstrated in a most significant and practical way its support of rail service between Boston and New York. The Authority is developing the New England Trade and Transportation Center at the South Station which we trust will anchor rail service to downtown Boston.

This Trade and Transportation Center will represent an investment of over 60 million dollars. Its major components will include a 500 unit motor hotel, 5000 space parking garage, special-use office building, a trade mart, and a combined terminal for rail and bus lines. This facility will be connected with the downtown retail center by minibus and moving sidewalks.

By this commitment to a new trade and transportation center for Boston, the Massachusetts Port Authority has manifested its belief in the potential of high speed rail service to carry significant passenger volumes between Boston and New York. Through the Governors Advisory Council on Transportation, the Authority has supported proposals for the creation of a structure of government and business cooperation, to reconstitute Boston-New York rail service, on a sound, long term basis.

The Massachusetts Port Authority respectfully submits that it is highly desirable, as as matter of public policy, to maintain rail service between Boston, New York, and Washington as a transport alternative to the airways and highways.

We submit further that the capital costs involved in developing an adequate rail transport system in the Northeast Corridor are too high to expect that they can be met by private organizations without participation by the government.

Therefore, it is earnestly suggested that the Federal government present a rail transportation policy and plan in which the New England Regional Commission, state governments, local governments, and business interests can cooperate.

Policy and guidance might well come from the Federal Railway Administration. Congress has given this agency basic responsibilities for the development of interstate transportation.

If a plan is forthcoming from the Federal Railway Administration and if it is implemented by other levels of government and by the railroads, it will be matched by a handsome trade and transportation center of the Massachusetts Port Authority on the site or the present South Station in Boston.

Senator PELL. Thank you very much and thank you for coming down. There are a couple of people of great interest in the audience. I can't help but see Mr. Horner of United Aircraft who has given as much as anybody of himself and his company to make the Turbo Train. I see Dick Wright of the New England Council. I don't know if either of them can be persuaded to come forth. I think it would be helpful to the record. I turn it back to my good colleague.

Congressman BURKE. I introduce Mayor Phil Noel of the City of Warwick, Rhode Island.

Mayor NOEL. As Mayor of the City of Warwick, Rhode Island, the second largest in the state and part of the Providence Metropolitan area, I am very aware of the problems which beset the residents of our entire area in terms of transportation.

Within our city is located 9 miles of the main line of the Penn Central Railroad. Our residents find daily requirements to commute to Boston and frequent trips to New York. We are part of the Northeast Corridor so frequently referred to as the most densely populated area of our country.

The Northeast corridor of the United States is probably the most unique human settlement in the world. This fact was pointed out by Jean Gottman in his book, Megalopolis, in which he noted that this type of urban development was a prototype of what is expected to eventually be a world wide phenomenon. Because of this point, the solutions to transportation problems that are developing in this area must by their nature be of major significance to the entire nation.

This section of the United States is the country's most heavily developed area. Because so many cities have developed in such close proximity to each other, and because their metropolitan areas have grown together, great problems have arisen in travel between, within, and out of these centers.

Three types of transportation can be identified concerning the northeast corridor; 1, travel between centers in the corridor and centers outside of it, 2, travel between centers within the corridor, and 3, travel within each center and metropolitan area in the corridor.

Travel out of or into the region is for the most part provided by air transport; in spite of many problems this mode of transportation basically serves this need.

A more significant problem of concern is travel between the different metropolitan areas. This is a need that cannot be served adequately by either the automobile or the airplane, by the very nature of their technological capabilities. A trip between, for example, Providence and New York or Boston, becomes a lengthy and frustrating experience if made by automobile; likewise, if the trip were made by plane it would have the disadvantage of excessive cost. Only rail travel has the potential of being an acceptable mode of transportation for a trip of this nature, when considering cost and time. The importance of the railroads as a means of inter-metropolitan transportation cannot be overemphasized because of the reasons just noted, but it is just this type of transit that has been and continues to be discouraged.

Similarly, as the metropolitan regions have grown, intra-metropolitan travel has been increasing as a major problem. In many sections use of the automobile on congested highways has become no longer a functional mode of transportation. Existing highways are already taxed beyond their capacities, and new highways are meeting economic, social and political rejection. Highways are simply incapable of adequately meeting the transit demands in metropolitan areas. Here again is an instance where rail transit or other forms of mass transportation are the only feasible solution. But it is here also that rail transportation is being discouraged and constantly reduced.

Given this position, it is evident that any further curtailment of inter-metropolitan and intra-metropolitan rail transit for passengers would be disastrous in the long run. In fact, this rail passenger service should not only be saved from further curtailment, but should be expanded to meet the need that exists for it and its further modification.

In recognizing these needs, we make several points which we feel to be of utmost significance.

1. That state compacts for the subsidization of the railroad by state governments are not viable; and even more important, that this subsidization procedure cannot be continued indefinitely, especially as long as there is no long-term program designed to eliminate the need for this subsidization.

2. That during the 1970's, the Federal government must establish the same commitment for the passenger railroads and other forms of mass transit that it did in the 1950's for the automobile with the Interstate Highway Program and with it must provide 90–10 Federal funding.

3. That although the major emphasis should be on rail or other mass transit, this should not be to the exclusion of other modes of transportation as has been done in the past. This need for coordination of all forms of transportation, while emphasizing mass transit, could be experimented with via a prototype system to determine what could be done. The New England region could be selected as the study area for the prototype, in which case the vehicle for study and enaction of the program could be the New England Regional Commission.

4. Finally, that the Federal money demonstrating this commitment should be intended either for improvement of capital facilities (such as terminal facilities, rail beds, etc.) or for operational subsidies, and with either should be restricted to passenger-oriented service.

Surely the railroads are not the panacea for all of our transportation problems; but they must be recognized as one of the important networks in the comprehensive transportation picture. They have too long been cast aside as a mode of transporting passengers. They must be retained and expanded to serve their respective sector of the transportation market, but be designed to work together with and compliment other modes of transit to provide an adquate and functional total network for transporting passengers.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you very much Mayor. I understand that Steward Lamprey will take the stand and testify. I also would like to acknowledge the fact that Mr. Tucker from the Penn Central RR, New Haven Division has been present most of the afternoon and has been required to leave occasionally for business but has asked that he be allowed to submit a comprehensive statement with regard to some of the suggestions that have been made here and some of the statements that have been made. He will make that sometime before we close the record. Please step forward at this time.

Mr. LAMPREY. Mr. Chairman, the New England Regional Commission's purpose is primarily to foster the economic development of the region, and of course one of the vital areas of economic development is transportation. I think it would be a fair question to ask, "What has the New England Regional Commission's involvement been relating to this problem of transportation"? First, we began by making a broad comprehensive study of the transportation needs of the entire region, and based uopn that study we followed up with a high speed rail transportation study. We have formulated an advisory board, whereby at least one person from each State is represented to advise us on rail transportation.

The more important aspect and developments of the New England Regional Commission has been in the backing and the allocation of funds: $50,000 to the transport corporation to see if we could develop a privately sponsored organization to carry out the passenger service transportation facilities. On top of that, if our 1971 budget is approved by Congress we have tentatively allocated $45,000 for this project. We've been searching for information, allocating funds and we hope to be of service to this Committee, to the Congress or wherever we might be able to help solve this problem. I would now like to introduce Mr. Wright.

Mr. WRIGHT. I don't believe that there is anything that I can add. I think the Federal Co-Chairman has very succinctly stated our interests. We are vitally concerned in health, housing, education, environment and transportation. We look to the deliberations of the people who appeared today to find the actual solutions to the problems.

Senator PELL. With regard to the Turbo, would the papers be taken over by GEO because it is not doing well financially?

Mr. WRIGHT. That's one of the thoughts.

Senator PELL. Can you think of any project that would be more suitable for the New England Regional Commission?

Mr. WRIGHT. Trains and environment are probably the basics of our problems in New England.

Congressman TIERNAN. I want to thank you both for taking the time to come down to testify.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there is any way we can help, please call on us.

Congressman TIERNAN. Is the Mayor of Newton here. Nice to have you with us Mayor.

Mayor BASBAS. My name is Monte Basbas, Mayor of Newton, Massachusetts. I appreciate this opportunity to address myself to the subject of public transportation because it has been an area of great concern to me during the four-plus years of my administration.

Newton is a city of almost 95,000 people in 18 square miles and sits astride all of the transportation facilities leading into and out of Boston from the west. One of the most important facilities we have is the Penn Central rail line running from Boston to New York via Worcester, Springfield, Hartford and New Haven. We are essentially a bedroom community and many of our citizens work in Boston. Thus, Mass Transit, including Penn Central commuter service, is most essential to us.

It is interesting to note, however, that a recent study submitted to the Massachusetts Port Authority, which operates Logan International Airport, indicates that Newton is the center of air traffic generation in metropolitan Boston. Our population, comprised of a large percentage of business and professional people, has interests that extend beyond the boundaries of Massachusetts and travel a great deal. The vast percentage of flights out of Logan, of course, are to New York City.

The downtown to downtown travel time is increasing every day because of air congestion, traffic congestion between airports and city centers and the mounting congestion in the skies. Many people drive to New York, preferring the four to five hour drive to the plane trip and all of the aggravation and delays involved on many occasions.

Our country aided the railroads when they were first established early in the last century, but since that time any public monies invested in transportation have built roads or aided air travel in one way or another. The railroads have proved conclusively, either intentionally or unintentionally, that private enterprise cannot cope with mass transportation of people. No serious effort has yet been made, however, to determine whether or not the railroads and government together can offer a comfortable, convenient, competitive, as to time and price, alternative to air travel in mid-distance trips between 100 and 500 miles. I respectfully suggest that this effort should and must be made. I further suggest that, for reasons already cited, the Penn Central inland route should be included in any such experiments.

My primary interest must of necessity be in metropolitan mass transportation. I was most pleased when our Governor halted the road building and called for a study of a balanced transportation plan with greater emphasis on mass transit. I would not want anything to blunt that trust now.

From the larger view, however, I would be remiss in my duties to my citizens if I did not view with alarm the problems of transportation between metropolitan areas or mass transit for the megalopolis, if you will. I urge your most serious consideration of the concepts envisioned in such a plan as railpax.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you, Mayor—what type of passenger service do you have now?

Mayor BASBAS. We do have a passenger line available.

Congressman TIERNAN. Has there been any discontinuance?

Mayor BASBAS. There have been attempts but we have been able to avoid it to date.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you, Mayor. I want to introduce Mr. Archie Smith, the Utility Commissioner from the State of Rhode Island. He has been here all day and has been doing a good job trying to keep Penn Central on the ball. He has to make a 5 o'clock flight and I wanted to acknowledge him before he left. Mr. Horner of United Aircraft.

Mr. HORNER. We can provide a total transportation system, complete with train fleet and supporting maintenance supervision. We have built 2 prototype Turbo Trains, equivalent in capacity to 4 Metroliner cars, and have operated continuously with one train, with one standby, since April 1969 with an on-time record of 95%. Our trains have left Boston in the early A.M. daily with an average of 40 passengers, later to be filled to capacity on arriving in New York most of the time with a load-factor of 65%–70%, leaving New York filled every night.

The key to the train's performance is a pendulous suspension system which permits substantially higher speed on curves than do standard cars having 2–2 axle trucks per car. The trains have received good passenger response. People like the trains. We are looking forward to the continuation of this program.

Congressman TIERNAN. Could you tell me what capacity the train is running at?

Mr. HORNER. The train is running at 65% capacity.

Congressman TIERNAN. What is the total capacity of the train?

Mr. HORNER. 242 total capacity.

(The following is the complete testimony submitted after the hearings by Mr. Horner.)

Wherever a railroad passenger service, meeting modern standards of speed, comfort and frequency, has been placed into operation in a densely populated corridor, the results have been rewarding. The Boston-New York corridor is such a location. The United Aircraft Turbo Train provides the necessary type of service and the passenger response to the service has demonstrated that it satisfies a public need. Furthermore, the Turbo Train technology, existing today, meets the goal of investment minimization.

Both social and economic considerations justify public support of rail passenger service. The public is becoming increasingly concerned with conservation of the total environment. Proliferation of freeways is meeting more and more public opposition because of the dislocation of people, the destruction of small businesses, the diversion of prime land from the tax rolls and the increasing air pollution caused by automobile exhausts.

Increased use of the rails does not disrupt lives or businesses. The rights-of-way have existed for decades, and both residential and industrial site patterns have long since adjusted to their existence. Each track on a railroad has passenger carrying capacity equal to approximately 20 lanes of freeway. The rails are not used to capacity. Up-to-date statistics are not available, but in 1962, only 600,000 passengers traveled between New York and Boston by rail. The same year, 4,200,000 made the trip by auto. Each 325-passenger Turbo Train can carry, at the normal load factor, the passengers now occupying 228 autos. This would reduce the horsepower producing exhaust pollutants from roughly 45,000 horsepower to only 2,000 horsepower, roughly 5%.

The population and economic activity of the three southern New England states are concentrated along the railroads of the region. More than 60% of the three state population resides in the cities along the routes between Boston and New York, either along the shore line or along the New Haven-Springfield-Boston route. Noncommuting rail passenger traffic along these routes dropped from 3,000,000 in 1955 to 680,000 in 1968. Independent studies project that rail patronage on these routes can grow to 2,100,000 by 1975 if full Turbo Train service is introduced. All figures are approximate. Such a corridor system would serve both routes, with a total of 11 Turbo Trains operating on a three-hour schedule between Boston and New York. Depending upon the route segment, from four to 11 train schedules each way would be provided.

The Turbo Train portion of the Northeast Corridor High-Speed Rail Demonstration has been under way since October 1968. It expires in October 1970 unless extended by the U.S. Department of Transportation or taken over by others. To date, it has had excellent passenger acceptance. Of Turbo Train passengers polled in a DOT survey, 45% had used trains on their next previous trip. Seventy-five percent intended to use the Turbo Train on succeeding trips. The validity of the survey is supported by the fact that Turbo Train load factors have averaged 67% compared to 30% for intercity passenger trains nationally. This success is due not only to the improvements in comfort and decor designed into the Turbo Train, but also to the improvement in schedule it has made possible. The Turbo Train has reduced the Boston-New York schedule from 4 hours and 15 minutes to 3 hours and 39 minutes, with no improvements tracks or signals. With minimum such improvements and with better protection at road crossings, the Turbo Train can further reduce this schedule to three hours or less.

The two principal design features of the Turbo Train affecting economics are the ability to take curves at higher speeds and the high-powered performance available from the compact, lightweight, aircraft type gas turbines. These two features reduce the investment required for roadbed improvements and eliminate the need for electrification of this route. As the result, it is estimated that a complete, modern New England Corridor Turbo Train system can be established for approximately $105,100,000. Not all of these funds need be expended initially. The present demonstration could be expanded to more frequent service on the present attractive schedule by the addition of Turbo Trains only. Other physical improvements could then be applied to further enhance the service. An approximate schedule of expenditures is as follows:

[Dollars in millions

	1971	1972	1973	1974	1975	Total
Turbo train equipment	5	10	12.5			27.5
Roadbed improvements (minimum amount 3 hours shoreline New York to Boston)	2	4	2.6			8.6
Stations and parking	2	2	2			6.0
Grade crossing elimination	2	4	8	9	9	32.0
Signalling improvement	1	4	8.0	9	9	31.0
Total	12	24	33.1	18	18	105.1

Logical sources for these funds are the Federal Railway Administration, the Federal Highway Administration, the states and the cities.

Senator PELL. It's almost a state secret to find the Turbo Train on the Penn Central RR schedule. Penn Central has reluctantly run the train. Middle management in PC is not interested in hauling people. Mr. Saunders, Chairman, PCRR, is interested. Organized labor wants to run the train. United Aircraft has built the trains with their own funds, and nobody wants to buy them now. The Turbo Train demonstration program contract with DOT expires on October 22, 1970. I understand that UAC has more overhead personnel required to support a lessor number of maintenance people. I understand that UAC could support 20 trains with the maintenance personnel they have now. The PC has not spent any money on advertising the Turbo Train.

Congressman TIERNAN. You have a question Dr. Poulsen?

Professor POULSEN. The railroad industry is not aware of advertising. Running a business without advertising is like kissing in the dark; you know that you're doing but no one else does.

Congressman TIERNAN. Recognized James Kelso, Executive Vice-President of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Kelso asked permission to submit a written statement following the meeting. The following testimony was sent to CIPS by Mr. Kelso:

The problem of maintaining adequate and effective means of intercity and interstate rail transportation becomes increasingly heavy with each passing day. The roadways and air traffic lanes are becoming not only congested but are raising serious questions of safety. It is the opinion of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce that development of high-speed ground transportation is the highest priority. The Chamber would like to direct its attention to the specific problem of congestion in the Boston-New York corridor. This area is rapidly growing in population and will shortly become one of the country's highest density populations. Between Boston and New York, on an annual basis, 2 million travel by airplane, ½ million by bus and approximately ¼ million by rail and another 16 million by private car over the highways.

The Federal government has accepted the responsibility of providing a balanced national transportation policy which requires appropriate financial aid to the nation's bus passengers, air travelers and railroad passengers. The Federal government is now preparing to submit legislation for a 5 years, $3.1 billion transit aid program sponsored by Senator Harrison A. Williams, to give financial aid for public transportation. His program is the first phase of an extended $10 billion program as outlined by President Nixon's administration. The most important part of this legislation is that it does work with rapid transit facilities. There will be a need, there is no question, by rapid transit within the major cities, such as Boston, for a large infusion of Federal aid as well as that raised by local authorities. In addition, at least $1.3 billion will be required for the improvement of commuter railroad systems in the Northeast cities.

The Chamber would like to go on record that, in addition to these many needs, there is a very pressing interest on the part of the business community to provide high-speed rail transportation between Boston and New York via Providence. Unless a solution to the rail problem can be developed, increasingly huge expenditures must be made to increase highway and airway capacities. It is our opinion, as shown by the recent experiments with the Turbo Train from Boston to New York, and that also run on the Metroliner from New York to Washington, that people can be encouraged to travel by railway. It must be admitted that the present railroad service has not done much to encourage the use of the railroads by the public.

I would hope that the Congress of the United States would immediately pass legislation to provide limited assistance for rail transportation in the emerging megalopolis of New York-Boston and Washington. Clearly private enterprise cannot do this. Large expenditures must be made for the improvement of road beds, as well as provide for adequate equipment.

It would seem that such expenditures might not be justified if one looks at the dollar amount alone. We should like to point out that it would provide indirect benefits such as reduction of air pollution and noise and the reduction of expenditures necessary to increase the capacity of the air-highway transportation systems and provide stimulus to urban redevelopment.

The Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce would like to urge that Federal legislation be enacted to provide adequate substance to the promotion of ultra-highspeed rail transportation between Boston and New York. A minimum of three years would be required for construction and since congestion on airways and highways is upon us, no time should be lost in obtaining the necessary Federal government action. If action were taken this year, 2½ hour service between New York and Boston could be reached by 1974. Such a service would do much to build and to bolster the economy of the Northeast.

I introduce Armistead Rood.

Mr. ROOD. The following is written testimony by Mr. Rood.

Protect the Commonwealth's option to buy the Boston & Providence Railroad by intervening at once in US Supreme Court proceeding No. 882.

Massachusetts Senate Bill 1122 calls for the Commonwealth to exercise its present option to buy the properties of the Boston & Providence RR Corporation at a price based on original cost with adjustments. The Commonwealth reserved the option when it created the B&P Corporation in 1831. B&P is on the verge of having its properties sold by a court plan to the New Haven RR Co. for resale to Penn Central, a foreign corporation. The court sale will cut off the Commonwealth's present option.

B&P owns the main line between Boston and Providence—via South Cove, Back Bay, the South End, Northeastern University, Roxbury Crossing, Jamaica Plain, Forest Hills, Hyde Park, Readville, Route 128 Station, Canton, Sharon, Mansfield, Attleboro, Pawtucket. B&P owns branch railroads to Roslindale, West Roxbury, Dedham, Stoughton, East Providence. B&P owns the Back Bay Station and the Southwest Corridor, extensive lands and shops at Readville, Providence lands and half of Providence Union Station. B&P shares with Penn Central the Midland Route from Readville to Boston including South Boston yards.

Particular values for the Commonwealth include—a ready-made suburban mass transit system via Forest Hills; a straight line for the Boston-Providence-New York high-speed route; the Southwest Expressway route; routes for local streets and avenues, especially in South End; land for Northeastern University (removing the Chinese Wall); lands for various urban developments; air rights for development in Boston (with Mass. Turnpike) and fast route to new airport for Boston, Worcester, Providence.

U.S. Senate Bill 3154 would provide $3,100,000,000 in Federal subsidy to States and local agencies such as MBTA to acquire and develop railroads and other facilities but not highways for mass transport routes in urban areas. New York, Connecticut, New Jersey will get large share. Connecticut is taking over the New York route west of New Haven, why not Massachusetts too?

A pending court plan would force sale of B&P's properties to Penn Central. The plan price is based on low scrap value. The District Court in Boston approved the sale because no other buyer showed up.

The Commonwealth can expect Penn Central to charge high prices. The other day Penn Central charged the MBTA $7,000,000 for 24 acres of surplus yard land. The Commonwealth cannot take the Boston and Providence franchise by eminent domain which would in any event require a very high price. Its only right is founded on the option reserved in B&P's 1831 Charter. Eminent domain values are indicated by the 1965 B&P appraisal of Boston area properties at $43,274,923. The ICC calculated original cost of all B&P properties at $20,659,622, except for land valued at $5,316,180.

Congressman TIERNAN. I want to know if the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is the only one who has the option to purchase the line?

Mr. ROOD. Yes, it is the only one with the right to purchase the Boston to Providence line. Boston and Providence will be sold and New London will sell to Penn Central. What the Penn Central plans, no one knows. It is part of a package deal.

Congressman TIERNAN. Why is Boston-Providence selling?

Mr. ROOD. Boston-Providence is forced to sell because of reorganization costs.

Congressman TIERNAN. Are there any other questions? Thank you very much.

Senator PELL. I want to compliment you for your leadership in calling attention to the adversity of viewpoints here. It was an altogether excellent meeting.

Congressman TIERNAN. Thank you very much Senator. I want to indicate that this is just the beginning. We will compile the minutes of this meeting and distribute them. A meeting of the CIPS membership in order to go over the suggestions made today will take place in approximately a month. One further word, I hope you all took the time to notice the CIPS program. It was prepared by a young student intern of mine from Mt. Vernon Junior College, Tina Hyland: As you can see, she did an excellent job.

(Subsequent testimony was submitted by the following persons. We apologize to Senator Pell, whose statement below was given at the opening of the meeting. Senator Pell; Congressman Burke; Congressman Harrington; Gov. Walter Peterson of New Hampshire; Hon. Kevin H. White, Mayor of Boston; Mr. G. Wm. Miller, Textron, GEO-Transport Foundation of N.E.)

Senator PELL. Congressman Tiernan, Senator Brooke, and other Distinguished Members of the Panel and of the Committee for Improved Passenger Service.

After eight years of lonely advocacy for improved passenger service, I must say how encouraged I am with the formation of the Committee on Improved Passenger Service. I am very impressed by the distinguished gathering of people concerned with rail passenger service which are here today. So much so, that I believe that if everyone in this room could agree to support one substantial bill to assist rail passenger service, legislation to aid rail passenger service could pass the Congress this year.

I do not think we can afford to delay legislation any longer. In 1958 there were over 1400 intercity interstate trains, today there are only 448 intercity trains. Never have I seen the condition of rail passenger service in worse shape, and never in my eight years working at the rail passenger problem have I seen so much public support for Congressional action.

I do not think that the Congress can afford to await a Presidential message on rail passenger service which may never come. I believe the basic Legislation we need to save passenger service exists, and that this Committee should serve as the catalyst for moving the House and the Senate to pass legislation this year.

Our first concern should be directed to our Legislative Committees.

In short, I would ask our respective Houses of the Congress to consider passage of the omnibus bill which I have outlined in my testimony for the Commerce Committee tomorrow and which testimony is available to you here today.

The omnibus bill I suggest contains three sections:

The first section would be my own bill, the Regional Intercity Passenger Authority Act of 1969. My bill provides for the creation of a regional authority based on interstate compacts to operate passenger service. The Federal government would guarantee up to $1 billion of the bonds which an Authority would issue to raise capital. The States would be required to subsidize any operating loss of trains not included in the National Transportation System provided for in Section 2 of the omnibus bill.

Section two of the omnibus bill would be a modified version of the Senate Commerce Committee's proposal for the provision of new passenger equipment, and for authority for the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the quality of passenger service. I would modify the Commerce Committee's print to make my Regional Authorities eligible for the same limited and temporary subsidy and passenger equipment assistance for which the railroad industry would be eligible.

Section three of the omnibus bill I suggest would be the National Transportation Act which has been introduced in the Senate and in the House. The National Transportation Act calls for regional commission to undertake balanced transportation planning and demonstrations for all transportation modes in the major regions of the country.

Our second and more immediate concern should be the Appropriations Committees. In the Senate I hope to attach to the Administration's budget supplemental request an appropriation of $8.6 million for improving the roadbed used by the Turbo train between Boston and New York. This amendment would have numerous safety and speed benefits and I would hope the House members of this ad hoc Committee could gain some support for my amendment within the House Appropriations Committee.

Our third concern should be to provide money in the 1971 budget for the New England Regional Commission to pick up the contract for the Turbo train if the Department of Transportation does not continue the contract October, 1970.

Rather than take any more time of the panel, I am making available to the committee two statements in which I have outlined in more detail my thinking about improving rail passenger service.

To sum up, I would simply add to the statement which Stuart Saunders, President of Penn Central, made last fall regarding the condition of the rail passenger industry. He said, "The house is on fire." I would say in response, "We need public fire engines not a bucket brigade to save passenger service!"

Congressman BURKE. The problem of maintaining effective modes of transportation along the Northeast Corridor becomes increasingly acute with each day. The congested roadways and heavy air traffic have made the inception of high-speed ground transportation in New England an item of the highest priority.

There is one encouraging aspect to the cry for Government help that went up from the Nation's railroads. It is simply that they have finally begun to face up to the fact that they are not going to be allowed to get completely out of the passenger business. This is the crucial first step towards creating a national transportation policy in which the railroads have a major role.

The first response to the Metroliners running between Washington and New York City indicates there is a substantial and perhaps growing market for the railroads on intercity runs, particularly in heavily populated sections of the country. And, as the airways and the highways steadily grow more crowded, there may even be a future for the railroads in the summer vacation travel.

To tap such markets, however, the railroads have a generation of neglect to overcome. The tragedy of rail transportation is that the industry after World War II was seized by the idea that its future lay solely in freight operations. Instead of responding to the challenge presented by the airlines, many railroads set out to destroy their own passenger train operations and did almost everything they were allowed to do to make traveling by train as inconvenient and uncomfortable as possible.

If the railroads are to overcome this era of neglect, they need ask for more than just a Government subsidy to non-profitable trains. It is going to take railroad management that is creative and eager to build up public interest once again in "getting there" by train. This means fares that are competitive, cars that are clean and comfortable, tickets and reservations that are simple to obtain, other passenger services that are the equivalent of those offered to air travelers, and a strong effort to convince the public of the advantages, such as arriving on time, of rail transportation.

The Metroliner experiment, in which both the Federal Government and the Penn Central are expending substantial funds, has provided the impetus this moribund industry needs. The railroads may be correct in claiming they need governmental support in order to be competitive with air and highway transportation, both of which are heavily supported by tax revenue.

The greatest era for the construction of rapid transit facilities in the history of American cities will occur in the decade of the 1970's.

During the 1970's at least $17 billion is expected to be spent for creating entirely new rapid transit systems and for modernizing and extending older systems in the major cities of the United States, as well as for improving commuter railroad operations.

Not since the turn of the century when the initial rapid transit systems were built in such cities as New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago will there be such a surge in this important construction activity in public transportation.

In fact, the construction of rapid transit facilities in the 1970's will far surpass anything we have experienced. In addition to improvements to older systems, this vital form of high-speed, grade-separated public transportation is expected to be brought for the first time to at least eight other major cities.

Underlying this high level of rapid transit construction will be an extensive public awareness of the crucial need for modern transportation facilities. Also of special importance will be the further recognition by all levels of government—city, county, state and federal—of the need for providing the best in public transportation for our growing metropolitan areas.

In the 1960's the need for public financing of rapid transit facilities, as well as other transit improvements, was recognized by Congress and the federal government by the passage of the Urban Mass Transportation Act.

Now, the federal government is preparing to give further financial assistance and recognition to the need for new public transportation facilities in a five-year, $3.1 billion transit aid program sponsored as a bi-partisan measure by Senator Harrison A. Williams (D.-N.J.) with the backing of the administration of President Nixon.

This five-year program is to be the first phase of a 12 year, $10 billion program set forth by the Nixon administration as the federal government's contribution to the vast rapid transit and other transit improvements that are needed.

One of the most important features of this new program is that it will provide the long-term guarantees of federal aid which states and cities need to embark upon the construction of new modern mass transportation facilities which requires some years to complete.

Over $17 billion is estimated as the minimum expenditure needed for rapid transit facilities in the 1970's. Likewise, in the decade of the 1970's it is estimated that $8 billion will be spent for modernization and extensions of existing rapid transit systems in New York, Chicago, Boston, Cleveland, Philadelphia, and the South Jersey area. This total is expected to include $2.6 billion for modernization and $5.4 billion for extensions and other facilities.

During the 1970's it is expected that more than 8,000 new rapid transit and other commuter cars will have to be built to meet the needs of replacing outmoded equipment on existing systems and to fill the equipment requirements for new systems.

In addition to rapid transit facilities, the estimated $17 billion in expenditures for the 1970's also include approximately $1.3 billion for improving commuter railroad systems, mostly in the New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and New Jersey areas.

The Northeast Corridor of our Nation is faced with real problems. The Corridor is saturated with highway and air traffic often to the point of near immobility. The highway-airlane congestion persists in this populous Corridor and is becoming more of a problem every day. We are fast approaching the day when the Northeast Corridor will become so clogged with planes and autos that they will be unable to move.

We in New England must face the facts—either we start now to take steps to remedy the chaotic problems that lie ahead or we allow the states of Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont and Maine to die on the vine.

According to the Highway Statistics Division of the Bureau of Public Roads, the total highway expenditures in the United States from fiscal year 1965 to fiscal year 1970 totaled:

Year:	Million
1965	$4,026
1966	3,965
1967	3,973
1968	4,171
1969	4,151
1970 estimate	4,467
1965–70 year total (highway)	24,753

The French National Railways is in the form of a commercial corporation, with the Government holding 51 percent of the stock and private holdings accounting for the remaining 49 percent. The average daily speed for French passenger trains is considered to be quite high. For instance the Paris-Dijon run reaches 82 miles per hour; from Calais to Amiens, 87 miles per hour; and the short run from Anas to Longveau (some 41 miles in length) averages 84.9 miles per hour.

In Italy the present day Italian State Railways is an amalgamation of three large private railroad systems. The system now is Government owned and operated, and includes all railroad mileage in the country except for some small local lines which are privately held. The good express trains of Italy are fast, often averaging 75 miles per hour.

The railroads of the German Federal Railway are Government owned and operated. Speeds are relatively high. For example, the Hamburg-Frankfurt 435 mile trip is made in just 7½ hours, and includes 13 stops.

Approximately half of Canada's railway net is publicly owned and operated while the other half is private. Speeds are reported to be high. For instance, the Rapido, installed in 1965, is billed as North America's fastest intercity passenger train. It covers the 335 miles between Montreal and Toronto in 5 hours, with one stop, reaching speeds of 90 miles an hour.

In Japan, since June, 1949, the major railway network has been in the hands of a public corporation called the Japanese National Railways, under the supervision of the Minister of Transport. To achieve greater efficiency, most of the central authority was decentralized to six regional offices in 1957; enlarged to nine in 1959. Speed wise, Japan's railroads have achieved a notable success. The much publicized Tokyo-Osaka line is 320 miles long. Opened in 1964, the line serves a corridor encompassing nearly 50 percent of the country's population. The average day sees 170 trains covering the route, carrying a total of 180,000 passengers. The run is made regularly at speeds up to 125 miles per hour, and consumes 3 hours and 10 minutes, including several stops. This is an average of 101 miles per hour.

It is interesting to note the two nations that allegedly lost World War II have made far greater strides in improvements in railroad passenger service, than our Nation the United States. It is quite apparent that we in the United States, being able to place men on the moon, now find it difficult to move people from city to city in our most populous areas by a modern pattern of passenger service. It is my sincere hope that at this meeting held today that Members of the New England Congressional Delegation, including Senators and Congressmen, Governors, Mayors, State Legislative leaders, State Public Utility Commissioners, railroad officials, and other interested parties will ignite a spark to awaken New England to a real problem that requires immediate and further action. The railroad passenger line traveling from Boston to New York in 2½ hours connecting with the Metroliner to Washington, D.C., would make it possible to travel to Washington, D.C., in approximately 5 hours. This should be one of our goals.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Over 11 million people live in the New England Northeast Corridor Area. The population of this area continues to grow at the rate of 1.2% per annum. In spite of this continuing concentration of population and urban development, the New England area still must contend with a transportation system that is largely inherited over its 250-year history. The single major improvement in transportation service has been the continued expansion of the interstate highway facility. Yet, the impact of this new highway construction and the greatly increased use of private automobiles has been the primary factor leading to the widespread abandonment of passenger trains throughout much of the New England area.

Since 1955, rail service between a dozen cities has been discontinued. Service to Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine has been abandoned altogether. The only service remaining of significance is the subsidized commuter service between Springfield, Worcester and Boston, and Springfield and New York. In the same period, we have seen the emergence of air service becoming the predominant public carrier service connecting New England with the rest of the Northeast Corridor and the nation.

In excess of 10 million person trips are made annually between the New England cities and cities in the remainder of the Northeast Corridor. The rail share of this market has slipped from a high of 20% in 1960 to under 5% today. The numbers of passengers traveling between Boston and New York reached a war-time peak of over 4 million passenger travelers in 1944. Since then, the number has decreased to less than 320,000 in 1969. The remaining rail service still in operation has deteriorated to the point of reaching barely tolerable levels of cleanliness, reliability and comfort. Only in the last two years, through the introduction of limited turbo train service in 1969 between Boston and New York, has hope been given to restoration of improved rail travel. These runs are only experimental in nature and have been designed primarily to test new and improved equipment, but not service. The abandonment of this experiment in September 1970 appears imminent.

The only promising commitment by the railroads is a statement by Chairman Saunders—Penn-Central Railroad—that despite heavy losses from passenger operations, the Penn-Central is stepping up efforts to provide cleaner cars and better service with the use of conventional equipment. Yet, the Penn-Central, on absorbing the bankrupt New Haven Railroad last year reduced the number of Boston/New York round trips to eight trains daily.

The need for improved passenger service in the New England area must be placed in context with the dilemma of the total transportation system in this area. There are many who make the argument that rail service should be abandoned in light of its advanced stage of deterioration. Except for the brief experiment with the turbo trains, the public would appear to have abandoned rail service in favor of either the private automobile or air travel for over 80% of their travel. But the argument is false.

During the next decade, continuation and improvement of passenger service is likely to be the one prospect remaining, i.e., for improvement of service between the New England area and the rest of the Corridor cities. In spite of expansion programs at Boston's Logan Airport and Hartford's Bradley Field, demand for air service will exceed the capacity of these fields before the end of the decade. The prospects for new international airports in this area are slim until the mid-1980's. The air traveler, over the next five years, will experience increasingly long delays due to air traffic congestion. The air travelers' problems will be further intensified by the difficulties of access between home, business centers and the three major commercial airports located in Boston, Providence and Hartford. Increasing traffic congestion will be experienced on urban highways in our major metropolitan areas with little prospects of improvement over the next decade.

But the problems of access within metropolitan areas will continue to worsen with the small prospect of improvement of urban highway facilities.

Therefore, the arguments for maintaining and improving passenger railroad service are clear. It is the single public mode that has the available capacity and the ability to move a large number of people between our major metropolitan areas and New York City and the remainder of the Corridor. Average travel costs by rail are less than costs by air and no greater than the costs of using one's own automobile.

Travel time to New York by rail including line haul and other times, i.e., access to and from railroad stations, is just over five hours.

Travel time by air including the access time at both ends of the trip now exceeds 2½ hours between Boston and New York. Well over half of this time is spent on the ground waiting for airplanes or in access to and from the downtown areas. Coincident with the marginal prospects of continuing air service at its present level, we can expect to see dramatic increases in the air travel time as a result of increasing delays through air traffic congestion and longer access times to central city and businesses. Auto driving times and travel times by bus exceed the five hours by rail. Over the next decade, rail remains the single prospect of improved travel service, i.e., reduction in door-to-door times. Increases in travel times by all other private and public carrier modes are imminent.

The resounding conclusion has to be the commitment for improved passenger rail service connecting the major New England cities, New York and the rest of the Corridor. Therefore, the challenge is not whether we continue the service, but rather how we bring about improvements in service without increasing the debt requirement on the private railroads on the one hand, and not requiring high capital expenditures by public authorities, local, state and federal, on the other hand. This challenge is prefaced by an understanding of the current status of the rail passenger service.

STATUS OF RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE IN NEW ENGLAND

The former New Haven Railroad, now the New Haven region of the Penn-Central, resulted from many mergers and several rebuildings. The last major rebuilding of tracks occurred in the late 1890's and the early 1900's when the main line from New York to New Haven was reconstructed from two to four tracks and the entire length grade separated. However, the absence of a coastal plain in New England necessitated a track alignment closely following the shoreline resulting in a route with considerable amount of curvature and numerous bridges. Electrification of the tracks between New York and New Haven took place between 1907 and 1925. This was possible without the expense of major construction. The remainder of the line, however, to Boston is not electrified, and except for several passing tracks for freight, is a two-track route. The last few miles from Readville to South Station are again four tracks. Consequently, over this alignment between New Haven and Boston little prospect exists for the use of the new Metroliner trains between Boston and New York.

The rail terminals in the New Haven region predate World War I, except for the Route 128 terminal in Boston, built in 1953. Except for the Route 128 station, the terminals lack adequate parking facilities, and as a result are in an advanced state of deterioration and are located in parts of the city which make them attractive hangouts for derelicts and other undesirable elements of our society.

With the exception of the new Turbotrain, the standard coaches and parlor cars used in the New Haven region are over 20 years old. Many of the cars in this part of the region were built in pre-war years and are still in use. As a rule, maintenance has been deferred on all passenger rail equipment due to the poor financial condition of the railroad and the lack of profit in the passenger service. To save maintenance costs, cars in need of repair have been taken out of service instead of being maintained. The decline of intercity passenger rail travel has made this policy of the railroads possible, resulting in a steady decline in the number of usable cars. During the peak period, these poor cars are pressed into service, increasing the likelihood of breakdowns and further aggravating the passengers.

This maintenance policy was especially true of the New Haven Railroad during its period of receivership. Since assuming the obligations of the New Haven Railroad, Penn-Central has begun a program to renovate both commuter and regular passenger cars. This program is proceeding at the rate of 6 cars a month, accounting for 20% per year of the New Haven fleet. Recent statements by Chairman Saunders continue to confirm this policy of improving the quality of the railroad passenger cars.

The major problem facing improvement in passenger service is the severe speed restriction on train operations over the road bed between New York and Boston. For 15 miles immediately north of Penn Station, speeds are limited to 40 mph or less because of curves, track conditions and severe grades over the roadbed. Track condition, signal spacing alignment from New Haven to Providence are superior to the New York to New Haven portion, allowing conventional passenger train speeds of 80 mph over considerable distances.

There are, however, severe curves at several locations including Branford, the Connecticut River crossing, New London, Groton, Mystic, Stonington, and several locations south of Providence. In many locations, horizontal and vertical clearances at overpasses, underpasses, and catenary support structures at curves are inadequate to permit higher speed operations. Multi-million dollar expenditures would be required to replace the tracks or rebuild these structures to improve this situation. More restrictive curves exist through Providence and north into Massachusetts.

Speed restrictions also result from the mix of traffic, including freight, commuter and intercity passenger trains on a single rail line. Trains are normally operated on a priority basis, with passenger trains having priority over freight. A number of draw bridges exist between New York and Boston. Ten in total exist on the New Haven line. The one at New London is probably the most frequently opened because of the submarine base upstream, where traffic comes to a halt in order to permit naval movement. Many grade crossings exist on the New Haven track of which many are seldomly used or are nonexistent, except for legal consideration. The continued presence of these grade crossings adds to a safety dilemma both for automobile traffic and the railroad operation.

While a number of facility improvements are being made by the Penn-Central on the facilities between New York and Washington, no specific plans have been given for the New Haven area mainline. Between New York and Washington, a considerable amount of welded rail has been laid to permit high speed travel. Installation of centralized traffic control over the entire line is under way in order to improve safety. Few improvements are being made in the New Haven region. Many reasons are stated for the lack of plans for the New Haven region, the main one being the diversion of through-freight from the present shoreline alignment to the Boston/Albany mainline due to the completion and operation of the Selkirk Yard. The diversion of this freight traffic now leaves some doubt about the desire of the Penn-Central to maintain the New Haven line as a high grade facility. Only through public action requiring commuter area improvements and general upgrading programs does there remain a prospect for improved trackage, new welded rail, signal improvements, removal of grade crossings, elimination of curvatures, etc.

The future outlook and continuation of rail service in the New England area will depend upon governmental willingness to guarantee the operation against a loss on the part of the railroads. Due to high loss in its operation, it is a matter of time before passenger service will be reduced drastically or discontinued entirely. The commuter rail service in metropolitan Boston is now subsidized and otherwise would be discontinued. Without some form of assistance, such as subsidy or capital grants, the railroads can be expected to request abandonment of their service in the near future. The challenge, therefore, is how to respond to this need to provide adequate support and funding to revitalize and improve passenger rail service in the Northeast, one of the few prospects for improved transportation service over the next decade for New England travelers.

AN ACTION PROGRAM FOR IMPROVEMENT OF PASSENGER SERVICE IN NEW ENGLAND AREA

Based upon the evidence outlined above, I believe a definite requirement exists for improvement of passenger service to link our major metropolitan areas to New York and the rest of the Northeast Corridor—Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore. With the anticipation of increased air traffic congestions, large delay times in air travel, and increasing problems in the urban areas with urban highway traffic congestion, a clear prospect for improved metropolitan service and intercity service is the continuation and improvement of rail service for commuters and line haul operations.

A vital link exists between the Boston & Maine commuter rail service such as serves the Congressional District 6 and downtown Boston, and its direct connection to the mainline of the Penn-Central New Haven regional service to New York City. This service is vital to the continued prosperity and growth of our progressive New England area. The problems facing the improvement of this service are largely financial. In our race to accommodate the automobile, and take advantage of highspeed intercity service by air, we have neglected our vital network of railroads and allowed their rapid deterioration.

Expenditures for new highways over the next decade will exceed a billion dollars for this area. A new international airport in Connecticut and Massachusetts will require expenditures in excess of a billion dollars, and yet will not be completed in time to meet traffic demands of this decade. Surely, modest investment in improvements in the rail passenger service, both in the roadbed and the equipment are justified.

We can no longer expect the railroad industry, whose annual net profit is less than 2.3% and this amount coming largely from non-transportation operations to continue to subsidize and write-off multi-million dollar losses on passenger service, let alone expect the railroads to make improvements in equipment, trackage and signals, all vital to the continued improvement of this necessary service.

A three-pronged action oriented attack is required to provide a workable solution for the transportation dilemma facing us over this decade. A commitment is required from three levels of government, the federal, state, and metropolitan/local. In light of the requirement for improved passenger service and the deficit ridden operation of the railroads, formation of a Quasi-Public Transportation Authority is warranted and urgently needed to find the solution to this problem. The need for improved passenger service requires a multi-jurisdictional commitment by all of the New England States—Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Vermont. By special act of Congress, a six-state compact would be formed involving participation by the Federal Government, Department of Transportation, and each of the six states to band together for a concerted commitment of improvement of passenger service. By public take over, or long term lease, the compact would acquire the operating assets of the railroads for the purpose of continuing and expanding intercity passenger rail service.

Long term financing for the compact would be arranged and guaranteed through several sources as follows:

1. Sales of revenue bonds guaranteed by the State and municipal authorities affected.

2. Capital grants or long term financing through appropriated funds by State Legislature. For example, precedent has already been set by the State of Connecticut which has appropriated in excess of $20 million for subsidy of the operation of the New Haven Railroad.

3. Capital grants and long term low interest loans from the Federal Government under the Mass Transportation Act or other special appropriations by Act of Congress.

In reference to the third point, it is suggested that funds under the Mass Transportation Act be made available to this compact in recognition that the intercity transportation problem is becoming more and more a problem of providing service within metropolitan areas and the total metropolis in the New England area. Clearly, the distinction between intercity operations and urbanized commuter rail operations are diminishing as urban development and population sprawl continues to develop all available land in the area.

It is estimated that in the neighborhood of $50 million will be required for immediate improvements over the next five years, for new roadbed, signal and elimination of grade crossings over New Haven region roadbed. In addition, $5–10 million will be required for the revitalization and refurbishment of conventional train coaches for improvement of the service. Finally, limited subsidies in the neighborhood of $3–5 million dollars annually will be required initially to maintain operations between Boston and New York. This level of capital investment and subsidization of passenger service operations are warranted. This commitment over the next 5 years would result in improvement in passenger service, reduction in travel times up to an hour between Boston and New York, and should eventually lead to significant increases in ridership on rail passenger equipment.

In conclusion, I recommend immediate action on new legislation:

1. to create a six-state concept for the purpose of operating intercity passenger rail service;

2. for clarification in the pending mass transportation legislation to permit the use of capital grant funds and long term loans for improvements in the metropolitan area portions of the intercity passenger rail service;

3. for legislation to permit the sale of revenue bonds for long term financing of passenger rail service to be underwritten by and guaranteed by Federal, state and local government.

Governor PETERSON. For the nine year period between 1958 and 1967, passenger service in New Hampshire was gradually reduced to the point of elimination. During the last two years of this period, a single round trip daily was operated between Concord, New Hampshire, and Boston, Massachusetts, and a single round trip Monday through Friday was operated between Dover, New Hampshire, and Boston. This last single round trip on each line was provided essentially for commuters, most all of whom traveled daily to their work in Boston and returned.

The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority was created in 1964. Contracts were made with railroads and other transportation agencies to provide passenger service between Massachusetts points and Boston. Rail passenger service has been continued and is being operated to Lowell, Massachusetts, on the line previously serving Concord; to Haverhill, Massachusetts, on the line previously extending to Dover, and to Newburyport, Massachusetts, on that which formerly extended to Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

The 1969 session of the New Hampshire Legislature adopted Joint Resolution No. 62 requesting the Public Utilities Commission to "Examine the action that will be necessary to re-establish rail passenger service between Nashua, Manchester, Concord and Boston, and Dover and Boston, and is authorized, subject to the approval of the Governor and Council to enter into such agreement or arrangements as may be determined appropriate with interested agencies."

The final report concerning this has not been submitted, but it has been found that there is no passenger equipment available at present to provide this service. Such equipment as is available is under contract with the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority, and this Authority is not empowered to enter into agreements or contracts with other states.

It is quite apparent that no restoration of passenger service can be made as an extension of existing service, because there is no overall agency authorized to coordinate the extension of the Massachusetts service into New Hampshire. Service once discontinued is much more expensive to reactivate.

Most students of transportation feel that ultimately rail passenger service will be required from central New Hampshire and from southeastern New Hampshire into the Boston area. This is particularly true when the new high speed service between Boston and New York becomes a reality. One of the greatest factors in competition with rail service is the private automobile operating over express or interstate highways into central and southeastern New Hampshire. Looking toward the future, and with direct connections in the Boston area for high speed service, it is well within the realm of possibility that speeds in excess of 100 miles per hour can be operated north of Boston to provide for facilities required for the expanded population and the phenomenal growth that is being realized in New Hampshire.

To adequately provide for these requirements, we, in New Hampshire, feel that it is absolutely essential to have some agency authorized to cross over the boundary lines of New England, such as the New England Regional Commission or an interstate authority, to adequately plan and authorize or require such action as is necessary to meet the public demands for rail passenger transportation.

Mayor WHITE. Good afternoon. I am Kevin White, mayor of Boston. When Congressman Burke asked me to appear today, I told him that I already had commitments in Boston, but that I would make every effort to be present, because I always support his efforts to help New Englanders.

Jim Burke has long fought for the people of New England. He has fought to make sure that we were not overlooked when Federal funds were allocated. Soon we will have a modern mass transit system serving the areas south of Boston. In no small measure, we in Boston can thank Jim Burke because that system never would have been possible without a Federal commitment of funds.

This afternoon we are looking for another Federal commitment—a commitment to help the people of New England build a modern rail line between New York and Boston. And so that there can be no mistake, let me clearly state that I favor the creation of such a system.

A high-speed ground system betwen New York and Boston. And so that there can be no mistake, let me clearly state that I favor the creation of such a system.

A high-speed ground system between New York and Boston would be the heart of an efficient transportation network for all of New England. Let me outline for you some of the benefits for Boston.

First, a high-speed ground system would dramatically reduce traffic at Boston's Logan Airport. Roughly 40 percent of the passengers at Logan travel between New York and Boston. A study for the New England regional commission estimates that half of these would switch to a fast ground system—resulting in a 20 percent reduction in total Logan passengers. Fewer passengers mean fewer flights, less air pollution from planes, lower noise levels, and less congestion on highways near the airport.

Second, fast, dependable transportation is essential for the continued growth of the new Boston. Even if we built a dozen new airports in Boston, we might not have adequate air transportation to New York because of the severe overcrowding of the New York airports. Planes cannot take off if there is no place for them to land—and a fourth airport for New York has never gotten off the drawing boards. If the flow of commerce between Boston and New York is restricted, the growth of both cities will be retarded.

Third, a rail system would draw over a million passengers a year away from our highways. Highways have become, in many respects, an inner city's worst enemy. Our highways are congested; they contribute to the pollution of our air; they deface the landscape; they destroy homes and buildings; and they consume vast amounts of scarce land. In fact, a highway occupies ten times as much land as a railroad of equal capacity. If we wish to save our inner cities, we must find ways to take pressures off the highway network.

Some observers have argued that we should not build a high-speed rail system at this time—that we should await technological advances such as development of air-cushion vehicles. To them, I answer that we cannot afford to wait. If the Penn Central passenger service is truly in serious financial distress, the cost of waiting could be the loss of all passenger rail service. And the result will be another 600,000 travelers each year dumped onto our already overcrowded highways and airways.

I've briefly outlined for you several reasons why we in Boston need a fast rail service to New York.

Now let me express just two thoughts on how to pay for such a system.

First, I am convinced that this system will be self-supporting in the long run. Just as the New York-Washington service has exceeded expectations, I am sure that a new York-Boston route would be more heavily utilized than we dare estimate at this time. What government must do is provide the spark—invest in the necessary research and development to begin the process. Therefore, I strongly recommend that developmental funds be appropriated immediately to the Federal Railroad Administration to allow engineering and development work to proceed. As soon as firm financial requirements are outlined, the Federal Railroad Administration should be required to submit to Congress a financing plan utilizing to the maximum extent feasible private financial sources. The Federal Government should supply only loan guarantees plus any direct subsidy required during the early years of operation.

Second, I am wary of using for this system resources which are currently set aside for urban mass transit. We should not be robbing the commuter to pay for the intercity traveler. As a nation we can afford to meet the needs of both—and we should.

Thank you.

TEXTRON,
Providence, R.I., March 16, 1970.

HON. ROBERT O. TIERNAN,
Longworth House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR BOB: I regret being unable to personally participate in your recent public meeting on the problems of passenger service. However, as you have requested, the following statement represents the views of the Geo-Transport Foundation of New England of which I am President:

"The provision of high speed intercity ground transportation services in the corridors between Boston, Providence, Rhode Island—central Connecticut and New York, is an objective of established public policy (as evidenced by the Northeast Corridor Demonstration Project and by existing state and federal plans and programs).

"The United States Department of Transportation's East Coast Corridor Program is conceptually and technically sound, but has been seriously hampered north and east of New York by the lack of an adequate mechanism for implementation.

"The present situation calls for an evolutionary approach, starting with an improvement of existing rail intercity passenger services and progressing through several stages of development to the design, construction and operation of an entirely new high speed ground service utilizing the best of the new technologies (such as tracked air cushion vehicles or gravity vacuum tubes).

"The implementation of any plans of this magnitude will require the active support and cooperation of local, state and federal governments and of private industry. However, no organizational mechanism presently exists for establishing this essential cooperation and implementing the resulting service.

"There exists a demand for high speed passenger transport over shorter route segments (such as Hartford to New York, and Providence to New York) where highways are congested and good air service is expensive to support and difficult to provide. Further, the Boston-New York market is growing so fast there is need right now for a good high-speed ground transport system to supplement air and highway facilities, these being areas where future major increases in capacity will be difficult and costly to achieve."

Studies indicate that with modest local, state, and federal assistance it would be possible to create and maintain an attractive useful intercity high speed passenger transport service on a self-supporting basis in the Boston-New York corridors, both for an ultimate new-technology high speed service and for an interim fast railroad service.

The Geo-Transport Foundation of New England was formed with the specific task of setting up a new agency which can:

(i) Take over and operate intercity railroad passenger services.

(ii) Design, build and operate a new-technology high-speed ground passenger transport system.

(iii) Effectively blend public and private capital in the conduct of these tasks.

(iv) Be eligible to receive grants from local, state and federal transportation assistance programs.

The Geo-Transport Foundation of New England (GTF) was incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts in February 1969 as a not-for-profit organization concerned with the evolutionary development and implementation of high speed intercity ground transport in New England. It is intended to be a regional organization in nature, supported by New England industry and government, and therefore responsive to local interests and concerns.

GEO-TRANSPORT FOUNDATION OBJECTIVES

The GTF is intended as a transitional organization which will bridge the gap between an informal study group and the creation of a new, permanent agency which can actually finance, acquire, build and operate interstate high speed ground passenger transport systems. GTF has as its principal task the creation of this new agency and getting it set up and in business. The following objectives are the basis of the Foundation's future plans and programs:

(a) The principal objective is the design, construction and operation of a new high speed ground transportation system in New England, based upon utilization of the best of the new transport technologies.

(b) It is estimated completion of the new technology routes will require between 15 and 20 years. During this period it is planned to design and operate modern, fast railroad intercity passenger services based on the use of existing railroad tracks and facilities (but with some improvements), and new equipment.

(c) A secondary objective is to develop a means for blending public and private investment in a manner which will preserve the advantages of each.

(d) The third objective is to fill an existing void by providing an organizational instrument which can effectively carry out the implementation of plans for the design, construction and operation of interstate, intercity passenger services. Service will be restricted to the handling of passengers and their baggage, priority mail, and of priority parcel-express packages.

Sincerely.

G. WILLIAM MILLER.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION ON POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. ARENDS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon President Nixon in a very forthright and firm speech on television and radio, set forth his views on the present postal strike. He did not equivocate or mince words. He spoke as I feel the citizens of this Nation wanted him to speak. He clearly stated the facts of the issue so all might understand. He gave assurance that all issues were negotiable after the postal workers have returned to work. It was necessary to send into the New York post office the needed military personnel that the all-important mail shall continue to move. They dare not be in defiance of the law of the land regardless of what the grievances of any group might be. I salute the loyal, patriotic workers who remained at their posts of duty. My hat is off to them.

I am including with my remarks: First, the President's declaration of a national emergency; second, his Executive order; and third, his complete remarks on the issues involved.

I most heartily support and endorse the President's action.

DECLARING A NATIONAL EMERGENCY

(By the President of the United States of America)

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas certain employees of the Postal Service are engaged in an unlawful work stoppage which has prevented the delivery of the mails and the discharge of other postal functions in various parts of the United States; and

Whereas, as a result of such unlawful work stoppage the performance of critical governmental and private functions, such as the processing of men into the Armed Forces of the United States, the transmission of tax refunds and the receipt of tax collections, the transmission of Social Security and welfare payments, and the conduct of numerous and important commercial transactions, has wholly ceased or is seriously impeded; and

Whereas the continuance of such work stoppage with its attendant consequences will impair the ability of this nation to carry out its obligations abroad, and will cripple or halt the official and commercial intercourse which is essential to the conduct oi its domestic business:

Now, therefore, I, Richard Nixon, President of the United States of America, pursuant to the powers vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States and more particularly by the provisions of Section 673 of Title 10 of the United States Code, do hereby declare a state of national emergency, and direct the Secretary of Defense to take such action as he deems necessary to carry out the provisions of the said Section 673 in order that the laws of the United States pertaining to the Post Office Department may be executed in accordance with their terms.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-third day of March in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and seventy, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and ninety-fourth.

RICHARD NIXON.

EXECUTIVE ORDER—CALLING INTO SERVICE MEMBERS AND UNITS OF THE NATIONAL GUARD

Whereas certain employees of the Postal Service are engaged in an unlawful work stoppage which has prevented the delivery of the mails and the discharge of other postal functions in various parts of the United States; and

Whereas the laws of the United States, including Sections 707, 5102, 6001, and 6101 of Title 39, United States Code require that the business of the Post Office Department, including the expeditious processing and delivery of the mail, be regularly carried on; and

Whereas the aforesaid unlawful work stoppage has prevented and is preventing the execution of the aforesaid laws relating to the Post Office Department; and

Whereas the breakdown of the postal service in the numerous areas affected by the said unlawful work stoppage is a matter of grave national concern; and

Whereas I am charged by the Constitution of the United States to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and I have determined that I am unable solely with the regular forces to cause the aforesaid laws to be executed:

Now, therefore, I, Richard Nixon, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including Sections 3500 and 8500 of Title 10 of the United States Code and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, do hereby order as follows:

Section 1. The Secretary of Defense is authorized and directed to take all appropriate steps to respond to requests of the Postmaster General for assistance in restoring and maintaining Postal service and to executive the Postal laws of the United States.

Section 2. In furtherance of the authorization and direction contained in section 1 hereof, the Secretary of Defense is authorized to use such of the Armed Forces of the United States as he may deem necessary.

Section 3. I hereby authorize and direct the Secretary of Defense to call into the active military service of the United States, as he may deem appropriate to carry out the purposes of this order, any or all of the units of the Army National Guard and of the Air National Guard that he deems appropriate to serve in the active military service of the United States for an indefinite period and until relieved by appropriate orders. In carrying out the provisions of this order, the Secretary of Defense is authorized to use the units, and members thereof, of the Army National Guard and of the Air National Guard called into the active military service of the United States pursuant to this section.

Section 4. The Secretary of Defense is authorized to delegate within the Department of Defense any of the authority conferred upon him by this Executive Order.

RICHARD NIXON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 23, 1970.

THE WHITE HOUSE.

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDENT IN THE TELEVISION AND RADIO ADDRESS REGARDING THE POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE

My fellow Americans: I want to report to you on developments in the postal work stoppage and on the actions I have decided to take.

First, the overwhelming majority of postal workers across the nation remain on their jobs—upholding their tradition, and their oath, to support the Constitution of the United States.

Second, in many communities where walkouts occurred last week, postal employees are returning to their jobs.

However, in several large cities, the post offices are shut down. In New York, for example, the mail system is wholly paralyzed by the illegal walkouts; and essential services have been halted.

Last Saturday, I pledged to the nation that, if the current situation existed on Monday—today—I would take action to fulfill my constitutional obligation to move the mails and I am taking that action now.

Injunctions have been sought, and in most cases already granted, forbidding striking postal workers from interferring with those who wish to return to work.

I directed the Attorney General to take whatever action he believes necessary to see that these court orders are obeyed, and working with local authorities, to see that no illegal picket lines interfere with workers returning to work.

Secondly, I have just now directed the activation of the men of the various military organizations to begin in New York the resortation of essential mail services. New York City is where the current illegal stoppages begin; it is where the mail has been halted the longest; it is where the resultant problems have become most acute. If the Postmaster General deems it necessary to act in other affected major cities, I will not hesitate to do so.

These replacements are being sent in as a supplemental work force to maintain essential services. Only as many workers as are necessary to accomplish that will be used and they will be withdrawn as the striking postal workers return to their jobs.

Let me now address my comments to both the postal workers who have stayed on the job—and those who are engaging in the work stoppage.

The United States Postal System is a vital element of our entire communications system. The poor depend heavily upon it for medical services and also for Government assistance. Veterans depend upon it for their compensation checks. The elderly depend upon it for their Social Security checks. The nation's businesses depend upon it as a way to stay in business so they can meet their payrolls and our men in Vietnam depend upon "mail call" as their only link with their loved ones at home.

From the time I came to Congress 23 years ago, I have recognized that the hundreds of thousands of fine Americans in the mail service—the Post Office Department—are underpaid and they have other legitimate grievances.

For the past year, almost since the day we took office, both the Postmaster General and I have been working to alleviate not only the legitimate grievances of postal workers but to move to eliminate the source of those grievances—that is, the obsolete postal system itself, a system that no longer serves its employees, its customers or the country as it should.

That was why that among our first legislative proposals was wholesale reform of the United States Post Office. Included have been requests for increased pay for postal workers, for increased benefits, for compression by 60 percent of the time it takes a worker to move from the bottom to the top of the pay scale.

I believe that if that postal reform had become law we wouldn't have the current crisis. But that crisis is here and it has brought additional grievances to the fore. The country has recognized these inequities in postal pay and benefits.

This Administration has always been willing to work them out. As the Secretary of Labor and postal union leaders indicated again Saturday, we stand ready to begin negotiations, discussions on all issues including pay immediately after postal workers are back on their jobs. But we cannot and we will not negotiate while thousands of postal workers are participating in an illegal work stoppage.

At this time, it is only those who have struck and are staying off the job who are preventing meaningful negotiations and resolution of their problems through those negotiations and the legislative process.

And so I urge you to return to your jobs so that these negotiations can begin with an urgent but reasonable climate.

Just as this issue goes beyond the question of mail service, so my remarks at this time are addressed to all Americans. What has occurred here is that some employees of the Federal Government are now not only going against the best interests and the best tradition of their service, but against the recommendations of their national union leader, against the oath of office that they took, against orders handed down by the Federal Courts and they are cutting off service essential to thousands, millions of Americans.

What is at issue then is the survival of a government based upon law. Essential services must be maintained and, as President, I shall meet my Constitutional responsibility to see that those services are maintained.

And I am asking for the understanding and support of every American in this decision that I have made in behalf of our country.

THE POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. ZABLOCKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of our esteemed colleague, the gentleman from Montana, a ranking member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

This House has favorably acted upon comparability measures four times. H.R. 13000 was approved by the House on October 14, 1969 by the overwhelming vote of 311 to 51. There is no excuse why the legislative branch has not completed action on this measure. It should have been sent to the President for further consideration months ago.

Understandably the patience of the postal workers, including those of Milwaukee, has worn thin. I regret, however, that they have resorted to the unprecedented illegal action of a "wildcat" strike against the Government. I sincerely hope that the plea of the officers of the National Association of Letter Carriers urging the striking postal employees to return to work will be heeded. They have made their point emphatically, albeit illegally. As they return to work Congress must act immediately on the pending pay raise legislation, H.R. 13000 to rectify an inequity perpetrated on the postal employees.

Mr. Speaker, regardless of prior plans to recess for the Easter holidays, I believe the Congress should stay in session until legislative action has been completed on the postal pay raise bill.

Mr. OLSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. OLSEN. Mr. Speaker, I think the fact must be reiterated again that we have the word of the gentleman from the other body, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, that the President has threatened he would veto the lesser bill, H.R. 13000, and for that reason the gentleman in the other body will not go to conference with the House. H.R. 13000, which was passed by this House in cooler days and with cooler heads, last October 18, would be effective. At any time, with the kind of strike we have the thing to do is to try to settle it.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I also certainly agree that we have a responsibility in the legislative branch of the Government. I would join the gentleman in urging that Congress send the bill to the President with no further delay. I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Post Office in the other body would call the chairman of the House committee within the next few minutes, arrange a meeting forthwith, and arrive at a compromise so they can report this bill out and send it to the President. If the President wants to veto it, let him take that responsibility.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION ON POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. DUNCAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the President of the United States for his leadership and his forthright action regarding the unlawful work stoppage of certain employees of the Postal Department.

The President recognized his constitutional obligation. He also recognized the necessity of the continuous expeditious operation of this vital element of our entire communication system.

His statement, together with his declaration of emergency and the Executive order were the actions of a diligent and courageous President.

PRESIDENT'S ACTION ON POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. LATTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I support the action that the President took this afternoon and in so doing would respectfully urge all postal employees to return to their jobs which will make the use of Federal troops unnecessary. We all realize that this is an unprecedented action but a necessary action on the part of the President.

The mails have to move, and they have to move now. We would hope that these individuals—and there is a small majority of them now out—would return to their jobs before those troops arrive.

POSSIBLE POSTPONEMENT OF EASTER RECESS

(Mr. ALBERT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, while I have not been able to discuss this matter with the distinguished minority leader, I think the Members of the House should be aware that the emergency of considerable proportions which has developed this week may cause a postponement or a delay in commencement of the Easter recess.

I believe the Members should be so advised.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, does the majority leader have any way of knowing at what time in the future he might be able to be more specific concerning the adjournment for Easter?

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman knows, this is a matter over which no one has any real control, but we will advise the Members just as soon as we have facts that might enable them to govern themselves accordingly.

Mr. RHODES. If the gentleman will yield further, is it the feeling of the gentleman that there will be a recess for Easter at some time, and of uncertain duration?

Mr. ALBERT. I would state to the gentleman from Arizona that the entire recess may be possible; it depends on events. I wish I could say that the problem will be resolved by Thursday night so that we can recess on schedule, because nothing would suit me better. I hope that it is possible, and if it is possible we will recess in accordance with the previously announced schedule. If it is not possible to resolve this matter at any time between now and Monday, and it is resolved at that time, then we will recess at that time for such time as we may be able to take off.

I have just been advised by the distinguished leader of the other body, Mr. MANSFIELD, that they have only 2 days of recess scheduled, and that they will forgo that recess if necessary.

POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. PUCINSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the distinguished majority leader for suggesting we may have to bypass the Easter recess to deal with the problem that, of course, confronts the whole country. We would be foolish to even consider a recess if this crisis is not resolved by week's end. But I must say that it is indeed a sad and dismal day for America when the President of the United States has to call out the troops to keep the mail moving in New York. I regret that the President had not first made an effort to call on the chairman of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and on the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Post Office and Civil Service in an effort to see whether or not the impasse which has held up the pay raise for postal workers—a pay raise that has been approved by this Chamber back in October, and approved by the Senate in December, could be resolved by legislative action. It has been held up because the President had threatened to veto it. The President has developed a habit of threatening vetoes. He used a veto on the education bill, and he threatened to use the veto on the only decent mine safety bill that was ever passed by the Congress, and now he threatens to veto a pay raise for the postal workers who are getting less in Chicago than a dishwasher in a restaurant.

Mr. Speaker, these postal workers have had it. They have seen the House of Representatives pass a bill by a substantial majority for a pay raise last October. And then they see the President delaying and delaying, and holding the pay raise as a hostage for postal reform.

Again I say this is a sad day for America when there is no leadership coming out of the White House to solve this problem.

Thankfully, I have reason to believe the Chicago postal employees will go back to work tomorrow, and no military threat will be needed to get them back. Late this afternoon, Henry Zych, president of the Chicago Letter Carriers, urged his men to return to work. We cannot let these men down by any further delays in their pay boost.

THE POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. LOWENSTEIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. I also want to say that I think Congress should abandon the idea of recessing this week if this crisis has not been resolved. The President in my judgment has played a peculiarly cynical and dangerous kind of politics with the post office workers, and the primary responsibility for getting us into this mess is plainly his. But the Congress is far from blameless—especially the Senate, which seems to have allowed one or two men to stymie its capacity to function on these matters while so many crucial months have passed.

But alloting blame for the failures of the past is not the point now. The point is that we are faced with a totally needless national calamity. Dedicated public workers are on strike against the Government they have served loyally for decades, and the people of the country are suffering multiplying inconveniences which cannot be allowed to continue—and which will soon seem minor if we do not deal with this situation properly and swiftly. The President ought to move at once to end the strike by ending its causes. He could do that simply and swiftly. There is nothing unreasonable in the demands of the postal workers—we all know that.

But if the President will not lead in this spirit and in this direction, Congress will have to. To start with, we should pass H.R. 13000—finally, immediately, now. If the President vetoes it, we must then override his veto, or at any rate find out who besides the President is willing to deny simple minimum justice to millions of Americans.

Surely it is clear how much it would help at this point for the Government to show some degree of good faith to the postal workers after so many years of broken promises and buck-passing. And before anyone says we should not now start to undo long-standing injustices because a strike constitutes blackmail, let us remember that the House adopted H.R. 13000 by an overwhelming vote last October—on its merits. The Senate passed a somewhat similar bill not long after that—on its merits. Is it not awkward to accuse someone of blackmail for asking what you have long since said is rightfully his? The blackmail, if "blackmail" is an issue, lies with those who would deny—who have denied—the postal workers their due in hope of extracting support for other legislative proposals—as if a man's right to fair wages in the Federal employ is dependent on how he, or rather someone else, resolves other issues.

People employed by the U.S. Government do not like being paid starvation wages any better than anyone else likes to be paid starvation wages. I hope most of us here are ashamed that the Government of the most enlightened and wealthiest Nation on earth pays such wages. I do not like illegal strikes. Neither do those who are on strike. Neither do I like the public to suffer massive dislocation because their Government cannot find an orderly way to do what literally everyone concerned knows it ought to have done long ago. None of these terrible things needed to happen, which makes the whole situation even sadder and more absurd.

Under these circumstances, I cannot believe the President will fail to act immediately to correct the worst of the injustices that afflict the postal workers. Once he starts to do that, there will be time to work out other problems. Meanwhile, no matter how eager we may be to get away from each other, it seems to me that we have no business going on a recess until there is a resolution of this situation that guarantees people their mail and guarantees people working in the post office some minimal form of justice.

POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. SCOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman from Illinois, I believe we realize that both bodies of the Congress are controlled by the Democratic Party and it must assume a part of the blame.

I agree with the distinguished gentleman that the President did threaten a veto. But a pay raise in different forms has passed both bodies, and if the Democratic leadership wanted this bill passed by the Congress, they could have had a conference between the two bodies. I think it is wrong to lay the entire responsibility at the White House without the Democratic leadership assuming a portion of the blame. So I would disagree with the distinguished gentleman when he places the entire blame at the steps of the White House. Our responsibility today is to cooperate with the President in attempting to resolve the present dilemma. It transcends party loyalty and it would seem to be contrary to the best interest of the country to attempt to obtain political mileage out of the illegal strike now in progress.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was appalled to hear the gentleman from Illinois assert that this House, a coequal branch of the Government, is cowardly and acts only because of a threat from the executive branch. I will not accept that as a Member of this body. The gentleman from Illinois may speak for himself, but he does not speak for me.

POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the gentleman from Virginia chose to make this a direct partisan issue by his assertion that the Democrats were responsible in some way for holding this up. The gentleman and I both serve on the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, and he may remember that less than 10 days ago he, a Republican, and I, a Democrat, voted the same way against what we both, I assume, believed at that time was a blackjack effort by President Nixon trying to blackmail us into accepting his postal corporation as a condition of doing anything for postal employees, or for that matter, all of the Government employees in the form of pay raise legislation.

That goes beyond the simple threat of a veto and goes to the actual intervention by the President, using direct force and coercion, of all kinds that are available to him as a President within his political party and within the use of that office—offering rewards or threats of reprisal against those people who would not cooperate in trying to accomplish his overall aim of creating a postal corporation to replace the postal service.

POSTAL REFORM

(Mr. SAYLOR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, it has been most interesting to listen to the colloquies that have occurred here on the floor in the last few minutes.

Some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle apparently have short memories. I wonder if they ever heard of Lawrence F. O'Brien, the former Postmaster General, who widely proclaimed the need for postal reform and who has been serving as cochairman of the Citizens Committee for Postal Reform with headquarters here in Washington. Even his former executive assistant in the Post Office Department—Claude J. Desautels—is executive director of the group now pushing for the Corporation plan.

I have yet to see one word from Mr. O'Brien, the current Democratic National Chairman, denouncing what he proposed when he was Postmaster General and has been "plugging" ever since he left office.

Let us not put the blame at the steps of the White House today, and this administration, but start looking a little in your own backyard.

SENATORS MOVE TO REGAIN WARMAKING POWERS

(Mr. GUDE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the body of the RECORD and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. GUDE. Mr. Speaker, in an interview in the Christian Science Monitor on March 2, 1970, our former colleague, Mr. MATHIAS of Maryland, discussed his resolution to repeal four resolutions passed by previous Congresses to authorize the President to commit American troops to the defense of foreign states. Because of the great interest in this proposal in the Congress and the Nation, I commend Mr. MATHIAS' explanatory remarks to the attention of my colleagues.

The resolution would repeal the resolutions pertaining to Formosa, Lebanon, Cuba, and the Tonkin Gulf, in order to clear the books of stale authorizations and allow for a fresh look by Congress at our international defense commitments. I am a cosponsor of legislation to repeal the Gulf of Tonkin resolution effective December 31, 1970, because I agree with Mr. MATHIAS' observations on the dangers of open-ended delegations of authority to commit American troops to foreign wars and the abdication of responsibility by Congress for the waging of war and peace. In addition, I concur in his judgment that our military presence in Laos should not be intensified without consultation between the Congress and the Executive. He concludes by pointing out that Congress cannot guide domestic policy in America so long as decisions on foreign commitments are regarded as the exclusive preserve of the Executive. Our resources do not permit us to make decisions on either domestic priorities or foreign policies without considering the other.

The interview follows:

SENATORS MOVE TO REGAIN WARMAKING POWERS

(By Godfrey Sperling, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—A significant move is gaining ground in the Senate that would limit the power of the executive in making military commitments abroad.

Leading in this effort is Maryland's new Republican Sen. Charles McC. Mathias Jr., whose Mathias resolution would, in his words, "recover" these powers of military commitments from the President and "restore them to Congress."

The Senate wants any further military escalation in the world, such as that which possibly lies ahead in Laos, first to be approved by Congress.

He would like to see terminal dates of a year or 18 months put on any future delegations of such power to a president—"so that we don't have what amounts to an open-ended delegation of power to the President which the Constitution vests in the Congress."

In a taped interview with The Christian Science Monitor the Senator:

Underscored danger signs of a U.S. military commitment in Laos. He warned that "when our troops are cheek and jowl with local troops who may be engaged in fighting, it is almost inconceivable that we won't be drawn into some of it."

Said that there is significant bipartisan leadership support for his amendment and that, with administration backing, the resolution could become law.

The interview follows:

Just how are you progressing, Senator, in your effort to limit the power of the executive in making military commitments abroad—where are you?

The resolution which I offered in the Senate now has been presented to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. I was very much pleased and very much honored when Senator Mansfield offered to sit next to me at the witness table before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

I have had very interesting assurances from a number of members of the Senate who for one reason or another didn't want to cosponsor the resolution but are very much interested in it. Some of them would like to see a word changed here or a comma placed in a different place, or a stylistic change. But the main thrust of the resolution seems to appeal to a great many members of the Senate.

Briefly, the resolution says what?

The resolution has several aspects. One is to, as we have said, clear away the debris of the cold war.

It repeals the four cold-war resolutions which were passed by both the House and the Senate and by the then-President. These are:

The Formosa resolutions of 1955 which authorize the President to commit American forces to the defense of the China Strait area.

The Lebanon resolution of 1957, which authorizes the President to admit forces, and I quote, "in accordance with the Constitution" for the defense of any country in the Middle East and again I quote "which is threatened by a Communist-controlled country"—phrases that are obviously out of tune with the '70's.

The Cuba resolution of 1962 which deals with the export of communism from Cuba.

And the Tonkin Gulf resolution, which has, of course, been the most effective of all of these resolutions, inasmuch as Lyndon Johnson again and again in my presence used it as the basis for the orders he was giving to troops in Vietnam.

The resolution further deals with the limitation or the termination of the Korean war emergency which has existed since 1950 when it was proclaimed by President Truman and which immediately brought into being a wide range of presidential emergency powers, none of which have been allowed to lapse for the last 20 years and which are a catalog of the executive authority that certainly should be reviewed after a 20-year period of exercise by the president.

But you want more than review, Senator. Don't you really want these powers restored to Congress?

I want these powers recovered by the Congress and, if there is a current need to regrant these powers, to redelegate them to the President for the current world situation then I am perfectly willing to consider that we should give them back to the President. But when we do it again, I would make one very vast change from what was done in the past, and that is, I would put in a terminal date:

That we will grant to the President authority to do such and such for one year, or a period of 18 months, or whatever the appropriate time is—so that you don't have what amounts to an open-ended delegation of power to the President which the Constitution vests in the Congress.

Does the present administration support you in this? Isn't this in line with the President's Guam doctrine?

Well, I feel very strongly that the administration should support this measure, that it is an opportunity to clear the slate, that it is an opportunity for President Nixon to enunciate a Nixon doctrine in crystal-clear terms.

Yes, it is consistent with what the President said at Guam and again at Manila—the fact that we are not going to have an Asian policy which ignores commitments but at the same time we're not going to have one which involves the commitment of troops.

It should then be in line really with the mood of the administration?

It's entirely in line with the mood of the administration, and it has a particularly significant value to the administration at this moment in history because you have Senator Mansfield, the majority leader of the Senate, who cosponsored it; you have Senator Fulbright, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who has made favorable comments on it; you have a wide range of congressional support for it.

Thus, at this moment, a Republican administration can get the help of the Democratic leaders of Congress in an enunciation of the administration's policy. There hasn't been a moment in history like this, I don't believe, since Vandenberg and other Republicans joined together to support Truman in the adoption of the Marshall Plan, essentially setting the framework for foreign policy which existed from that time to this.

Now this is a watershed of history. I think the President would be very well advised to seize this opportunity to bring the whole government together . . . both parties, both branches, in a foreign-policy statement which I think could give the set to American foreign policy for the next decade, maybe far longer.

Looking at the Far East, and specifically at Laos, is there any possibility that there might be some incident there that might cause the American Government now to escalate our military commitment. Does the Tonkin Gulf provision apply there?

Well, this brings me to the other portions of the resolution. I believe that the Tonkin Gulf resolution might be utilized by an aggressive president as at least the color of law for committting troops in Laos or Thailand.

The language, as I recall it, refers to Southeast Asia, which is a big territory.

Now my resolution specifically gives congressional approval to the President's plan for the withdrawal of American troops from the area. And I think that if the Congress spoke in those terms, it would clearly be indicating a lack of assent to expanding the theater of operations in Southeast Asia.

The resolution further provides for congressional encouragement of a broader-based government in Saigon and for the President to invite other nations of the world to join in a multilateral plan of reconstruction in Southeast Asia and for the recruitment of an international peace-keeping force, preferably of Asian character, which would be there to help keep the peace after the departure of American troops, to prevent reprisals by North against South or South against North.

Now all of these bear on the stability of the whole Southeast Asian area once the shooting stops and the Americans leave. Again I think that it could help to stabilize the situation. It would make American intentions clear.

Is there any indication from anyone in the administration that there is support for your resolution?

Well, there are very interesting signs. The State Department, as you know, has sent down categorical letters of disapproval of every other resolution in this area. They have just simply said, "We are opposed." They have sent a letter to Senator Fulbright with respect to the Mathias-Mansfield resolution saying, "We're studying it: we are continuing to study it; we are going to be continuing to study it." So it is obviously not one of those they are dismissing out of hand as they have others.

You have also talked to Mr. Kissinger, haven't you?

I have talked to Henry Kissinger and talked to the State Department at great length on several occasions. They are extremely interested. They are extremely cautious . . . cautious, I think, from both a domestic and a foreign point of view.

I view this primarily as a domestic reordering of our affairs to bring the conduct of our foreign policy and our military policy back into the constitutional framework and thereby to lessen the chance of our accidental commitment abroad.

They fear that some foreign nation might read into this an isolationist trend, which I don't think should be read into it. That is one of the fears they have expressed.

Do you suppose the administration has some anxieties about the difficulties it might have in dealing with Laos and perhaps Thailand if this resolution were passed?

What it would mean is this: that the Constitution would have to be observed, and there would have to be some consultation with Congress. That's what it would mean, what it is intended to mean. And I think that's what the President has clearly indicated he is willing to do. This is the Nixon doctrine.

Do you see any present entanglement in Laos?

The reports I get, the information I get is that we have very large numbers of troops there. The fact that we have troops on the ground there—this is the very point of the whole thing: that when we have troops on the ground there, that when there are battles raging there and that when our troops are cheek by jowl with local troops who may be engaged in fighting, it is almost inconceivable that we won't be drawn into some of it or some phase of this. And once the first shot is fired who knows where the end of it will be?

Are you sure we aren't drawn into it already?

I think the only honest answer to that would be the question of degree.

Yes, I see. But at some point if the military commitment would really be escalated it would be quite possible now for the President to do this under the Tonkin Gulf resolution—isn't that right?

Yes, the Tonkin Gulf resolution, I think, gives a very broad grant of power to the President; and it is a grant of power which, of course, Lyndon Johnson had every intention and actually did exercise to the fullest extent of every word that was written in it.

Yes, but very specifically, if there would be any new commitment in Laos, you would like to have the President first go to the Congress for permission?

I think the American people deserve that as a very minimum. I think there should be consultation with the Congress as to whether the Congress and beyond the Congress, the American people, will support an extension of foreign policy in the military activity in a new theater of war.

Wouldn't your resolution actually handcuff the President in Vietnam? Wouldn't it also perhaps hurt him at the negotiating table? If Hanoi knew that all of a sudden the President could not escalate without going to Congress to get new permission, wouldn't this be a handicap to the President?

The administration has said frequently that its policy of withdrawal is irreversible. I believe it. I think it is irreversible. I think Hanoi thinks it is irreversible. I don't think that Congress saying it again is going to make it either more or less irreversible. I think it just is.

Wouldn't the more logical phase line and moment for the passage of a resolution such as you suggest . . . wouldn't that come at a time when we have withdrawn most of our troops from the enemy area?

On the contrary, I think one of the serious blocks to negotiations is the question on the part of Hanoi as to what our real intentions are. I think if we said the Congress and the President both agree on the gradual withdrawal of American troops; if we state it as national policy that we are going to have the intervention of an international peace-keeping force, if we are going to talk about the reconstruction of Asia under multilateral auspices—then all of these things would encourage rather than discourage the success of the negotiations in Paris.

What do you see in this next decade, Senator? Will it be one in which the national commitment will be based mainly on domestic problems and much less on military commitments abroad?

As we go through the next few months and years—and I think it is going to be clear that the first line of defense of America is in America—that we will recognize that the children we are educating today and the sick we are healing today and the jobs we are creating and training people for today are all the real strength, the real future, and the real hope of America. And so I think that in a very real sense we will be turning inward.

It's a curious thing about American history that we have had the greatest influence in the world when we have been performing well as a nation, not as the world policeman, not as a world evangelist, but as an example—showing what a free society, a dynamic society, and a pluralistic society can do.

And I think that in this sense we can look forward to a renaissance of enormous prestige and influence in the world by improving the conditions within our own borders which are so desperately out of kilter right now.

POSTAL PAY AND POSTAL REFORM

(Mr. UDALL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, a lot has been said here about the postal strike, and I suppose if we are going to start assessing the blame for the situation in which we find ourselves there will be enough blame to go around. But there is one lesson out of all this that is clear to me: Whether the solution is a postal corporation, a postal authority, or the present Post Office Department, the old annual congressional pay-fight system of fixing pay just will not do. It will not do. It is not adequate. We will have crisis after crisis and injustice to all concerned until we get a better system.

The bill that the House reported last October established a salary commission on which the employee organizations were represented. This commission would have had the authority to meet annually and determine precisely what comparability adjustments are necessary, and to recommend an adjustment every January. Under that bill we would have had the first installment last January. The postal reform bill which the House committee reported on March 12 has a similar provision, which would permit the employees, at long last, not to come hat in hand to the Congress, and to be at the mercy of budget considerations and inflation, but to demand and negotiate comparability every year plus the absolute right to take their grievances to binding arbitration if they could not get their just deserts at the hands of the postal authority.

Let us learn one lesson out of all of this. Some better regular, orderly way must be found to give justice to the postal employees because they have some legitimate grievances.

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. I cannot understand the statements of the gentleman that the reform corporation would be a cure-all. The only thing I can see in the reform proposal is the opportunity for some people in this country to gain control of about $6 billion in cash which they will be able to filter around the Nation among lending institutions, and which will prove to be very profitable to the lending institutions at the high rates at which money is now loaned.

Mr. UDALL. There are many sincere people who feel that a postal authority would be a big mistake. I happen to think it is the kind of reform that will give both better postal service to our people and justice to postal employees. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion. But I think whatever we do, we must have a better system for resolving postal pay disputes and for giving the employees the kind of regular adjustments to which they are entitled.

POSTAL PAY AND POSTAL REFORM

(Mr. KLUCZYNSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLUCZYNSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I thank my colleague. The gentleman from Arizona has put his finger squarely on this issue. The colloquy just had with the gentleman from Massachusetts clearly indicates how complex the problem of the postal corporation is. It is not going to be resolved in the next 48 or 72 hours. The committees, both in the House and in the Senate, have labored on this whole proposal for postal reform, but the fact of the issue is—and you cannot deny it—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania can make all the speeches he wants to about Larry O'Brien—the President has held the postal pay raise as a hostage for his postal reform bill.

Now, he did not do that in the case of military pay increases. He has not done it in any other case. We have pay raises coming before this Congress, and we treat them all separately. But in this particular instance, postal employees were not so treated. Postal employees in Chicago earn less than dishwashers and are being told, "You just sit tight and wait. You are not going to get the pay raise the House and the Senate have voted until the House and the Senate is willing to give the White House, lock, stock, and barrel, the kind of postal reform the White House wants."

I say to you that all over this country citizens are now becoming aware of what this is all about. Last week, when we met with people in Chicago, they had no idea that the House had already acted on a pay raise and that the Senate had acted on a pay raise, and that the only reason the President had not signed the pay raise into law is because he said, "Do not bother sending it up. I am going to veto it unless it includes postal reform."

You can talk about the separation of powers all you want but there must be cooperation between the executive and the legislative if we are to get legislation through. I believe President Nixon errs when he insists on treating postal pay increase and postal reform as one issue. I hope we can get the House and the Senate to move on the postal pay raise and send it to the President. I said earlier today, Congress must execute its responsibility by sending the bill to the President. If he wants to veto, that is his responsibility.

But the fact of the matter is, these postal workers would have had the pay raise in their envelopes long ago if the President had not threatened the veto.

POSTAL PAY RAISE

(Mr GROSS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, this is the third time I have heard the same statement made by the same gentleman on the floor of the House today. I do not know how many times the gentleman has been recognized on his own for a 1-minute speech, and at least twice today someone has gotten time for him under the 1-minute rule. The gentleman from Illinois can slice it as thick or as thin as he wants to and the fact remains that his side of the aisle had the votes in the last session of Congress and in this session of Congress, regardless of any threat of the President, to bring forth the bill—H.R. 13000—in some form.

If the gentleman wants to continue to play his tune of blaming the President, let us get the facts straight. The gentleman and his Democrat colleagues have had the votes for months to bring out the bill—H.R. 13000—irrespective of what President Nixon wanted.

Bring the bill out and let us see what he will do with it, but do not blame the President for no action on H.R. 13000. The gentleman knows and every Member of the House knows that a President—any President—cannot veto a bill until and unless both Houses of Congress pass it and send it to him.

TRIBUTE TO RABBI JOSEPH GITIN OF TEMPLE EMANU-EL, SAN JOSE, CALIF.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. GUBSER) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time so I may, with my colleague, the Honorable DON EDWARDS, pay tribute to a great spiritual and community leader in the county of Santa Clara, Calif., which we both represent. I refer to Rabbi Joseph Gitin of Temple Emanu-El in San Jose, Calif.

On April 5, Rabbi Gitin will be honored with a testimonial dinner in San Jose when his friends of the San Francisco Bay area will join in expressing their esteem for all the years of unselfish service he has rendered to mankind.

Rabbi Gitin's background and education superbly qualified him for his life of service to humanity. He received his bachelor's degree at the University of Cincinnati and later received a degree of bachelor of Hebrew literature at Hebrew Union College. In 1932 he was ordained a rabbi at the same college.

Then he occupied pulpits in Buffalo, N.Y.; Butte, Mont.; Berkeley, Calif.; Stockton, Calif.; and finally San Jose.

He has served as director of the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation at the Universities of North Carolina, Duke, and California. He is a member of the Central Conference of American Rabbis and a former lecturer at the College of the Pacific in Stockton. In 1960 he served as president of the Board of Rabbis of Northern California and later as president of the Western Association of Reform Rabbis. He holds the degree of doctor of divinity from the Jewish Institute of Religion, Hebrew Union College.

His fine professional and educational background has been utilized in the fullest sense in his service to our community.

At this time, I take pleasure in yielding to my colleague, Congressman EDWARDS, who will relate some of Rabbi Gitin's outstanding contributions and service to the area which we both represent.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that my distinguished colleague from California (Mr. GUBSER) took this time today to bring the attention of the House of Rep-representatives to the life and career of Rabbi Joseph Gitin.

Some men take much from their community and give little in return. Other men give much and take little for themselves. The Rabbi Joseph Gitin, of San Jose's Temple Emanu-El is the latter sort. Rabbi Gitin will soon be celebrating the 20th anniversary of his rabbinate in one of the oldest synagogues on the west coast. This coming Sunday, April 6, members of his congregation, friends and civic leaders will give him a testimonial dinner in recognition of nearly one-third of a lifetime devoted, as a close associate of his recently said to be "24-hour-concern" for his community and its members, particularly those who suffer.

His concern has been shown and has made itself felt in many ways. He has been an untiring workhorse on behalf of many charities; he was a founding member of the board of trustees of Good Samaritan Hospital; he was chairman of trustees of Agnews State Hospital. His present involvement includes the City Entertainment Commission, the advisory committee to the police department, the advisory committee to San Jose City College, the National Conference of Christians and Jews, the Santa Clara County Advisory Committee on Children and Youth, the Jewish Community Relations Council, the County Medical Society's Committee on Religion and Medicine, and the NAACP.

But an impressive list of memberships does not a community leader make, nor does it say much about the man. More important are such facts as these: That when social tensions were at a peak in San Jose, Rabbi Gitin went into the minority community to seek reconciliation; when jail facilities were inhumanly bad, he was the first to demand their replacement; when overzealous individuals sought to cram movie censorship down the throats of an unsuspecting public, he fought against it in the interest of freedom of choice; when it was unpopular to support open housing for minorities, he was outspokenly for it; before "ecumenical" became a household word, he brought ministers of other faiths to his pulpit—in short, he has courageously and consistently accepted the responsibility shared by all men to, in his own words, "transform the global neighborhood into a brotherhood of service." His devotion to that goal is reflected in his work and the works of his congregation, whose adults give to the organized efforts of less fortunate members of the community to improve their lot, and whose youth give of themselves through such programs as tutoring for disadvantaged.

A brave, warm, and witty man, who has put works above words in his rabbinate and has carried his ministry beyond the walls of the synagogue to encompass the whole of the community, Rabbi Gitin provides a model from which all of us may benefit. As he once said:

> We need a sense of balance; perspective on our problems and on life. We need a sense of humor to console us for what we are. We need faith in ourselves and our potentialities.

His favorite lines from the Talmud is: "Man's relationship to man is as important as man's relationship to God." A good man, Rabbi Gitin, a man worthy of our appreciation and gratitude.

Mr. GUBSER. I thank my colleague.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me state that we both hold the utmost respect for Rabbi Gitin and the great force which he has exerted in bettering human life through spreading the gospel of good will.

I wish all human beings could live life as Rabbi Gitin has lived it. If so, this would indeed be a better world.

THE STRANGE CASE OF THE ARMY'S TOW MISSILE, OR CAN CONGRESS PREVENT ANOTHER BILLION-DOLLAR BOO-BOO?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, as members of the House Armed Services Committee with special interest in the Army's tank and antitank programs, the gentleman from California (Mr. GUBSER) and I have taken this time today to discuss the perplexing and baffling question of why the Army—at a time when all elements of the Defense Establishment are supposedly operating under conditions of the strictest austerity—insists on seeking a second $100 million in this year's budget—the second step down a road that could ultimately cost the taxpayers nearly $1 billion—for development of a new weapon, the TOW antitank missile, which is simply a duplication of one which is already in the Army's inventory in quantity, the Shillelagh. And what is even more baffling to us is that the Army is pursuing this costly redundancy in direct defiance of the specific instructions of Congress contained in the conference report on the 1970 defense authorization bill.

As long-time members of the committee the gentleman from California (Mr. GUBSER) and I have consistently supported an adequate and up-to-date defense. But at the same time we have always regarded it as an equally important part of our responsibility as committee members to seek out and vigorously oppose any unnecessary and wasteful defense spending. To both of us we find the defiance of the Army in the case of the TOW missile, and its insistence on spending another billion dollars for a missile it does not need in a time of budget austerity, so strange as to be almost inexplicable.

Just what is up anyway?

Here are the facts. Last year you will recall that I reported to the committee and to the House that our subcommittee's investigation into the Army's tank program had led us to conclude that the two missile systems, TOW and Shillelagh, were virtually identical in their performance, and as a result the House voted no funds for the new duplicating TOW missile. Unfortunately the House had to compromise in the conference, including $100 million of the $142 million requested for TOW. But in so doing the conference committee added language to the report directing the Army, before obligating these funds, to conduct a shoot-off between the TOW and Shillelagh missile in the infantry and the helicopter mode. And the report indicated that both committees would monitor closely the comparison of these two duplicating systems.

We may have reacted too late last year in bringing the facts of these two duplicating systems to the attention of this body and the one at the other end of the Capitol. But this year we are determined not to be late. And so we are placing the case once again before the Congress, and taking it to the American public. Not only the case we made last year, but the bizarre developments that have been taking place this year. We are betting that any informed person will see, if the Army is allowed to proceed as it wants to, we are in the process of committing another "billion dollar boo-boo."

This time the House has an excellent opportunity to exercise real leadership in the control of our defense spending. We have the opportunity, here and now, to cut off an unnecessary and wasteful billion dollar procurement program before it has escalated, overrun, and piled cost upon cost, rather than, as with other programs, having to wait until the money has been spent and the damage done, and then crying over milk already spilt.

The TOW missile—a tube-launched, optically-tracked, wire-guided missile for antitank purposes—started out several years ago to be a lightweight, economical infantry weapon carried by the soldier into battle. Over the years, however, it grew in size, grew in complexity, grew in weight, until virtually none of its important characteristics now remain. Compared to the Shillelagh, the TOW launcher and tube weighs virtually the same, the missile diameter is the same, the required range is the same. The Shillelagh missile itself weighs some ten pounds heavier, but it has a larger warhead and there's more bang.

The basic financial facts are even more impressive. The Shillelagh, after the learning curve, after mass production, after the field tests, and after having been accepted as standard "A" for production, costs—on a firm, fixed-price basis—less than a third of the cost of the TOW which is still in the development stage. And we already have tens of thousands of Shillelaghs on hand. So far we have only a few hundred TOW's. And the prospects of lower costs in TOW production is much in debate. Obviously we can save hundreds of millions of dollars by using the antitank Shillelagh on jeeps, tanks, and helicopters. On the other hand, if we continue down the road with a duplicate TOW production, we will end up paying for both systems. Our credibility as a Congress is in question; our attention to detail is in question; our job as watchdog of the defense purse strings is in question in this case.

Last year, our subcommittee investigated the Army tank program. We found plenty of things wrong. One of the things we found right was the Shillelagh missile. It is simple, reliable, and lethal. It has been in the Army inventory for 2 years. It works. I saw it fired last month in Germany, and I was tremendously impressed. So were the troops. It works well. It works well at low cost. Now, a number of people have asked me why our committee had not discovered the problems with the Army tank program until money had been spent, programs accelerated, and we were left with what amounted to an Army surplus store full of unusable equipment.

At that time I became determined to find the problems before they erupted, if I possibly could, to root out duplication and waste before they could weaken our national defense, or boondoggle dollars to no use. Just such a situation confronted us last year with TOW and now confronts us even more ominously today; we have the opportunity to modify, easily and with relatively little expense, an existing, proven antitank missile system that is already in our inventory and will meet and beat any Army requirements in Europe or elsewhere—at minimum cost. Here in the House we can look our critics in the eye and tell them we caught this one and did something about it. Let us forget we made a mistake and appropriated money last year for TOW production. If and when the TOW missiles get built, and if and when they ever get rated standard A, we'll use them. But let us not build any more.

By using the already developed TOW tripod with the Shillelagh, we can save on development costs, combining the best of both systems with the already-in-mass-production Shillelagh. We can keep the production line open, maintaining the low cost of the Shillelagh, building on proven costs, not gambling on overruns that can't help but happen with TOW.

But this is not the way the Army is operating at all, this year, and this is what disturbs and perplexes me. In spite of the clear-cut direction of the Congress to continue to explore the possibility of using the cheaper, on-the-shelf Shillelagh for all the roles projected for the newly developed TOW, the Army has ignored these directions and has proceeded hell bent to get TOW into production at any cost. Here are some of the more curious new developments:

First. Last year the Army's chief argument for TOW was that it was basically an infantryman's weapon, hand-carried onto the battlefield, in contrast to Shillelagh, which was designed primarily for vehicles. But the facts as they have emerged this year are quite the contrary. At a recent TOW demonstration presented to committee members at the Redstone Arsensal in Huntsville, Ala., the Army showed that its major plans for use of the TOW now involve mounting it on jeeps, mules, and the M–113 armored personnel carrier. It is just too heavy—230 pounds to be exact—for infantrymen to manhandle for more than a very few yards. Actually, the TOW is not the Army's infantry antitank weapon at all. That is really the Dragon, which is light enough and disposable enough to be carried on the battlefield. as the TOW is decidedly not.

Second. Last year Congress directed the Army to test the relative merits of TOW and Shillelagh in the ground mode by means of a comparison shootoff. Money was specifically earmarked for this purpose. The Army had claimed earlier that Shillelagh is unacceptable in a ground configuration for two reasons: the blast from the rear makes it unsafe to be fired by troops sitting on the ground; and the missile dips slightly after firing, and thus cannot be fired from a position only a few feet off the ground.

These two points could be settled quickly and easily. If the Army's contentions are true, then there is no need for proceeding further with the ground configuration. But the Army has persistently and repeatedly dragged its feet in carrying out this simple, practical shootoff. They have professed to be studying the situation and have claimed no such shootoff could take place for several months—incidentally, well after the time the House committee is scheduled to report out the 1971 defense procurement bill. At the same time I have continued to press them for compliance with our congressional instructions. Last Thursday the chief of Army Research and Development appeared before our committee. His prepared statement went into great detail about the 6 to 8 months of tests, between TOW and Shillelagh, that the Army intended to carry out this year in compliance with the congressional mandate. But 5 minutes after the hearing began, I received a hand-delivered letter from the Secretary of the Army telling me they had decided not to carry out any tests after all. Their cost calculations, Mr. Resor told me, had convinced them an actual shootoff was unnecessary. And so, in defiance of Congress, they were not going to hold the shootoff, at all, and were proceeding with TOW just as though Congress did not exist.

Why, I wonder?

Why all the hesitation about a shootoff? Probably because the Army knows that any proper shootoff will destroy once and for all the myth that there is anything particularly special about the TOW which the Shillelagh, already in the inventory, cannot match, and do so more cheaply and simply.

Third. The Army's major reason for defying the congressional directive on a shootoff between TOW and Shillelagh was its cost analysis data, as I have just noted. This whole subject of cost projections on TOW, however, opens up an even more curious Alice-in-Wonderland aspect of this whole procurement program.

When the Army made its fiscal year 1970 request for TOW it projected a long-range massive procurement at a total cost of $1.2 billion, which made the total TOW buy just about double the cost of Shillelagh. As soon as the House Armed Services Committee challenged this program on cost grounds, the Army suddenly revised its figures downward, and claimed it now found it really needed only about two-thirds of the TOW missiles originally requested to meet the grave Soviet tank threat in Europe. And it was on the basis of these revised figures that the conference committee reached its final compromise.

This year, as TOW has again come under attack within the committee, a sudden further cost reappraisal has been undertaken, on the basis of which the Army now refuses to conduct any shootoff at all. I have so far been unsuccessful in getting the supporting data that led to this amazing new conclusion. All they will show me are the briefing slides, not the computations themselves. But in effect the Army has suddenly reduced its long-term requirement a second time, this time cutting the revised figure about in half. How come? If the threat was so serious a year ago that we needed so many to do the job, how is it that all we need today is only a third of that figure?

And over the weekend, as I was loudly protesting the Army's refusal to give me the necessary supporting data for their refusal to conduct the congressionally mandated shootoff, I learned the Hughes Co. has now suddenly promised to supply them all the TOW missiles the Army wants at a figure almost identical with the basic unit cost of Shillelagh. Far from convincing me, however, this latest development smacks more of trading in a Turkish covered bazaar than any careful husbanding of Government funds in a time of budget austerity. What is going on, anyway? Why is the Army so eager to avoid a close inspection of their cost figures? Why are they so eager to avoid a shootoff? Why are they so eager to get a second production line going, come hell or high water?

We believe these are all questions that the House as well as the American public will want the answers to. As members of the committee we intend to do all we can to find those answers. Surely this is not the year to waste another $100 million, certainly not another billion dollars, in unnecessary defense spending. We have too many unmet needs already. Our basic defense research is being cut back very drastically at the very time the Soviets are moving ahead in new development in a geometrical progression. Our antisubmarine forces are being cut dangerously just as the Soviet Polaris missile fleet is being deployed at sea. Our Navy, as Chairman RIVERS has frequently pointed out, is fast approaching a crisis of obsolescence that could shift the world power balance dangerously against us.

Surely this is not the time for phony figures, for last minute bargain counter procurement practices, or for wasting hundreds of millions of dollars for weapons that only duplicate others already on hand, and for the additional supply and maintenance pipelines that would be required to keep this separate system going. Here is one billion-dollar boo-boo this Congress should certainly not let happen.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I am glad to yield to my distinguished friend from California.

Mr. GUBSER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure and the honor of serving with the gentleman from New York on the subcommittee which thoroughly explored this matter, and I can say that I have never served under a subcommittee chairman who did his job more thoroughly or more completely. That is why the facts which we bring before the House today are, in my honest opinion, uncontrovertible facts and things which the House should consider. I certainly wish to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks, and I shall ask unanimous consent to include a formal statement following his giving my views on the subject.

But before doing so I must perform a task which I perform with great regret. I have never been the type of person that stands here in this Chamber and makes public utterances after having just sniffed the winds of the latest bit of public opinion. I have not joined the forces that are now seeking to convince the American public that all you need to do to solve the problems of the ghetto and do away with poverty and all other social ills that beset this generation is simply to go to that bottomless well of money called the Defense budget. On the other hand, I cannot sit idly by and see the Army duplicate a weapons system which will not do a thing that a system which is cheaper and already in production can do just as well. I regret and I regret deeply that I have to say here and now that it is my opinion that the Army has sold this duplicating weapons system on false premises.

Let me list them:

Last year when this matter was deleted from the House bill by our committee and was later included by the Senate high officials of the Army convinced certain Members that this was to be a weapon which could be carried into battle by the infantry soldier, and could, therefore, fulfill an urgent requirement that could not be met presently. They did not tell you that the SS–1, a French wire-guided missile, which can do practically what the TOW will do was in the NATO inventory and could fulfill the requirement for the time necessary to miniaturize and adapt Shillelagh to the ground mode.

What was even more shocking is that while they were selling it as something the infantryman would carry on his back they were making plans all the time to deploy the TOW missile system on M–113 personnel carriers and other vehicles. The Army has ordered the mounting brackets to place these TOW missiles on a missile launcher or a vehicle, and they have ordered these in the quantity of one for one. In other words, one mounting bracket to go on a jeep or personnel carrier for one missile.

If this was ever to be something the infantryman carries into battle, why did they order the mounting brackets in this quantity?

They did not tell us last year they are about ready to let a contract to procure still another missile, on the Dragon, which can be carried by the infantryman.

They told us that this missile, the TOW, can be fired not only to the range called for in the specifications, but can be fired to the so-called desired range specified by the Army. That range is classified, and I cannot tell you what it is. But it is rather interesting that when they make this claim they do not bother to tell you that the wires which pay out in this missile, and which are responsible for guiding it, have never been wound on a missile so that it could reach this so-called desired range—never once.

They have not told you that if you fire it against a stationary target it requires a length of wire as long as the straight line between two points. Nor did they say that if you fire it at a moving target, that wire must turn as you follow the moving vehicle, and you do not have a straight line between two points, and the wire will pay out far short of the desired range.

These are the things that were not told to the Members of Congress who finally influenced the decision that we were to go ahead and procure the TOW missile.

Then the Army promised us shootoff so that we could go to our taxpayers and say, "Yes, we have seen one missile fired against the other in the ground mode, and we know which will work the best, and which will be the cheapest." But then last Thursday Secretary Resor goes back on the Army's word and tells us that the taxpayers will not have the right to see a shootoff, and find out what is going to happen.

On last Thursday, the decision not to proceed with the shootoff, was justified because according to Secretary Resor the cost figures had been reviewed and there was not any doubt that TOW was the best deal.

Today TOW is costing somewhere between $5,000 and $6,000 per missile. The Shillelagh which will do the same job is in production and is costing less than $2,000 per missile. Yet, these figures of $5,000 to $6,000 were the basis of a judgment by Secretary Resor last Thursday that we should not even have a shootoff.

But listen to what happened on Saturday. We are informed the Hughes Co. which is the contractor for the TOW missile said to the Army that they would guarantee delivery of the TOW missile at a figure not to exceed $2,500 per missile.

So on Thursday Secretary Resor justified a decision based upon figures between $5,000 and $6,000 and we know positively that the Secretary of the Army did not know of this so-called unsolicited proposal which was to come from Hughes until Saturday.

How can a Secretary of Army justify something on a cost of $5,000 to $6,000 on Thursday, when on Saturday the contractor says, "I can deliver it for $2,500."

Only one of two explanations is possible. The Army is either getting gypped or we have got a buy-in situation. Let me tell you what a buy-in situation is.

A couple of years ago I participated in an investigation into the light observation helicopter. A contract was let at a fixed price, again to the same Hughes company. This fixed price was to deliver helicopters and airframes, for a fixed amount. Anyone who knew anything about the helicopter business knew that that figure meant that they would have to lose money.

But what happened? They got the contract established. They got themselves in business. Nobody else was in a position to compete. So when the follow-on contracts came along, how much does the price increase? Not 20 percent—not 50 percent—the price was increased by 250 percent.

Now this obviously was a buy-in, if I have ever seen one. I wonder today if the same company is not trying to buy in again and the Secretary of the Army is allowing this to go on.

Mr. Speaker, my patience has run out. I have sat as the ranking minority member of the Stratton subcommittee, and as a member of the Armed Services Committee through the entire debate over the Shillelagh and the TOW. Chairman STRATTON and I have studied the issue, investigated the entire Army tank program, debated the matter on the floor, wrestled with the issue in conference, and have shown the Army in logical, precise terms that it is about to confirm one of its biggest mistakes. Yet, now we hear that Secretary Resor is planning to go stubbornly ahead and refuses to even allow a "shoot off" between the two weapons.

Last year, our subcommittee uncovered—to use the Chairman's words—discrepancies, mismanagement and irregularities in the Army tank program described as a billion dollar boo-boo. This year, the Army is about to commit a boo-boo again, smaller in dollar value, but the more distressing because it can clearly be prevented. Several hundred millions of dollars is about to be poured down a rathole by the Army.

Mr. Speaker, I have never been one who sniffs the strong winds of public opinion which prevail today and advocates ill-advised degradation of our national defense. Quite to the contrary I have repeatedly pointed out that this is still a dangerous world. I have pointed out that the Communist world is continuing to accelerate its effort to achieve offensive military superiority while ours, relatively speaking, is going down. I believe that we are making mistakes today which may subject us to nuclear blackmail at some conference table during the 1970's.

With such an attitude, I cannot for the life of me understand why the Army insists upon a half-billion-dollar boo-boo which is certain to be pointed to as another example of the military-industrial complex working against the interest of the taxpayers. Why cannot the Army realize that the American public is tired of being given the double dip—and that is exactly what it is being given with this duplicating development of the TOW and the Shillelagh.

How can the Army expect those of us who believe in a strong national defense to go on fighting the tide when they pull stunts like this which lend credibility to the current arguments regarding the military-industrial complex.

Nearly 10 years ago, the Army contracted for the Shillelagh antitank missile. By the mid-1960's the missile was being fired with phenomenal accuracy and reliability and, to date, a substantial number have been produced and placed at the disposal of combat troops. Because the development has been complete, because the quantities are large, because the errors have been ironed out, the missile is sold for less than $2,000—and the contractor continues to sell them for that because he is on a fixed-price contract. In the meantime, in 1961 the Army began to develop another weapon: the TOW, a tube-launched, optically tracked, wire-guided missile. Yes, wire guided: two hairlike wires stretching out behind the missile as it is fired. The TOW was to be used by the infantrymen; was to be portable; was to be lightweight; simple and reliable. It was to be economical. Well, it's none of these. If you compare a TOW with a Shillelagh prepared for the infantry role, you find these facts: the weight of TOW launchers and Shillelagh launchers are virtually the same; although the TOW tube is longer and heavier. The required Army range is virtually identical. The electronics are similar, except the Shillelagh uses an infrared guidance system, and the TOW uses its wires. The diameter of the missiles is the same, although the slightly heavier Shillelagh delivers a larger punch.

The big difference is in cost. The Shillelagh is a proven, field-tested, lab-tested missile system, now rated standard A by the Army and deployed. It costs us less than $2,000 a copy. The TOW is unproved, still not accepted by the Army as standard A, is currently costing us approximately $6,000 a copy. It is true that costs tend to decrease during large production runs, but the TOW is starting out as 35 percent more expensive than the Shillelagh started out—in the same time frame. It is pretty difficult to start higher and end up lower, given the same number of missiles to be purchased.

I made some of these arguments last year when subcommittee chairman STRATTON and I advocated no funds for the TOW missile. And to prove our point, we urged a requirement that the Army demonstrate the Shillelagh in the infantry mode to satisfy those who wanted additional proof of what we already knew: the Shillelagh would work as well or better in the infantry role than the TOW. The other body did not agree, and we compromised in conference. We compromised by giving TOW $100 million for a year's production. It was a mistake then and it is a mistake now. And I might point out, with respect to the Army evaluation, that only last Thursday did the brass tell us they might go ahead, after further evaluation, with a feasibility demonstration of Shillelagh.

Now we learn that the Army does not want to be further confused by the truth. Secretary Resor is hellbent to make this gigantic mistake and has determined not to have a shootoff. And what is most amazing is that on Friday he based this decision on current production costs of between $5,000 and $6,000 per TOW missile. He knew we would challenge his figures. Then on Saturday the contractor comes in with a supposedly unsolicited proposal of $2,500 per missile. As Alice said, "Things get curiouser and curiouser."

I have lost my patience in another way. Last year, we were told by some very articulate spokesmen for the Army that the TOW was truly an infantryman's weapon. An infantryman, we were told, would carry it into combat, set it up in 90 seconds, and fire it. Well, let me say that I have seen infantrymen trying to carry the TOW. When it is unpacked, one man carries the tube, one carries the guidance equipment, one carries the missile, and one carries the tripod. The tripod weighs 72 pounds—72 pounds. I challenge any articulate spokesman for the Army to carry that tripod on a 10-mile march, a 5-mile march, or even half a mile. It is possible the committee misunderstood. It is possible that Army spokesmen were misinformed. It is possible that a wrong impression was created and not corrected. Whatever happened, the Congress was sold the false impression that TOW would be carried into battle by foot soldiers. Well, my friends, once burned, twice shy. The first time, shame on you, the second time, shame on me. I, for one, believe that the committee should not be taken in again.

I have lost my patience in still another way. The articulate gentlemen of the Army have said that the need for TOW is now. Well, if the Army wants an antitank weapon now, it can use presently deployed ENTACS and M–105 systems, it can trundle out its Sheridans and fire Shillelaghs. Remember, TOW will also be fired from vehicles. It can use the SS–11 missile system deployed with German forces in Europe. I have seen that missile fire, and it fires well, I assure you. The Army has gotten along without the TOW for a number of years, and I fail to understand why the sudden urgency about TOW production. The Shillelagh launch system can be miniaturized and deployed within approximately 2 years at a cost of approximately $30 million. The miniaturization is well within the start of the art.

And, finally, I have lost my patience with the technical gentlemen of the Army who could not believe that the Shillelagh could work. Perhaps they believe a fish cannot swim. The Army itself had movies of the Shillelagh in test firings from open breech 9 years ago. Yet, incredibly, we were told last year that the Shillelagh missile might drop out of the launch tube, that it might dip into the ground and explode, that it might endanger its crew, that it might need costly modification. Now, this year we are informed that further review will be required before initiating an infantry mode feasibility demonstration program.

The Shillelagh can be used in all places TOW can be used: on helicopters, on tanks, and on the ground. The TOW, on the other hand, cannot be used on tanks. If it can be used on helicopters, I want to see how. Those wires dangling from the missile have already gotten tangled in treetops during tests.

And then there is the important matter of costs. With Shillelagh we know what our costs will be. The TOW, on the other hand, has already missed its early production cost targets and is currently costing more than $5,000 per missile. Now we have a last minute, supposedly unsolicited offer of $2,500 per TOW missile for an overnight price reduction of about 50 percent. Mr. Chairman, I cannot forget a similar offer and contract for light observation helicopters made by the same Hughes Aircraft Co. for a firm fixed price. Later, in follow-on buys, the price increased by 250 percent! That was a case of "buying in" and I wonder if this last-minute manipulation is not a new example of the same thing.

For these reasons, I have lost my patience. I hope this House loses its patience. I hope we bring to light the out-and-out duplication of the Shillelagh and TOW missile systems, admit our mistake in compromising to buy a year's worth of TOW's and get on with our business. This year, of all years, is not the time to permit the American public the luxury of the double-dip.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. First, let me correct the gentleman, my colleague from California, to say that it was the Hughes Tool Co. that was involved in the helicopters. That is an entirely different company. They do have the same name "Hughes," but it is not the same company. I think the record should show that.

Now to both of my distinguished colleagues, let me say I disagree with you completely as to the conclusions that you have come to. I was not prepared today to present the case for the TOW.

I recognize that you gentlemen have held hearings. I think there was some prejudice in the hearings. Unfortunately, neither of you were at the Armed Services Committee meeting this morning when Secretary Resor and General Westmoreland were there and defended it completely. They will be at the meeting tomorrow and I think it is important both of you should be there if it is at all possible so that you can lay these charges at their feet and let them answer—and charge them exactly as you have done here today and let us see what their answer is.

I would like to hear that myself. I think you have made some very serious charges and I think it is a very unfortunate thing.

Mr. STRATTON. I appreciate the gentleman's statement, the gentleman from California I mean (Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON), but I think if the gentleman will inspect the record, he will see that every possible opportunity has already been given to the Army to justify this proposed procurement of theirs. The facts that the gentleman from California (Mr. GUBSER) was citing a moment ago are clear cut and on the record.

As far as I am concerned, I was presented with a letter from Mr. Resor on Thursday that stated that a new cost calculation had been made that made it possible for the Secretary of the Army to defy the clearly expressed direction and mandate of the Congress. I called Mr. Resor on the telephone. I asked him if he would present that calculation to me because I wanted to examine it. I had been offered a briefing, but a briefing is a very transient thing. You flash a few slides on the screen and you have a glib and articulate briefer. But there is no real opportunity to sit down and analyze the figures.

The Secretary said, "Oh, certainly, I will get those figures over to you."

I said, "I am leaving early on Friday. I would like to have them in the afternoon."

He said ,"I can't get them to you until the evening."

I said, "Get them there in the early evening and that will be fine."

When the Army messenger came to my home, all he had to deliver was a photostatic copy of slides that the Army was going to use in their briefing, without any supporting data whatsoever. Surely if the Secretary of the Army has data which he uses to make a determination so vital that he concludes he can safely ignore the clearly expressed will of Congress, that data should be readily available, and I do not accept any statement that they had to rework the data, that it was not available, or anything of that kind.

This kind of jockeying can go on just so long, and the gentleman from California and I had reached the conclusion it was about time the Congress of the United States and the Committee on Armed Services should no longer be trifled with. That is why we made the statement that we did. If the Secretary of the Army wants to come before the committee and present his calculations, all right. But I think we ought to know what has transpired in reaching his conclusions, and I think the Congress ought to know and the members of the committee ought to know. If he has any new information, let us bring it up here, not just in a briefing, but on the record.

I have a perfectly open mind, but when the Army tells us that they are developing a weapon to be carried on the back, and that weapon turns out to weigh 230 pounds and four or five men can struggle over no more than a few hundred yards with it, and it is actually being attached to vehicles, as the gentleman from California (Mr. GUBSER) points out, then there is a crisis in credibility. If the members of the Armed Services Committee cannot be told the truth by the Army and are not going to be given the facts, then we do have a serious situation.

This is a crisis in credibility. A great many people have said the members of the Armed Services Committee just rubberstamp what the services want, that any member of the services can come up to our committee and ask for anything and get it. But that is not our job. Our job is to be critical, to exercise an independent judgment. The subcommittee which I had the privilege of heading last year, and on which the distinguished gentleman from California was a very valuable member, saved the American people over $100 million because of what we had found by careful probing regarding the Sheridan. We also effected a major change in the Navy Ship Systems Command because of what we found with regard to carelessness and shocking mismanagement that led to the sinking of the nuclear submarine Guitarro at Mare Island.

We shall continue to do our job, and I make no apology for that job to any Member.

POSTAL CHAOS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. HOLIFIELD) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I very seldom take the floor under special order, but I am deeply concerned about the situation among our postal employees. While Los Angeles is not in my district, I point out that, unless something has happened in the last hour, the postal employees in Los Angeles are out. I understand most of them have gone back to work in San Francisco, but they are still out in Berkeley and in certain other places in the State.

We are faced today with utter chaos in the U.S. Post Office Department.

Over 200,000 workers have walked away from their jobs and mountains of mail pile up in our cities and centers of transportation.

Business mail, pension checks, social security checks, and unemployment checks are undelivered. We face a breakdown in written communications at every level.

How did this situation develop?

A story too long to tell lies behind the problem.

I served on the House Post Office and Post Roads Committee in 1943 and 1944, and I served on the successor committee for 4 years in the 1950's, the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. My first speech on the floor of the House in 1943 was based on advocacy of a fully automated annual adjustment of post office salaries through annual raises based on the cost of living. This was a novel suggestion at that time, although the principle is common today in labor-management contracts.

Needless to say, it was not accepted, due mainly to the post office union representatives at the Washington level who were fearful such a policy might decrease their usefulness to and control over the rank-and-file employees. At least, that is the only reason I can think of.

It was not until 1962, almost 20 years later, when Congress passed the Pay Comparability Act which asserted the U.S. Post Office and civil service employees should be paid comparable money to that paid employees in private industry for doing the same level of work. This was a step forward. Unfortunately Congress and the administration have failed to comply with the legislative mandate.

The civil service and postal employees have been denied increases in pay because of a lack of action on the Comparability Act, and they are now 21 months behind in pay raises between achieving comparability with private employees doing the same kind of work.

In the meantime inflation has reduced the value of their salaries 4.2 percent in 1968, and 6.3 percent in 1969, and inflation continues in 1970 at the current rate of 6.6 percent.

Under the circumstances do Members wonder why Government employees are disillusioned and embittered? Do Members wonder that they are voluntarily walking off the job against the orders of their union leaders and the requests of their leaders?

These 200,000 people are loyal Americans, not troublemakers. They know they can be fined $1,000 and denied reinstatement for 3 years. They have wives and children to feed and clothe and house. Only desperate men would take such chances. The carriers start at $6,176 a year and then 20 years later they increase to $8,422. Think of the hopelessness of their plight. Think of the quiet desperation and the poverty level at which they live in a time of 5-percent to 6-percent inflation annually in our Nation.

We hear some say that Congress should not act while 200,000 of the 750,000 employees are in an illegal strike. What about the 550,000 employees who have stayed on the job? These people deserve consideration too.

We hear some talk about Congress refusing to act under duress from the striking employees. What about the ultimatum of the President when he tells the Congress that he will veto a pay bill long overdue unless we pass the postal reform bill he wants? I say to the Members the reform of the Post Office Department is a separate issue and the President is not justified in his attempt to obtain his transformation of the Post Office into a separate corporate entity at the expense of the living standards of 750,000 loyal Government employees.

We passed right here in the House in October 1969 the bill—H.R. 13000—with a two-stage pay bill. The other body passed a similar bill on December 13, 1969. There were some differences in those bills, however. Now I say those bills should go to conference at once and a report should be prepared without delay.

I want to make it very clear that I make no charge of delay against the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York, (Mr. DULSKI) or the members of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. In my opinion they have acted wisely and properly and promptly. I say again that H.R. 13000 should go to conference, and a conference report on the pay bill alone should be negotiated with the other body.

We would vote later on the Post Office reform bill. If the President wants to veto the bill, fine, that is his privilege. And it is his responsibility. Our responsibility is to fulfill our obligation under this 1962 Comparability Pay Act. We are 21 months behind on pay raises under the 1962 act. We have no control over the actions of a committee in the other body, but I hope sincerely they will go to conference.

This matter can be solved as far as congressional action is concerned. If the Congress discharges its final responsibility on pending legislation, we shall have done our part. If the President believes he should veto the bill, so be it. We can continue from there. I doubt very much, personally, if the President would veto a just bill for pay raises which are long overdue and are in complete harmony with congressional policy under the 1962 Comparability Act.

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. As a member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I should like to compliment the gentleman on his very fine statement, which lays before the people of this country more clearly, I am sure, than the President did today the real issues involved here.

As a member of the committee, I can say we have been meeting as regularly as we could ever since this crisis became apparent, trying to lend whatever assistance we could to the administration, without pointing the finger or without any recriminations toward the President or toward the Postmaster General.

As a matter of fact, we met with the Postmaster General himself and sought from him his advice about what he anticipated the situation was going to be and what he had in the way of plans to meet it. We had an agreement we would not quote him in any way after that meeting. It was also agreed we were all at liberty to respond to the substance of what he had to say.

Speaking for myself, the substance of what he had to say was that they had no plans.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Had no what?

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. They had no plans for dealing with this situation. Very frankly, as the spokesman for the administration, he gave me the impression that they were going to rely entirely on the fact that the Federal courts would issue injunctions to restrain employees from striking; that it is, in fact, against the Federal law for a person to withhold his services if he is a Federal employee, notwithstanding the fact that public employees at all levels of employment across this country have reacted to their frustrations in trying to keep up with the private sector by withholding their services contrary to State laws, local city charters, and local laws.

This is a fact of life we have to live with. The administration seems unwilling to recognize that this is 1970 and that the traditions which led to the passage of that law may not be relevant to the pressures employees find themselves responding to today.

When the President came on television this afternoon and announced to the American people that rather than opening up avenues of discussion with these people who—whether we in this body agree with everything they say or any part of what they say or not—believe themselves sincerely to be aggrieved, he is going instead to suggest that the work stoppage or strike, if one wishes to use that term, be terminated or interrupted by supplanting their employment or replacing their employment with military people; this is a dreadful mistake on the part of the President, for two reasons.

The first one is that it will undoubtedly exacerbate the situation and lead to a broadening of the strike and lead to mounting tempers and tensions, increasing the probability that we will not be able to get together across the bargaining table.

More importantly, he will be putting into the Post Office Department to handle very valuable and very precious mail, mail that affects the lives of millions of people, untrained people who should not be called upon to exercise this kind of responsibility.

I am not speaking in any way in derogation of the capability of our young men in the military, but they are not trained.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. As a matter of fact, is it not true, if the gentleman will respond to this, that there are more than 550 zip codes to be learned, for the United States, and that many of these letters have to be handled four or five or six times before they get to their final destination, and they are handled on the basis mostly of the zip code reference.

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. Yes. It is tragic there are so very few people right in this Congress who have any understanding at all of how complex the job of handling the mail in this country is.

How pitiful the wages are for these men who have to study these ZIP codes and study the method of throwing letters into the different slots that they have to throw them into for separation and for respective routing. They do not understand this unless they go into a post office and see a big post office in operation.

Mr. Speaker, we were saddened, and honestly I think it is my opinion—and others have expressed the same opinion—that one of the things that led the employees to believe this administration had abandoned them was a remark made by the Postmaster General to the press when he was in Tokyo just before the end of the year where, after examining and visiting some Japanese post offices—which no one on our committee is very impressed with, because we all know that we do a better job more efficiently and cheaper than any country in the world, including Japan—but the Postmaster General responded to a newspaperman who asked him what he thought about what he had seen that the average Japanese post office clerk can sort mail faster than the fastest machinery we have in the automated post offices that we have in the United States. Then he volunteered the further information that it is because the Japanese postal worker has not forgotten how to work. That was in an article that appeared in the Los Angeles Times. It did not stay in the Los Angeles Times but was reproduced all across the country. It came at a time when the employees were asking whether or not the people who were in charge of running the postal service understood the seriousness of the problems they were facing. It could have clearly been interpreted by them, as it was by me, to be an indication that the people at the top just do not understand the job they are supposed to be doing.

I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that a group of us from the Detroit metropolitan area, Democrats and Republicans, sent President Nixon a telegram 4 days ago on the morning when this crisis began. It is addressed to the President at the White House, and I will quote the telegram:

MARCH 20, 1970.

Hon. RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the United States,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

The spreading postal stoppage appears on the verge of developing into a national disaster. In view of the fact there are now no lines of communication open between labor and management which could lead to a settlement, we urge you to use your power as Chief Executive of the United States to immediately take the following steps: (1) appoint a high-level mediation panel composed of citizens recognized as broadly representative of the interests of the public, postal management and the postal employees, and (2) call upon all postal employees to return to work immediately and restore postal service with your assurance that you will give full and prompt consideration to the findings of this mediation panel, and will initiate and support all reasonable action to secure immediate implementation of the recommendations of the panel appointed by you.

WILLIAM D. FORD, JAMES G. O'HARA, LUCIEN G. NEDZI, JOHN D. DINGELL, MARTHA GRIFFITHS, WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD, JACK MCDONALD, CHARLES C. DIGGS, JR., JOHN CONYERS, JR., Members of Congress.

This telegram was signed by nine Members of the House, both Democrats and Republicans, from the Detroit metropolitan area. I am sorry and saddened to see that they have not even had the courtesy in the White House to acknowledge that they received our telegram. It is quite obvious from the statements that the President made this afternoon on television that if he did receive the telegram, he thought that we should not have written it rather than accepting the recommendations coming from Members of this body that we should be negotiating this difference across the table like adults instead of making recriminations of a lack of patriotism on the part of these employees.

Mr. Speaker, I want to close by saying that I take as a personal insult on behalf of the postal employees that I worked with since I have been a member of this committee, the suggestion by the President of the United States to that effect—and not at all a very subtle one at that—that a patriotic American would be back at work whether he had his grievances satisfied or not. To equate these employees' attempts to draw attention to their long-smoldering unhappiness with a long list of grievances that have been neglected by the previous administration and by this administration and to some extent by the Congress—to equate their actions with being unpatriotic it seems to me is beneath the dignity of the office that Mr. Nixon now holds.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his contributions.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON).

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much for yielding, and I want to commend the gentleman for the statement he has made. I think he has brought into proper focus what the real problem is here. The American people just do not understand the tragic conditions that face our letter carriers or postal clerks, and those who are below the sixth grade of our Federal pay system.

The unfortunate thing, too, is that they have no bargaining rights or bargaining powers. They are operating under an Executive order that does not give them the opportunity to sit down and really have something to negotiate when they are in disagreement with the progress of legislation that should be moving along its way in order to give them a better lot in connection with their brothers in private industry.

Also it is unfortunate that earlier today, when the 1-minute speeches were going on, some uninformed Members who were not aware of many of the things that have been happening, things that have been brought up before our committee, made some of the remarks that they did. We got into a rather partisan discussion at that time, and I think the RECORD should show that there were five of the Democrat Members who have been supporters of the President's proposal, the reform program, right from the very start, including myself.

Two weeks ago when the bill was passed in the committee, which included the pay raise that the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) earlier made reference to, there were more Democrats on the committee who supported that bill and voted for its passage than there were Republican members. There were nine Democrats and eight Republicans who voted to pass the bill out by a 17-to-6 vote.

I think that many of the Democrat members have tried to act as responsibly as they could, and those who did not vote the way we, who supported the corporation proposal did, did it in a sincere manner. I think that the differences were well debated. There were three members on the Republican side who did not follow the leadership of their President, and the Postmaster General, and who voted against the corporation proposal.

I think the House of Representatives has acted very responsibly. I think it is unfortunate that the postal employees of New York would not give us time to try to move the bill that we recently passed in the House through the Committee on Rules, and give us time to work on it the way it should have been in order to accomplish what they need.

Also I think it is unfortunate that the other body would not meet in conference with the members of our House committee in connection with the bill H.R. 13000, which we passed last October. They had their own version which they passed in December, but they were either unable or unwilling to meet with our conferees, and this was part of the delay.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Does not the gentleman agree with me that they should at this time under the dire circumstances we are faced with nationally, with uniformed soldiers coming in to do the work of civilians in the post offices in New York? And that when we resort to this extreme measure does not the gentleman believe that the Members of the other body should now meet in conference and solve this problem that is a congressional obligation, and one that we can discharge?

But there is not much to be gained by recrimination. I heard someone say something about Larry O'Brien. I can remember him sending up the reform legislation, but I do not remember him sending up the reform legislation and saying unless you pass this you cannot pass pay legislation.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. No. Absolutely not.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. And I do not remember any threatening of a veto.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. Absolutely not.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I do not remember him threatening a veto on the Post Office pay raise that we passed last year, unless we attached the reform bill to it. That is the thing that I object to and resent very bitterly.

This is duress. This is Presidential duress on the Congress. They talk about the duress of striking employees, staying away from work—duress on the Congress. A minority, I might say, of 200,000 out of 750,000 people, but 550,000 stayed on the job doing their work the best they can under trying circumstances. So why we should get so proud as to say that we cannot take action because of these 200,000 desperate people who have felt that they had to call attention to their plight, I cannot understand.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. The gentleman is so right. The conferees should be in session right now so far as I am concerned—and if not tonight then they should be in session tomorrow.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. That is right.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. I think the majority leader was correct when he urged Members to prepare to stay here during this crisis rather than to go on a recess. I think it would be unconscionable for the Congress to take a recess when there are a lot of things we should do and could be doing to help in this situation. We should be doing everything we possibly can.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. If there is anything we can do, we should stay here and get this work done because there are thousands of families which are being denied a pay raise which they need to take care of food and living costs of their families. I agree with the gentleman that we should do everything that we can at the congressional level. Then let the President discharge his responsibility. If he thinks he should veto the bill because it is not a good piece of legislation, which is remote from it and not connected directly with the pay raise of employees, then let him veto the bill and let him see how the Congress responds to it.

I am willing to vote on it. I have not made up my mind on this reform corporation bill, but I am ready to look at the bill with an open mind. I have not decided one way or the other.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BINGHAM. I commend the gentleman from California on his comments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed the colloquy that has been carried on but I do want to take very strong exception to the comments made by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD) in which he attempted to put the whole blame for this thing at the doorstep of the President. The gentleman from Michigan commented that he and several others sent a telegram to the President, and apparently he has some exalted idea that five or 10 Congressmen can get together and agree on a matter affecting the whole Nation's postal system.

The gentleman from Michigan is thoroughly aware that we do have committees of this Congress which must act and he is aware that the Congress, both branches—the House and Senate—have to act.

We have acted on a pay raise and because of the differences between the House and Senate and their inability to get together—and I do not attempt to pass judgment on this—but I do know this that any implication that the gentleman from Michigan was intimidated by the President into not voting for or against anything because of the threat of a veto just will not hold water because he voted for the HEW bill and additional appropriations in the face of a threat of a Presidential veto. I do not think he or any other Member of this House has been intimidated by any threat of a Presidential veto.

I think if there is any question about the responsibility of this House or its ability to act, the question is—and I refer to the House and to the Senate—why have we not acted? Let us not try to throw this thing down on 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. Let us do our business and then let the President do his.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I will say to the gentleman, in essence I agree that the Congress, both Houses, should do what they can do. But as to what effect a threat of the President to veto this bill unless the type of reform bill is added in committee to that, I do not know. I cannot pass judgment on that. But whatever it may be, now is the time I think to have a conference and let the Congress discharge fully its duties and then leave it up to the President.

I do not believe in the face of the need of 750,000 employees and their families—I do not believe the President—and he is a Republican President and I am a Democrat—but I do not believe he would veto this justifiable raise, which is in complete harmony with the policy of the Congress expressed in the 1962 act.

I would like to give him the opportunity to say that he does care for these 750,000 people and their families.

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that President Nixon could not intimidate me if he had a club. I was not even intimidated by the student prince uniforms that he put on his policemen down there.

So far as being exalted about anything, I want to say this. I had become accustomed, prior to this administration, to the fact that as an elected Representative of about 570,000 people in my district in the State of Michigan, that when I wrote to the President on an important matter that affected the daily livelihood, I at least got an acknowledgement from a member of the staff. That is all I said. There were nine of us who did not even know if the President received the telegram. They had not been kind enough to tell us even—to go jump in the lake.

But I would like to recall to the gentleman a little bit of history. It is not the House committee that has been intimidated. This piece of legislation has been tied up in the other body.

It is no secret that the administration and the lackeys in the Post Office Department have been doing everything from promising new buildings to cutting off buildings for those who have not been cooperative, to canceling projects, to appointing people to jobs and doing everything that you can imagine to put through this postal corporation.

In the process of doing this it has been no secret to us or to the employees that the pay bill that is over there in the Senate is being held hostage for movement of the postal corporation bill, and the President did not say, "I will veto any pay bill." What the President has been feeding back down here is the statement, "I will not sign a pay bill unless you give me with the pay bill the postal corporation in the form in which I want it."

I do not blame the President for doing all he wants to get his legislative program, but if he is going to deal under the table, as he did in connection with the HEW appropriation bill, where he told 30 million Americans on television that the worst program in education was impact aid, and then they came back over here and promised my colleagues on this floor that had impact money in their districts that if they would help him to sustain his veto, he would guarantee that he would not cut any impact aid—I challenge the gentleman on the other side of the aisle to take a look at where the President used the discretion that the other body gave him to cut money from education programs, and you will find that he cut the rubella program, the measles program, he cut every health program, and he cut every education program except one, and the one program that Nixon did not cut one single nickel out of was impact aid.

I am not advocating that he cut impact aid. I am only saying that this is typical of how he tells the American people one thing when he deals under the table for something altogether different. That is the kind of dealing that has been going on in this Capitol that I say is not in keeping with the dignity of the office of Mr. Nixon that has been responsible, along with the unkept promises of previous administrations and the unkept promises of this Congress in the past that has accumulated into a list of grievances that are not going to be resolved, as Mr. WILSON said, in 48 hours. It will take time. But they are not going to be solved by sending troops or by using court injunctions. They will be solved only when the administration recognizes, not where we came from, but where we are now, and let the President use the power he has, as previous Presidents have had the courage to do when faced with similar emergencies in transportation, and appoint a high-level commission of people who will be respected for their position, respected by management, labor, and the public, and let them begin to mediate these differences so the mail can start to move. And then and only then will I back off and acknowledge he is right to go on television as he did today, and not offer a solution to the problem, but offer recriminations against individuals by suggesting that they are unpatriotic for withholding their services.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. If I have time, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I must respond to the gentleman from Michigan by saying that he has perpetrated one of the biggest frauds I have seen perpetrated on this floor in many years when he attempts to represent that the President did not cut impacted aid though he had authority to cut it. The gentleman knows, as do all of us, that the impact aid program is a mandatory expenditure. Expenditures are required to be made under that program by formula. The President has no discretion in those matters, and because this body saw fit to increase the impacted area aid over and above what the President requested, he had to cut funds from other areas in which he did have discretion. He had no alternative. I resent the implication that he is wheeling and dealing, because he has spent the money that we, the Congress, required him to spend according to a mandate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California be allowed to continue for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GIAIMO). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the gentleman who just spoke, I do not think the gentleman kept track of that bill all the way through to its conclusion, because when the Health, Education, and Welfare appropriation went to the other body, they gave the President of the United States authority to cut up to 2 percent. They directed him to cut up to 2 percent of the total of that appropriation, except for the trust fund. When the administration applied its power to the cutting, it did, in fact, cut money under that authority from every single education program and every health program except for two items. The only education program that was not cut by one single penny after the President had been given authority by that body, and we voted over here to accept that authority and we gave it to him too, was the impact aid.

The only health program that was not cut was the hospital construction under the Hill-Burton formula.

Automatic spending or the formula had nothing to do with it. Congress specifically authorized the President to cut, but after he told the people of this country what he was going to do, he decided the politics of the situation was a little different from what he had gaged it to be when he gave that political speech, and when we gave him the authority to do it, he backed down and played backroom politics—and we cannot characterize it by any nicer name than that.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed regrettable that the President was forced to take the action he did in ordering military units into the New York area to keep the mail moving.

I am convinced that many people are to blame for this emergency crisis we are now faced with. The postal workers do have, in my judgment, some very serious grievances that need resolving but I do not think they should refute the law as appears to be the case.

It is possible that this action will work to the ultimate detriment of the postal workers themselves because the American people strongly feel that "The mail must go through."

A special point must be made of the fact that there is precedent for this action. During the Christmas mail rush, military units have been called in to provide the necessary supplemental manpower required to fulfill the personnel needs during the Christmas season.

The President's action is in keeping with this precedent. Now, I hope the conference committee of the Congress will move now to finalize action on the postal salary comparability legislation in question.

The innocent victims of this impasse are the postal workers and their families. They are plagued with inflation and cost-of-living problems.

The Congress must press the conferees on H.R. 13000 to move on the measure that will resolve this pending crisis.

This is no time for partisan bickering. I want to see responsible postal improvements that will help the employees, the Government, and the people and I also want to see the postal employees get their pay raise.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am dismayed that the President has seen fit to order troops into the post offices in New York to process and deliver the mail. I am afraid this will only make a bad situation worse.

Yesterday morning I sent President Nixon the following telegram, with a copy to the Postmaster General:

The faithful letter carriers and postal clerks who are on strike are expressing their desperation at the failure of the U.S. Government to move in response to their legitimate grievances. Postal workers are supposed to enjoy security but inflation without compensating pay increases has been destroying his security, and they are reacting in a way which is understandable, even though it is against the law. They have seen many other groups break the law and benefit by it.

These men are not revolutionaries. But they may be driven to desperate action if the National Guardsmen are ordered to become strike breakers and handle the mail.

You have urged that compulsory arbitration be established for national strikes of an emergency character. Whatever the merits of that proposal in other cases, I believe compulsory arbitration is the proper course to follow here, and I urge you so to propose to the Congress.

While the disgracefully low postal pay scales are now set by law, there is no reason why Congress cannot authorize that they be set in accordance with some other process, namely arbitration.

The arbitration idea fits in with your proposal that the Post Office should be run by a corporation, and not as other government agencies are. Also you should recognize that, if the employees are to accept the idea of such a different status, they should receive much higher pay than they do now.

By the process of arbitration the long-sought goal of comparability—that is, pay comparable to what private enterprise would pay for comparable work—would be achieved.

The legislation required to put this plan into effect could be drafted by the technical experts overnight on a crash basis, and the Congress could act on it immediately.

I see no other way to overcome the present deadlock which is reaching a point of severe polarization and stiffening of attitudes on both sides. If this situation is allowed to continue to deteriorate without bold and imaginative steps on the part of the U.S. Government, it may prove to be one of the great tragedies of our nation's history.

I sent a similar telegram to the disguished chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee in each House.

Other Members of this body have recommended mediation by impartial experts, but this would still leave it to the Congress to enact legislation to put the recommendations of the mediators into effect.

The recommendations I have made for binding arbitration would, if adopted, solve the problem at one stroke.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. I thank the disguished gentleman from California for taking the initiative so we could continue this very important discussion. I said earlier today that I believe this situation could be resolved rather quickly without inflicting further hardship on the general public. Some of us have sent telegrams or other messages to the President urging him to exert the kind of leadership that is so desperately needed now. If he does that, partisanship can be minimized. So can the inconvenience, the bitterness, the bad precedents, and the increasing suffering that must otherwise result.

I include in the RECORD at this point the text of some remarks I made in the House some time ago. I have no gift of prophecy, and these remarks were not particularly unique or prescient. They are, in fact, rather typical of many remarks made by many Members for a very long time. I include them in the RECORD again now precisely in order to remind the House of how many warnings we have had for how many years of what would happen if we failed to act fairly. And to remind us as well of what simple steps could have been taken to avoid this situation—steps whose merit and whose fairness are apparently virtually undeniable, since virtually no one tries to deny their merit and fairness. Can we not then take these steps now, before we earn further grief by failing to do what is just and is now so long overdue?

The following is the text of my statement of October 31, 1969:

STATEMENT BY MR. LOWENSTEIN

Mr. Speaker, it is almost 8 years since the Congress committed itself to the principle that Federal employees deserve salaries comparable with that earned by workers in private industry. Last week the House finally passed H.R. 13000, a small step toward fair pay for postal employees, but I rise today to remind the House that that action was only a start, if we are to fulfill our obligation to pay those that handle the mail what they deserve on the basis of their needs, skills, and efforts.

For postal employees are among those Americans treated most unfairly in these times of uneven progress toward social justice. In part, this is because these devoted public servants have lived up to their celebrated motto so faithfully that they tend to be taken for granted in the public mind. On they toil, faithfully and unobtrusively, while all around them wheels squeak noisily and get greased.

But what neither snow nor rain nor sleet nor hail have been able to do over the centuries, national neglect is now threatening to accomplish. At last the dedicated and almost-forgotten men and women of the postal service are growing desperate.

We trust them to ferry much of the national commerce, to respect and deliver our personal secrets, to sort and transport tons of literature of all kinds. But we will not pay them nearly what they could be paid for doing less and easier work in other callings. We expect them to do forever what no one else is asked to do except in short periods of national emergency: to accept appeals for loyalty to the country they love in lieu of fair treatment by that country. It is wrong to ask this of any Americans. More than that, it is demeaning to all Americans when any of their fellow citizens are put in this kind of situation. And it is certainly not in the national interest to allow the wage scale of those who work for the Federal Government to become a national disgrace.

Salaries in private industry continue to rise, but pay increases are denied to postal employees in the name of combating inflation. The result is that postal employees suffer twice over—prices rise, but not their salaries. How long can we go on telling people who we underpaid to begin with, and who additionally are being crushed by inflation, that they cannot be paid fairly because if they were paid fairly it would contribute to inflation?

Even after 21 years of service, the best a postal employee can hope for is almost $2,000 a year less than what the Bureau of Labor Statistics has found to be the minimum level for a moderate standard of living. It is no mystery in these circumstances why postal employees abandon their jobs twice as frequently as do other Government workers. What is mysterious is how the public can expect to get better mail service by paying poverty-level wages to those who must provide the service.

Is it not high time we realized that one service must be to improve the working conditions of those who do the serving? Many Members of this House have worked hard to ease the financial hardships of postal workers. Each time we get our own increased paychecks, we are reminded that their paychecks remain the same. One would think the President would be experiencing the same reminders.

Someone said earlier that those of us who have been pressing for the enactment of H.R. 13000 have made "nuisances" of ourselves. Let it be clear that if that is what we have been doing we will continue to make nuisances of ourselves until H.R. 13000 becomes law, and until other reforms are enacted that will bring justice to postal employees at last.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL RESEARCH NEEDED ON BABY PIG KILLER—TGE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I address you today representing a concern which is currently foremost in the minds of all farmers in the Nation who produce pork. While it most directly affects these farmers, it also threatens the interests of all citizens who enjoy pork products and those involved in processing and merchandising our red meat supply.

An insidious disease has recently been hitting hard the swine herds in the Nation's "pork belt" killing baby pigs by the thousands. The disease is transmissible gastroenteritis, commonly known as TGE. My district is right in the heart of the pork production area of the Midwest and for the past 2 years farmers have been losing thousands of dollars a day from the deaths of baby pigs during the winter months which are the peak of the TGE season.

In my view, and in the view of expert livestock production and disease specialists, TGE is by all odds the most serious problem facing the swine industry today. It has already reached epidemic proportions in some of our best hog producing areas and continues to rise in severity with no relief in sight.

TGE first became known about 1943 and has now spread to a point where the mere mention of it fills a farm family with fear that their entire income from their hog operation will be wiped out for most of the year. The disease is doubly painful for those hit because it has reached epidemic levels during the past 2 years when live hog prices have been at a relatively good level.

TGE strikes a death blow to baby pigs 4 to 10 days old, primarily, but it also hits adult breeding stock and market hogs being finished for slaughter. It does not often kill adult breeding stock but many hogs nearly finished and ready for slaughter are killed if they contract the disease.

TGE has been running rampant throughout the hog producing area of Illinois and other States where hogs are grown. No known cure exists even though several land grant universities have devoted considerable research efforts toward finding a cure. The USDA and several serum or biological manufacturing firms have also been doing research. The disease is caused, it is felt, by an intestinal virus. The difficulty of isolating the virus and controlling it can be attested to by the fact that nearly all the land grant schools which have conducted research into the cause and control of the disease have given up in frustration. The USDA reports that only a small two-man research project at the USDA Animal Research Laboratory at Ames, Iowa, another small project in California, and a continuation of the research efforts at the University of Illinois continue.

In an effort to trace the pattern of occurrence of the disease, the University of Illinois Pork Producers Association have been conducting a voluntary survey of the effects of TGE among the swine growers of the Midwestern States. A majority of the work, understandably, has been done in Illinois.

One outstanding feature of the disease this ongoing survey has uncovered is that the disease seldom strikes the same farm repeatedly with any predictable occurrence. It might wipe out an entire farrowing of hogs one season and may not hit the herd again for several years or it might be back again next year. Most often it can be expected to strike about three times in 5 years once it hits a farm swine herd.

Extremely heavy losses generally occur among the baby pigs when TGE does strike. Let me cite some examples from the voluntary survey mentioned earlier. It should be pointed out that followup checks on the survey indicate that about 10 percent of the farmers who have been hit by the disease in a community report their experiences in the voluntary survey.

One of the counties in my district, Adams County, Ill., had reported death losses of baby pigs during the 1968–69 farrowing season totaling 2,285 on 38 farms. The losses to the farmers on these 38 farms, as estimated by University of Illinois economists, total $88,768. If, in fact, this does represent ten percent of the swine losses, an annual loss of more than three-fourths of a million dollars to the economy of a county is far too much to ignore any longer.

In another county in my district in which the reported TGE losses have been totaled, Pike County, 16 farms have reported deaths of 3,990 pigs diagnosed by veterinarians as TGE resulting in an economic loss of $131,670 to these farmers. Again, if this represents just 10 percent of the actual losses in the county, we are witnessing losses of more than one million dollars.

Actual cases of the disease hitting a herd of swine are enough to cause one to understand very easily why the farmers are frustrated over the disease as they face the future without any known cure or anything on the horizon which hopefully will bring about a cure.

Some typical losses of Illinois farmers to TGE: A Pike County farmer had 300 pigs born, 250 died because of TGE; another, out of 1,300 pigs born, 850 died; 850 out of 1,000 pigs killed by the disease. In neighboring Adams County, a farmer had 300 pigs born and lost 270 of them to TGE at the rate of 5 to 25 per day.

Another Adams County farmer lost all 280 baby pigs and in addition had 10 older pigs killed by the disease after feeding them to near market weights.

Outside my district in Illinois, in Woodford County, 300 of 350 baby pigs killed by TGE; Madison County, all 22 baby pigs killed; McLean County, 1,200 out of 1,500 baby pigs killed in 3 weeks. Just imagine the disheartening effect of day by day watching your entire income for a year claimed by death as you and your veterinarians stand helpless, unable to do anything but bury the dead.

To get a bit more recent, I list here the deaths in 10 pork-producing States between August 1969 and Februray 14 of this year which were reported to the University of Illinois through the voluntary survey in the table below. You can easily see that TGE is hitting all States surrounding Illinois and no doubt in much greater numbers than this survey is able to report. The reports shown in this table ended just as the peak of the TGE season was arriving, about the middle of February until the middle or late part of March.

Using the figure of $33 per baby pig lost, it is easy to determine the losses the affected farmers suffered in these States. The $33 per baby pig represents a direct economic loss of $8 per pig to cover the cost of keeping and feeding the sow during the year and $25 representing the opportunity loss of each baby pig which could be made at today's live finished hog prices if the pig was fed to maturity.

According to a USDA research staff member at the Beltsville facility:

The level of research funding for a cure for the disease is minuscule compared to the losses farmers are suffering from the disease.

Simply stated, much more needs to be done to locate a cure for TGE. Before much more can be done to hasten the day when a cure or control of this dread baby killer is found, more research funds must be appropriated.

Present TGE research efforts are woefully inadequate compared with the magnitude of farmer losses. I request that you consider boosting the level of funding for TGE research during the coming budget year. Currently just two full-time scientists are researching a cure for the disease from funds provided by the USDA. This is far too little effort to expect an early cure.

USDA Agricultural Research Division specialists have estimated that it will take nearly 40 scientific man-years of research to develop the necessary background to effectively control TGE. A man-year is defined as the full-time research efforts of one scientist.

If funding for TGE research continues at its present rate, no effective cure for TGE will be known for nearly 20 more years. That is far too long to expect the Nation's swine industry to accept the magnitude of losses they currently are experiencing.

A man-year of research costs about $80,000 for all that is needed to equip and pay a scientist to conduct basic research. Using the USDA estimate of time and personnel necessary, it will cost in today's dollars $2,560,000 to approach a cure for this insidious disease.

[1] Losses on 113 farms; many farms had no pigs under 2-weeks old, but suffered weight losses in older swine.

A more practical goal for stepping up the needed research efforts would be $400,000 annually for the next 3 years. If this amount of research funds is appropriated, they could be allocated and assigned to the several land-grant universities which have conducted research to carry out certain specific projects which are needed to arrive at a control or cure for TGE.

One of these universities probably would be the University of Illinois, according to the USDA Agricultural Research Service, and the dean of the University of Illinois College of Veterinary Medicine, Dr. L. Meyer Jones, has outlined for me how he feels he and his staff could best research a cure for the disease if adequate research funds were made available.

According to Dean Jones, TGE was first described in the United States in 1943 and subsequently in many other parts of the world. Laboratory research led to isolation of the TGE virus. The virus was cultivated in tissue cells in the test tube and some of its biological characteristics were studied.

A vaccine was developed for hypodermic injection but its field use proved unsuccessful because it did not adequately protect against the disease. The reason the vaccine given hypodermically failed was that it did not protect the digestive tract against local invasion by the TGE virus ingested with feed and water. This may be an oversimplified explanation because of the highly complex interrelations of the diseased sow and the pigs that she carries. A solution to this problem requires much further research before we can expect to understand the phenomena on which depends the production of a successful vaccine or other methods of controlling TGE.

Research at the University of Illinois on TGE was started in 1965 when the swine producers obtained funds from the State legislature for veterinary experimentation on the disease. Many experiments on TGE have been performed to date in the following areas: TGE virus isolation and characterization; a study of the infective process and damage to the digestive tract of the baby pigs; development of diagnostic tests for TGE; and the experimental production of two vaccines for research purposes, viz., a tissue cell culture vaccine which did not give adequate protection in field trials, and an oral capsule vaccine, or live virus, which produced adequate immunity but was insufficiently safe from the disease-control viewpoint.

These and other problems need answers that must come from the basic science laboratory before we can expect to produce a biological product for controlling TGE on the farm. It is now apparent that the TGE virus differs from other kinds studied in the past and that a new kind of approach and new knowledge is needed before a control of TGE will be forthcoming.

Recent findings at the University of Illinois have revealed certain interrelated processes previously unknown between the sow and the fetus. Administration of vaccines to pregnant sows caused certain tissue responses in the sow and the newborn pigs. These responses in turn apparently interfered with the mechanics of protection transferred from the sow to her pigs. The proposed research is designed to study the basics of these interrelated responses and processes caued by exposure of the pregnant sow to the TGE virus. A full understanding of these factors is necessary for development of an effective control of TGE.

The College of Veterinary Medicine at the University of Illinois has continued its investigation on TGE and at present is one of only two laboratories in the United States with an active, although reduced research program. The university proposes that the Agricultural Research service, USDA, be allocated money to fund research on TGE over a 5-year period which hopefully would lead to measures for this No. 1 disease now causing extensive losses throughout the swine-producing areas of the Nation.

The University of Illinois anticipates that it would share in any such appropriations because it has an active research program on TGE and because it is one of the leading swine-producing States of the Union. Therefore, this proposal lists a research program on TGE at the University of Illinois College of Veterinary Medicine consisting of three projects:

Project I. Investigators, Dr. Miodrag Ristic and associates.

Objectives: There are two objectives. First, to detect, isolate, and characterize protective anti-TGE virus antibodies in serum and milk of sows exposed to TGE virus and to determine the relationship between the time of exposure, the appearance, the concentration, and the persistence of this antibody; and second, to ascertain the roles of tolerance and/or sensitivity produced by exposure of pregnant swine to the TGE virus on the protection conferred by this animal to her newly born pigs.

Budget: $50,000 annually for 5 years.

Project II. Investigators, Dr. Wayne A. F. Tompkins and associates.

Further characterization of the virus with special reference to unusual properties and characteristics of this antigen.

Studies of cell responses in tissues of feti derived from sows exposed to TGE during pregnancy.

Budget: $30,000 annually for 5 years.

Project III. Investigators, Dr. Deam Ferris and associates.

A continuation of the TGE incidence studies in Illinois begun in 1968 by the College of Veterinary Medicine.

A study of the initial field outbreak of TGE that appears in Illinois in epidemic proportions. This kind of study is essential to explain the reappearance of TGE each year.

Budget: $15,000 annually for 5 years.

It should be obvious that swine producers are facing an extremely complicated and costly killer in their farrowing operations—a killer which we cannot permit to continue to drain the profits needlessly from farming.

The amount of funds USDA spokesmen in animal health research indicates are needed to combat the disease certainly seems reasonable and I encourage you to increase the TGE research budget for the coming year. The plan outlined by the University of Illinois and the background of its staff indicates the money would be well used by our land grant institutions and if funding is increased, we could expect confidence to grow among our farmers that a cure for this killer is on the way.

The $400,000 specified earlier is a modest investment to cure a disease that last year cost Illinois farmers alone $10 million.

Following are several farmer case histories of losses from TGE in Illinois during the past 2 years.

Listed below are swine losses due to TGE infestation of farm swine herds in the 20th District of Illinois as reported by farmers through a voluntary survey program conducted by the University of Illinois and the Illinois Pork Producers Association during the 1968 and 1969 farrowing seasons. Based on followup personal contacts, it is estimated that only about 10 percent of the farmers experiencing TGE losses report them through this program.

ADAMS COUNTY, ILL.

Losses due to TGE were reported by 38 farmers during the above period. These farmers reported they had 3,885 pigs born of which 2,285 were killed by TGE. While 1,357 baby pigs survived the disease, the loss of weight, feed conversion ratios, and setbacks in the feeding cycle resulting in later marketings, cannot be estimated from the information available. The 38 farms in Adams County suffered losses of $88,768 from the death of baby pigs killed by TGE.

PIKE COUNTY, ILL.

Sixteen farms reported deaths of 3,990 baby pigs due to TGE during the 1968 and 1969 farrowing seasons: Using the formula outlined earlier, this results in a loss of $131,670 for the farmers which reported their losses. In addition, 4,767 additional swine were ill and were set back in their normal feeding cycle for which no loss figure can be compiled.

CONGRESS MUST ACT ON CRIPPLING WORK STOPPAGES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RHODES) is recognized for 5 minutes.

(Mr. RHODES asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks, and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, the Congress must address itself to the problem of crippling work stoppages.

Whether it be the postal system or railroads, the steel mills or hospitals, the airlines or garbage collection, the situation resulting from widespread work stoppages is potentially dangerous, if not catastrophic.

It is abundantly clear that our present institutional machinery for the settlement of these kinds of labor disputes is inadequate. Moreover, Congress is manifestly ill-equipped to legislate labor contracts for the railroads, just as it has done a poor job of establishing equitable pay scales for the thousands of individual postal workers across the country.

What is needed, in my judgment, is a separate and permanent procedure for the determination of disputes which the parties themselves, after exhausting all other procedures, are unable to resolve.

On February 18, I introduced legislation that would expand our machinery for dealing with such disputes. H.R. 15956 would establish a U.S. Court of Labor-Management Relations which would serve as a backstop in the collective-bargaining process and protect the public interest against the devastating consequences of a protracted work stoppage in industries affecting the general welfare, health, or safety.

On February 27, the President sent a message to the Congress recommending the enactment of emergency strike legislation but restricted its application to the transportation industry. Of course, the consequences that would accompany any nationwide transportation shutdown would be most serious. But I believe that meaningful legislation addressed to the problem of work stoppages should, if at all possible, be broader in scope.

Today, I am reintroducing this measure with the following distinguished cosponsors: Mr. MCCULLOCH, Mr. GOODLING, Mr. LUKENS, Mr. MIZE, Mr. ROBISON, and Mr. STEIGER of Arizona.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that the Congress act on this or other emergency strike legislation as quickly as possible. I welcome the support of my colleagues who wish to join me on the measure.

H.R. —

A bill to provide for the establishment of a United States Court of Labor-Management Relations which shall have jurisdiction over certain labor disputes in industries substantially affecting commerce.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "United States Court of Labor-Management Relations".

DECLARATION OF PURPOSE AND POLICY

SEC. 2. The Congress finds, and hereby declares it to be the policy of the United States—

(a) that sound and stable industrial peace and advancement of the general welfare, health, and safety of the Nation and of the best interests of employers and employees can most satisfactorily be secured by the settlement of issues and disputes between employers and employees through the processes of conference and collective bargaining between employers and the representatives of their employees;

(b) that the settlement of issues and disputes between employers and employees through collective bargaining should continue to be advanced by and through full and adequate governmental facilities for conciliation, mediation, and voluntary arbitration to aid and encourage employers and the representatives of their employees to reach and maintain agreements concerning rates of pay, hours, and working conditions, and to make all reasonable efforts to settle their differences by mutual agreement reached through conferences and collective bargaining, or by such methods as may be provided for in any applicable agreement for the settlement of such disputes; and

(c) that when such differences or disputes cannot be settled and resolved and when such differences or disputes result in a threatened or actual strike or lockout in an industry or industries substantially affecting commerce, or engaged in the production of goods for commerce, and when such threatened or actual strike or lockout, if permitted to occur or to continue, will adversely affect the general welfare, health, or safety of the Nation, then the same must be expeditiously enjoined and finally settled, on the basis of law, equity, and justice, in a duly established and impartial court, consisting of judges trained and experienced in law and in the fields of economics, industrial relations, and the peaceful settlement of disputes.

CREATION AND ORGANIZATION OF THE COURT

SEC. 3. (a) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a chief judge and four associate judges who shall constitute a court to be known as the United States Court of Labor-Management Relations (hereafter referred to in this Act as the "court"). Such judges shall be appointed solely on the grounds of fitness to perform the duties of the office and shall hold office for a term of twelve years (except that of the judges first appointed one judge as designated by the President shall hold office for a term of four years, one judge as designated by the President shall hold office for a term of eight years, and the chief judge as designated by the President shall hold office for a term of twelve years, from the date of the appointment of the first judge under this Act).

(b) The chief judge of the court shall receive the same compensation (including retirement) as is received by the chief judge of a United States district court and each of the associate judges of the court shall receive the same compensation (including retirement) as is received by judges of a United States district court.

(c) The principal seat of the court shall be in the District of Columbia, but it may meet or exercise any or all of its powers at any other place.

(d) The court may appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, and may incur such other expenses, as may be necessary to enable it to carry out its functions.

(e) The court with the concurrence of a majority of all the judges thereof may appoint one or more standing or special masters to which the court may refer actions pending before it under such terms and conditions as the court may fix by rule. The order of reference to the master may specify or limit his powers and may direct him to report only upon particular issues or to do or perform particular acts or to receive and report evidence only and may fix the time and place for beginning and closing the hearings and for the filing of the master's report. Subject to the specifications and limitations stated in the order, the master has and shall exercise the power to regulate all proceedings in every hearing before him and to do all acts and take all measures necessary or proper for the efficient performance of his duties under the order.

JURISDICTION OF THE COURT

SEC. 4. (a) The court shall have jurisdiction only over labor disputes in industries substantially affecting commerce that have resulted in, or threaten to result in, a strike, lockout, or other concerted work stoppage which adversely affects, or if permitted to occur or to continue, will adversely affect the general welfare, health, or safety of the Nation.

(b) The jurisdiction of the court may be invoked—

(1) upon application of the Attorney General of the United States, on behalf of the President, only after all other procedures for enjoining such strike, lockout, or other concerted work stoppage under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, and the Railway Labor Act have been exhausted; or

(2) upon application of any party to such labor dispute, regardless of the availability of alternate procedures for settling such dispute.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE COURT

SEC. 5. (a) Whenever the jurisdiction of the court is invoked the court may, pending final resolution of such dispute, enjoin such strike, lockout, or other concerted work stoppage, or other continuance thereof, and make such other orders, including orders affecting rates of pay and working conditions, as may be necessary or appropriate.

(b) Whenever the court has issued an order, as provided by subsection (a), it shall be the duty of the parties to the labor dispute giving rise to such order, in addition to any other duties imposed upon them by law or by their collective bargaining agreements, to make every effort, under the supervision and direction of the court (which shall have continuing jurisdiction over the dispute and the parties thereto) to adjust and settle their differences.

(c) During the period commencing on the date of the order issued by the court under subsection (a), with respect to any labor dispute and ending not more than eighty days after such date, the court may require the parties to attend hearings and produce testimony and documentary evidence with respect to the causes and circumstances of the dispute, and to attend conferences or sessions of the court in order to consider and discuss the positions of the parties and possibilities or proposals for settlement; and the court may make such orders as are necessary or appropriate to require the parties, or any of them, to make every effort in good faith voluntarily to adjust and settle their differences.

(d) If, at the conclusion of the period referred to in subsection (c), the parties have not voluntarily adjusted and settled all of the disputes, issues, or differences which resulted in the granting of the injunction of the court, or if the parties fail or refuse voluntarily to agree to continue to attempt to adjust and settle such disputes, issues, or differences subject to the continued effectiveness of the injunction issued by the court and to the court's continuing supervision over such settlement attempts, the court shall thereupon, on its own motion, continue such injunction in full force and effect and set the matter down for immediate hearings and final determination by the court on the merits of the dispute or controversy. If the parties agree to continue, after the expiration of such period, to attempt to negotiate a settlement, subject to the court's continuing supervision, and thereafter advise the court that a negotiated settlement is impossible, then the court shall, at the time it is so advised, continue the injunction in effect and set the case down for immediate hearing and determination by the court.

(e) Whenever the court sets a case down for final determination it shall afford the parties a reasonable opportunity to present all facts and arguments in support of their respective positions regarding the issues in the case. After hearing all such facts and arguments, the court shall make a final determination of all issues in the case and shall enter a final judgment which will settle all such issues. The court shall have the power to settle and establish in such judgments, among other things, rates of pay, hours and conditions of work, and any other matters proper and necessary to a determination of the dispute or controversy.

(f) Any final judgment, order, or decree of the court shall be the subject of a full written opinion in each case, containing a statement of the facts which the court finds and the legal principles and standards which the court uses as a basis for such judgment, order, or decree.

(g) In making a final determination of any case with respect to which there is in effect a valid collective bargaining agreement or other valid contract defining the rights, duties, and obligations of the parties to the case, the power of the court, with respect to any matter in dispute which is governed by any such agreement or contract, shall be limited to applying or interpreting such agreement or contract, and the application or interpretation of such agreement or contract by the court shall be final and binding on the parties. In any case wherein the court is required to fix rates of pay or other conditions of employment in order to resolve the disputes or controversies between the parties, the court shall have the power to fix only such rates or conditions as, on the basis of the evidence submitted, are fair and equitable to both employers and employees taking into consideration, among other things, the financial condition of the employer, the wages and other conditions of employment in comparable enterprises, and changes in labor productivity. In all cases, the court must consider, as a primary factor, the national and public interest involved in a fair and just settlement which will promote, to the greatest extent possible, fair, equitable, and workable industrial relations between the parties in the future.

(h) No decree of the court relating to rates of pay or conditions of employment shall be retroactive to a date prior to the date that such rates of pay or conditions of employment ceased to be governed by a valid collective-bargaining agreement or other valid contract between the parties; and, in any case, the question of retroactivity shall rest in the sound discretion of the court.

(i) Any judgment, order, or decree of the court shall be effective for such period as may be specified in such judgment, order, or decree or until such time as the court shall thereafter vacate or discharge the same, whichever first occurs. The court shall forthwith vacate any judgment, order, or decree entered by it whenever (1) it shall determine that any work stoppage which might occur as the result of the vacation of same will not adversely affect the general welfare, health, or safety of the Nation, (2) it shall determine that, by reason of a collective bargaining or other agreement, the parties have voluntarily settled the issues in dispute between them to such an extent that the vacation of any such judgment, order, or decree would not result in a work stoppage which would adversely affect the general welfare, health, or safety of the Nation, or (3) the Attorney General of the United States makes a motion for the vacation of such judgment, order, or decree, which motion is supported by a certification of all the parties to the dispute or controversy that the granting of the motion will not result in a work stoppage which will adversely affect the general welfare, health, or safety of the Nation.

(j) The decisions of the court shall be final, unless they are arbitrary and capricious or are violative of a right conferred by the Constitution of the United States, in which case the Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction upon petition for a writ of certiorari.

(k) The court and each judge thereof shall possess all the powers of a district court of the United States for preserving order, compelling the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence, and the provisions of section 401 of title 18, United States Code (relating to authority to punish for contempt), and section 1651 of title 28 of such Code (relating to the issuance of writs) shall be applicable to the court. Process of the court may be served within the territorial jurisdiction of any court of the United States.

(l) The proceedings of the court shall be conducted in accordance with such rules of practice and procedure (other than rules of evidence) as the court may prescribe and, so far as practicable, in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the district courts of the United States under the rules of procedure for such district courts.

SUSPENSION OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 6. Whenever a matter before any agency or board established by the United States is the subject of a proceeding in the court, the agency or board, if so ordered by the court, shall suspend all proceedings in such matter pending further action by the court. If proceedings in a matter are so suspended that they may be resumed by the agency or board only if (and to the extent that) an order of the court so provides.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 7. When used in this Act—

(a) The term "commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any possession of the United States and any State or other possession, or between any foreign country and any State, possession, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any possession or between points in the same State but through any other State or any possession or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

(b) The term "industry substantially affecting commerce" means any industry or activity in commerce or any industry or activity in which a labor dispute would substantially burden or obstruct commerce or substantially tend to burden or obstruct commerce, or the free flow of commerce.

(c) The term "labor dispute" means any dispute, concerning terms, tenure, or conditions of employment between an employer and his employees or their duly designated representatives.

(d) The term "party" means (A) the employer, or (B) any labor organization the representatives of which are designated or selected for the purpose of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes.

(e) The term "employer" includes any person acting as an agent of an employer, but shall not include the United States, or any labor organization (other than when acting as an employer), or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization.

(f) The term "employee" shall include any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer, and shall include any individual whose work has ceased because of any labor dispute, and who has not obtained any other regular and substantially equivalent employment.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 8. (a) Sections 206, 207, 208, 209, and 210 of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (relating to national emergencies occasioned by strikes or lockouts), are hereby repealed.

FEDERAL JUDICIAL CENTER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. POFF) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, under the leadership of Mr. Justice Tom Clark, retired, the Federal Judicial Center has just issued its second midyear report addressed to the Judicial Conference of the United States.

I am much impressed with the work of the Center and I am anxious to share the important data in this report with my colleagues. Accordingly, I quote herewith the full content of the report:

SECOND MIDYEAR REPORT OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIAL CENTER TO THE JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES, MARCH 16, 1970

This abbreviated report covers the period October 1969 to March 1970. The Annual Report of the Center circulated to Conference members before its Fall session reports on Center activities for the year preceding.

I. THE BUDGET

The Fiscal 1970 budget, as finally approved, is $600,000, double the previous fiscal year. It is divided as follows: $246,000 for personnel; $18,000 for personnel benefits; $126,000 for education and training; $13,000 for communications and postage; $9,000 for printing; $179,000 for contractual research studies; $8,000 for supplies and equipment, and a $1,000 amount for any miscellaneous expenditures. The budget request for Fiscal 1971 is $975,000, an increase of $375,000 as follows: $110,000, personnel compensation and benefits; $50,000, education and training; and $215,000, contractual research, systems development, innovation, etc.

II. DISTRICT COURTS ADOPTING INDIVIDUAL CALENDAR

(1) District of Columbia Individual Calendar Criminal Docket Project: The entire criminal docket was divided between eight judges on October 1, 1969. With a total of 2,224 cases pending during the next three months period, the eight judges reduced the docket of 947 active cases by January 1, 1970, not including 320 fugitive and mentally committed defendants which were non-triable. This cut the criminal docket in two. On this basis this docket will be current by July 1, 1970. The judges attribute this record to the use of the individual calendar, the permanent assignment of two assistant U.S. Attorneys to each judge, the cooperation of counsel, omnibus pretrial hearing techniques, and hard work by both judges and counsel. The Center is now providing by contract with Computer Retrieval Systems, Inc. computerized reports to the judges and a permanent criminal calendar control for the District. The judges are considering the extension of the individual calendar to the civil docket.

(2) Eastern District of Pennsylvania Individual Calendar: After conducting a Center project on individual calendaring in the last quarter of 1969 the District voted to change its entire docket to the individual system as of October 1st. Civil dispositions increased 65% in the next quarter over the comparable period in 1968. The 7,000 case backlog should be current by July 1, 1971. (By "current" is meant a backlog of about 250 cases per judge.) Criminal cases are reached in four to six weeks with an average of 32 criminal cases per judge pending—one-half of the national figure. (Criminal calendars are "current" when tnere are 30 to 35 cases pending before each judge.)

(3) Southern District of New York Individual Calendar Project: By action of Chief Judge Sugarman pursuant to a vote of the judges, on October 1st four judges volunteered to test out the use of the individual calendar. Each judge was assigned his pro rata of the 13,000 civil and 2,500 criminal cases on the docket, which ran about 600 civil and slightly over 100 criminal cases. All four judges report that their criminal dockets are now current. Civil calendars have been reduced about 50% by total number of cases and each of the four judges should be current by July 1, 1970.

(4) Eastern District of New York Individual Calendar: This district also changed to the individual calendar on October 1, 1969, and now shows civil dispositions running 25% higher than the comparable period of 1968. The criminal docket runs about ten less cases per judge than the national average. This should improve with the staffing of the U.S. Attorney's Office.

(5) Northern District of California Individual Calendar: This district likewise changed to the individual calendar on October 1st. Criminal dispositions increased during the last three months of 1969 over the comparable period of 1968 by 25%, while the civil case closings were 52% higher. However, filings increased appreciably. The criminal docket is now well below the national average and the civil docket should be current in 18 months.

(6) District of Minnesota Individual Calendar: This district has also switched to the individual calendar and reports that its dockets are current.

III. THE COURTS OF APPEALS PROGRAMS

(1) Meeting of the Chief Judges: The fourth meeting of the Chief Judges of the Courts of Appeals will be held at the Federal Judicial Center on March 18, 1970. The Chief Judges have found these meetings (held in conjunction with the Judicial Conference dates) to be helpful in discussing mutual problems. In addition, they have furnished a forum for an exchange of techniques, ideas and improved procedures. The subjects cover such matters as records on appeal, screening, motions, clerical functions, use of law clerks, summary dispositions, opinion writing, rules, circuit councils, etc.

(2) Screening in the Fifth Circuit: This project has been so successful that the Circuit is having difficulty in finding sufficient cases for April. The latest statistic shows that 40.9% of the cases are disposed of without argument. Civil cases lead this list, habeas corpus and Sec. 2255's are next and criminal appeals are third. Prior to screening, 1,300 cases required 48 weekly sittings while presently 1,775 filings are disposed of in 40 weeks of argument. In short this means that two weeks of sittings have been cut off of each judge's load (about 25%) and the use of judges outside the Fifth Circuit entirely eliminated. The Supreme Court has denied certiorari in three cases in which the screening practice was attacked.

(3) Delay in the Filing of Transcripts: The Circuits are especially interested in reducing the delay on transcripts. The Fourth Circuit has drawn some tentative rules requiring appeals to be perfected without full transcripts with the right to enlarge on motion of the parties or the court.

In addition, the Center has been developing the use of "readers" for stenotype reporters which will eliminate some of the delay. Finally, experiments in tape recording are being organized in some of the Districts.

(4) The Tape Recording of Courts of Appeals Argument Sessions: The use of tape recorders in Courts of Appeals courtrooms is being explored in some of the Circuits. Through this device the necessity for the keeping of minutes of these sessions by the Clerk and the time of law clerks devoted to attending the sessions might be eliminated.

IV. RESEARCH PROJECTS

(1) Automobile Accident Study for Department of Transportation: The Center has now completed its report, based on findings of the Mitre Corporation which contracted with the Center to conduct an empirical study of the problem. It will not be made public presently but when accepted by the Department of Transportation will be circulated to the Conference.

(2) Weighted Caseload Index: The District Judges time study which began in October 1969, was concluded March 1st. The contractor for the Center, the Graduate School of the Department of Agriculture, will computerize the judges' work sheets and, in conjunction with the Subcommittee on Statistics of the Judicial Conference, prepare an index for all categories of cases. This index will then be tested out for refinement purposes before its adoption. The extremely high percentage of participating District Judges is not only greatly appreciated but should make for an extremely accurate index, which in turn will not only be helpful to the judges but also in budgetary problems.

(3) Post Conviction Remedies Report: The first tentative draft has been submitted by William and Mary Law School to the Center and circulated to the State-Federal Relations Advisory Committee. Comments have been received from the committee members and forwarded to the Law School. Work continues and the final draft will be released in late March of 1970.

This report will be the most thorough and comprehensive inquiry into the operation of post conviction review procedures in the state courts. It should be of great value as background for continuing discussions between state and federal courts. It is hoped that such discussions, aided by the work of this study, will cut down on the filings of state habeas corpus petitions in federal courts.

(4) Prison Legal Assistance Clinics at Law Schools: The Center has expanded this project in federal prisons since the need for the service has been demonstrated and its operation shown to be of direct benefit to the courts. The wardens report that these activities are highly desirable, that inmate morale is improved, and administrative problems reduced. While the programs are just beginning we find that numerically the federal prisoner petitions are reduced, those that are filed are more substantial, and the moving papers are better prepared. The projects now include: Danbury Prison (Yale); Alderson Reformatory for Women (Washington & Lee); Terminal Island (UCLA); Lompoc (USC); McNeil Island (University of Washington); Leavenworth (University of Kansas); Atlanta Prison (Emory); and Springfield Medical Center (University of Missouri). The Center staff have kept in touch and coordinated with the Bureau of Prisons and with law schools and bar associations in order to provide the necessary service without duplication or overlapping. Research connected with these services will be aimed at quantifying the impact on court work loads, attitudinal changes of prisoners, and impact on prison administration.

(5) Probation Case Aide Project: The Center continues to support and work with this project being conducted by the University of Chicago and the Northern District of Illinois. The project is aimed at acquiring the necessary experience upon which to develop volunteer and non-professional caseworkers in the rehabilitation of criminal offenders. It offers great promise in the probation area.

(6) Probation Supervision; San Francisco Project: Working with the Probation Division of the Administrative Office, the Center is collecting data in five districts on offenders subjected to degrees of supervision. The objective of the project is to enlarge our knowledge about the relationship between varying degrees of supervision and successful probation experience. This knowledge will permit the more efficient use of the limited resources presently available to the supervision of offenders.

(7) Presentence Investigation Procedures: The first of several inquiries into presentence investigation and report practices is a Center report done by contract with the Georgetown Law Journal on investigations before conviction. The report deals with the manner in which such investigations are conducted, their utilization in the districts that follow the practice, and an analysis of the legal problems present. The report is in press at Georgetown. Additional distribution will be made when available by the Center to judges and probation officers.

(8) Judge's Bench Book: The Judge's Bench Book has now been distributed to all federal judges. As new District Judges are appointed the Book is sent them. The Bench Book Committee made up of Judges Dooling, Maxwell, and Will, will meet again on March 14, 1970, at the Center, to discuss the method to be followed in keeping the Book current. The overwhelming response from the federal judges gives reason to believe that the Bench Book is of great service to them. There have been numerous requests for the Book, other than from the federal judges, but it has been the policy of the Center to restrict distribution to the federal judiciary.

(9) Complex and Multidistrict Litigation Manual: Under the sponsorship of the Federal Judicial Center a Board of Editors appointed by the Director has prepared a manual to preserve the experience that has been gained in recent cases of multidistrict and complete litigation. The Board of Editors (Judges Clary, Boldt, Estes, Robson, Becker, Will, Zirpoli and Wyatt) has prepared a manual designed to provide guideposts to judges handling such litigation for the first time. The manual has been published by Mathew Bender as a part of Moore's Federal Practice and by Clark Boardman Company as a separate loose-leaf publication. The Editors constantly review and update the materials. The first supplement is now in preparation and should be printed in mid-summer.

A study of the problem of class actions is now being conducted by Professor Charles Wright of the University of Texas and his staff.

(10) Research on the Manual for Magistrates: The Institute of Criminal Law of Georgetown University is collaborating with the Center and the Administrative Office in the research necessary for the preparation of a manual for the new magistrates.

(11) Geographical Reorganization of the Circuits: A survey covering the geographical reorganization of the circuits is being organized with the Trial Practice Committee of the Judicial Conference. It should be ready for distribution at the Fall meeting of the Conference.

V. EDUCATION AND TRAINING

(1) Magistrates: The Center presented a program on the Magistrates Act at each of the 1969 circuit judicial conferences. In addition to the District Judges of those districts having pilot magistrate projects the panels at these meetings included the new magistrates themselves and the Directors of the Center, Administrative Office and of Education and Training.

(2) Seminar for Magistrates: The first Seminar for Magistrates will be held at Dolley Madison House on May 7–9, inclusive. The program has been designed to cover subjects of concern to the Magistrates in the discharge of their day-to-day responsibilities, including such topics as Search Warrants, Preliminary Hearings, Bail, Omnibus Hearings, Pretrial Conferences, etc. All of the Magistrates presently in office and four Clerks will attend.

(3) Seminar for Newly Appointed District Court Judges: Thirty District Judges, recently appointed or who had not previously attended such a seminar, met at the Center on January 23–31, 1970, for the Ninth District Judges Seminar. A copy of the schedule showing subjects, hours, and the names of "faculty-judges" participating is attached. Chief Judge Alfred P. Murrah, who has always been our seminar Chairman, declared the seminar the best yet. Questionnaires to all of the student-judges have now been returned and all agree that the seminar was highly successful. The faculty-judges report that this is the most responsive and eager class in their experience. The Center is grateful to Chief Judge Murrah and the other faculty-judges who participated. All were District Judges, save two from the Court of Appeals.

(4) Circuit Judges' Seminars: Two seminars for the Circuit Judges of two and one-half days each were held in February of 1970, with a total of 54 student-judges attending, most of whom were recently appointed. These were the first Circuit Judge seminars ever held. The schedule, which was identical for each, is attached. The faculty were all recruited from the Courts of Appeals save for two Circuit Clerks and two prominent educators, Bernard Witkin and James C. Quarles. While the questionnaires, which were mailed to the student judges, have not yet been returned, the Center has received enthusiastic letters from practically all of them. Our appreciation goes out to all of the faculty judges for their dedicated service.

(5) State-Federal Relations Committee [Chief Justices Taft, Knutson, Kenison and Ethridge; Pringle and Burke, Associate Justices]: Following through with the suggestions of members of this committee, the Director contacted all the Chief Justices of the states to inquire whether they felt meetings jointly attended by federal and state judges would be mutually beneficial. Their replies indicate that such meetings would be helpful. The main problem areas to both state and federal courts are engaged counsel, release of prisoners for trial in the other jurisdiction, review by the federal courts of state convictions, procedures involving prisoners convicted on both state and federal offenses, joint use of computerized juror lists, and data banks on habeas corpus filings in state and federal courts [Title 28 U.S.C. Sec. 2254]. Plans are currently being made for several seminars, some state-wide and others on a regional basis. At the suggestion of the Executive Committee of the Appellate Judges Conference, the Director has also initiated plans for a State-Federal appellate judges' seminar, tentatively scheduled for November at the Center, which would be attended by Supreme Court Justices of the States and Federal Courts of Appeals Judges.

(6) Implementation of Minimum Standards for Criminal Justice: In 1970 the Center will conduct programs at four Circuit Conferences, i.e., Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth, on the ABA Minimum Standards for Criminal Justice. In addition, copies of the Standards, when requested, are sent to each judge with a recommendation that the same be cited in appropriate opinions.

(7) Probation Officers' Training Program: The Center in conjunction with the Administrative Office is studying the reorientation of probation officers' training programs. In conjunction with Ben Meeker, Chief Probation Office of the Northern District of Illinois, a format is being designed that will be oriented to the needs of the probationers and the probation officers as well. It will be tested out at the next seminars of the Service.

(8) Sentencing Techniques: Conferences have been held with Chairman Reed of the Parole Board and the Director of the Bureau of Prisons in an effort to devise a program that will keep the judges informed as to the action of these agencies with relation to prisoners sentenced by the judge. The Board is organizing a study to demonstrate new scientific dimensions in parole decision making. The cooperation of the Center and the Administrative Office has been requested and granted.

The object of the Center is not only to give sentencing techniques a higher priority but to review sentencing in the light of prison activity and parole decision making with a view to trial correlation. In cooperation with Chief Judge Hoffman, Chairman of the Judicial Conference Committee on the Administration of the Probation System, the Center proposes to organize a combination study and training program in presentence reports, the use of various alternatives in sentencing and their relationship to the parole and probation of the prisoner. The cooperation of the Prison Bureau and the Parole Board in such programs will furnish new light and enable the judges to perform the sentencing function with greater certainty and understanding.

VI. INNOVATION AND SYSTEMS DEVELOPMENT

(1) North American Rockwell Report: Since this report was circulated to the Chief Judges, the Center has received dozens of requests for copies of it. Since we did not have copies and a reprint job of the two volumes would have been very costly, a 50-page summary was prepared and has been mailed to every Circuit Court and District Court Judge. The major recommendation of the report was that a separate and distinct organizational structure be established for administration and management of all judicial support activities. This recommendation included establishing the position of a U.S. Courts Executive and the training and assignment of Court Executives to each Circuit and to each large District Court. The latter recommendation was very much in line with the Bill currently pending in Congress and the creation of the Institute for Court Management. The report emphasizes that an improved management system is necessary to achieve more uniformity and to enhance the performance of Clerks' Offices throughout the federal system. Many other areas of court organization and administration were reviewed and recommendations for improvement were made for each of these areas. The survey team concluded that a better information system and improved statistical measures were required in almost every area of court administration. However, it was emphasized that only through the use of computers will it be possible to meet many of the identified needs. Mr. Joseph Ebersole, who was in charge of the North American Rockwell survey team which prepared the report, has now taken a position at the Center as its Director of Innovation and Systems Development. In this position he will be responsible for planning and guiding the implementation of many of the recommendations contained in the report.

(2) Work Measurement Study: In November of 1969 the National Archives & Records Service (NARS) submitted to the Center its report on this project. The study was made to determine the feasibility of establishing a series of work standards for measuring and quantifying the clerical work performed by the Clerks of Court. The standards were proposed to be used as guides for staffing Clerks' Offices, and to be used as a basis for recommended improvements in current office methods and procedures. Sixteen District Courts were used as the basis for the study, jurisdictions felt to be representative of a cross section of the federal court system throughout the country. Composite flow charts of case-processing procedures in Clerks' Offices have been drafted and submitted with the report, which has now been distributed to the Chief Judges of all 16 districts. The major finding of the study was that "the essential similarity does not exist today among the U.S. Courts to the degree necessary for a workable work measurement system." However, it was stated that enough data was obtained to be able to clearly demonstrate that such a system is feasible and can be effectively applied in the management of the U.S. Courts. Since the basic steps in the processing of cases are essentially identical, the report recommended there be a centrally coordinated effort to develop and apply common court management practices and uniform clerical procedures. The first step in such an effort would be the development of a model Court Clerk's Office system which would be refined and proven by field operations in one court and would then be applied in other courts.

In pursuance of this objective, the Center is now funding the development of a model system in the District Court of the Northern District of California. On February 10, 1970, the Director, accompanied by the NARS team working on this project, at the invitation of Chief Judge Harris of the Northern District of California, met with all the District Judges in this jurisdiction to discuss implementing some of the recommendations contained in this report. The judges are enthusiastic and cooperative and work is moving along quickly to start a program which is expected to be completed by spring or early summer of 1970.

(3) Louisiana Eastern Pilot Computer Project: A master computer file of information on all pending civil cases has now been completed. At the present time we are engaged in the preparation of computer programs which will produce several experimental judicial management reports. These reports will be reviewed for management usability by the Judges and key members of the Clerk's Office. In addition, an analysis of civil system capabilities will be made to determine other specific applications in the civil case management area. The initial design of a master computer file for criminal case information was completed last month and a review of design applications is being made by Center personnel to determine the initial product which should be generated by this part of the total system. Mr. Geiger of the Center has spent considerable time in this court over the past nine months in developing the experimental approach to this project. He is leaving the Center this month to accept a position with private industry and we are now negotiating with a computer systems expert who will fill his slot and continue the development work on the Louisiana Eastern project.

(4) Southern District of New York Monitoring: The Center has started a project in this court for the purpose of monitoring and evaluating the implementation of the individual assignment pilot project. In addition to preparing an evaluation report, the project will involve working with the Clerk's Office in order to determine and recommend changes which could result in improved operations. As a key element in the project approach, coordination will be maintained with the NARS project in California Northern and the computer project in Louisiana Eastern in order to determine the applicability of developments of these projects to the New York Southern Court. Mr. Harvey Solomon, who recently joined the Center, will be spearheading this project. Mr. Solomon was in practice for eight years before returning to Harvard for his Masters in Public Administration. After receiving this degree, he worked for a year and a half as a key member of the staff which performed the Management Study of the District of Columbia Courts.

(5) Survey of Juror Management Systems: In mid-February the Center discussed with the Public Systems Management Services Division of the Westinghouse Electric Corporation, the possibility of that company undertaking, at no cost to the Center, a preliminary study of juror management and utilization in selected District Courts. It is contemplated that the preliminary study will focus on four or five of the District Courts spending the most on juror services. The proposed survey will document the juror management techniques used in each court and as part of the analysis will develop detailed recommendations for a thorough study of the areas offering potential improvement and saving. A target date for completion of the survey is April 15, 1970.

(6) District of Columbia Criminal Docket Management: The Center has contracted with Computer Retrieval Systems, Inc. for the development and operation of a series of computer programs which will produce judicial management reports for the criminal part of the court. Several months ago, Computer Retrieval Systems on a non-cost basis developed some initial reports as an experiment. The judges on the criminal individual assignment calendar found them to be extremely useful. As a result of this successful experience some additional reports were requested which would provide increased assistance to the judges. The project will continue until at least June 30, 1970, at which time the computer programs developed as a part of the contract will be turned over to the court for operation. During the period of the contract, Computer Retrieval Systems, Inc. will prepare all the reports for the court. The judges are enthusiastic about the project and the Clerk's Office is designating personnel who will work full time with the contractor to gain experience that will enable them to continue the reporting system after the contract is completed.

VII. OFFICE OF THE PROFESSIONAL ASSISTANT

(1) Publications: The Third Branch. This bulletin continues to be published bimonthly and mailed to approximately 4,500 individuals including federal judges and their supporting personnel, law libraries, deans of law schools, the Chief Justices of the States, etc. The mounting requests for copies indicate that it is widely read in many areas of the law both at home and abroad.

The Federal Judicial Center Report is an official publication of the Center and will contain articles and reports related to the Center work which deserve permanent binding and preservation. It serves a different purpose than the bulletin, which is aimed more at keeping its readers abreast of current developments.

(2) This office is charged with the fiscal affairs of the Center, including the preparation of the budget figures, writing the justifications for the budget, and making available to the Director monthly reports on expenditures.

(3) The personnel of the Center come under the supervision of the Professional Assistant, whose responsibility includes not only the handling of special legal matters and assistance to the Director, the compilation of the Center Report and the Third Branch, but covers budgetary and general management operations. The fiscal details are under the Administrative Office.

VIII. SPECIAL ACTIVITIES

(1) Customs Court Bill: The Center, at the request of the Customs Court and the Treasury and Justice Departments, consulted and assisted in the drafting of the Act reorganizing the Customs Service and Court currently pending in Congress. S. 2624 has now passed the Senate and is awaiting House action. The Director recently testified on this Bill, at the request of the House Judiciary Committee.

(2) National Court Assistance Act: At the request of the Senate Judiciary Committee the Director testified on the merits of this Act on February 27, 1970.

(3) National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Law:

The Director is acting as Chairman of the Advisory Committee to this Commission. A preliminary report of the Commission is expected in the next few weeks. The Center is cooperating with the Commission in the matter.

CONCLUSION

This month will mark the second year of existence of the Center. Its activities, the cooperation of all of the judges and the fervor of all participants in its work expresses more clearly than any report the high esteem that the Center enjoys. It has made a lasting impact on the federal judiciary and is an exemplar in the field of judicial administration. With the continued support of the judges its place in the judicial firmament shall never be denied.

It has been a personal pleasure to serve as the Center's first Director. I give up the post with appreciation for having had the opportunity to serve in this important capacity and with grateful thanks to all who have so generously contributed to the Center's cause. There can be no higher calling. I wish for my successor all that I had hoped for myself.

Respectfully submitted.

TOM C. CLARK,
Director.

IPI APPEALS TO PUPILS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BYRNE), is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BYRNE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it was with great interest and satisfaction that I read the other day an article in the New York Times describing the work done by Research for Better Schools in the field of truly educating our children.

Research for Better Schools, a private, nonprofit regional education laboratory authorized by the Congress in 1965, is located at 1700 Market Street, Philadelphia, within my district, making me doubly proud of the exciting work RBS is doing in the field of teaching.

RBS is a pioneer in individually prescribed instruction, a system whereby pupils learn at their own capability rate, regardless of "class" designation. It is designed not only for the exceedingly bright pupil, who is doing work well beyond his "grading," but also for the slower child, who might be utterly lost in the more conventional instructional system.

Admittedly, IPI is still in its developmental stage, although well beyond experimentation. I, for one, view IPI as the wave of the future in education. And when this becomes a reality, I will be able to say proudly that much of this success is due to the efforts of my constituent, Research for Better Schools, its board of directors, and its dynamic executive director, James W. Becker.

Knowing the interest of my colleagues in education, I ask unanimous consent to reprint this article from the March 16 edition of the New York Times so that they may share my enthusiasm.

The article follows:

PUPILS ENJOY SETTING OWN PACE

(By M. A. Farber)

QUAKERTOWN, PA., March 15.—Mrs. Jule Loftus, who has taught at Richland Elementary School in this middle-class Bucks County community for seven years, regards herself as a woman with few illusions about educational innovation.

She does not think that Individually Prescribed Instruction, a federally funded program designed to allow each pupil to proceed at his own pace in work tailored to his readiness and ability; is "a dream come true."

"I'd have to have a lot more facts before saying that," she remarked, although Richland has been using the program for three years.

"But I'll say this," Mrs. Loftus added, keeping a watchful eye on her students from a classroom doorway, "if I told my kids they weren't going to have I.P.I. math on a given day, I'd get groans and boos. Before this program, I'd get a lot of hurrahs."

A WAY OF TEACHING

I.P.I. is an instructional system—a way of teaching—rather than a new curriculum. It was devised at the University of Pittsburgh's Learning and Research Center six years ago. Since then, it has spread to 175 schools in 32 states, involving 47,000 students and 1,160 teachers. Few schools have used the program longer or more intensively than Richland Elementary.

Critics say that the program is costly—it requires more paper and other instructional materials—and that I.P.I. teachers are using a system for which they were not trained. But its adherents believe firmly that this program, and others that are following in its wake, could "rehumanize" schools if accorded sufficient time and money, as well as opportunity for teacher training.

I.P.I. sponsors have been asked to report on the program's progress claiming exceptional success at this stage, particularly in improving student achievement levels. But they hold that pupils in I.P.I. are, on the whole, enjoying schools more than are pupils whose classes are organized in the traditional lecture fashion. And this, they say, is what the program really set out to accomplish.

TESTED BY LABORATORY

The refinement and field testing of I.P.I. has been the responsibility of Research for Better Schools, in Philadelphia, one of 15 private, nonprofit regional education laboratories authorized by Congress in 1965.

Dr. James E. Allen Jr., United States Commissioner of Education, has described I.P.I. as "a jewel in the crown" of the regional laboratories.

At Richland School, Scott Kemmerer, a 7-year-old blond youngster, leaned over his desk in Room 111 and cautiously marked his reading work paper.

Moments later his performance was graded by his teacher, Mrs. Ruth Fest, who had been roaming from student to student. After receiving a "prescription" from Mrs. Fest for his next task, Scott was on his way to a "materials" center down the hall, to respond privately to a recorded lesson.

A CROSSWORD PUZZLE

"Hello, today we're going to do a crossword puzzle," Scott heard over earphones while a small brown disk began to revolve in front of him. He filled in the blanks of a puzzle form—he knew the "SM" in smile, the "SH" in shine and the "A" in bake but missed the "L" in slice—then handed the disk back to a teacher's aide.

Scott promptly and quietly returned to class, past hallway drawings of a friendly state trooper who advised him not to run in winter and to "think safety." The boy had his quiz graded and was soon tackling a related assignment. He seemed substantially engrossed.

A teacher in the program does little lecturing to groups of pupils. Much of her effort is given to evaluating the independent work of students, diagnosing each youth's special needs and assigning lessons—or "prescriptions"—to help the youth along from one objective to the next.

One third-grade student may be doing sixth-grade mathematics; a fifth-grade pupil may be reading at a third-grade level. Ideally, a teacher would know where each youth stands academically at any time.

According to the laboratory, surveys of 120 teachers show them to be "highly positive" about the program. Extensive interviews with youngsters, the laboratory says, demonstrate that "I.P.I. pupils like school better than non-I.P.I. pupils" and that the program contributes heavily to the youngsters' sense of "self-assurance" in dealing with difficult subjects.

The laboratory has found that on standard achievement tests, "I.P.I. pupils do as well as non-I.P.I. pupils," with I.P.I. pupils doing significantly better than others on such tests in two of six schools where the program has been most closely monitored

James W. Becker, the bouncy executive director of the Philadelphia laboratory, does not belabor the results of standard tests measuring academic accomplishment. He views such tests as an "inadequate" instrument for I.P.I.

Moreover, Mr. Becker said, in terms of "humanization" the results are "just beginning to come in."

There is, he believes, "a desperate need for this program."

PROGRAM OF VETERANS OF WORLD WAR I OF THE U.S.A., INC.

(Mr. HALEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, at a recent meeting of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs it was our privilege to receive the national commander, Mr. Edgar G. Burkhardt of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. I was privileged to serve as acting chairman that day and to welcome Mr. Burkhardt to our committee. He presented an unusually fine statement, and one which all members of the committee who were privileged to hear it felt that it contained many worthwhile and positive suggestions to which the committee and the Congress can give their attention in the time remaining in this session. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the full text of Commander Burkhardt's statement:

STATEMENT OF EDGAR G. BURKHARDT, NATIONAL COMMANDER, VETERANS OF WORLD WAR I OF THE U.S.A., INC., BEFORE THE VETERANS' AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, MARCH 11, 1970

Mr. Chairman and Members of this Committee: I would like to express my personal thanks to you and the appreciation of the Veterans of World War I, whose average age is 74 years, for this opportunity to present the views of our members pertaining to legislation on behalf of World War I veterans and their dependents. These resolutions were unanimously adopted at our 1969 National Convention in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and as their National Commander, I was instructed to present them to this Committee.

Recently National Commanders of other Veterans' organizations have expressed their views and that of their members, as being disturbed and disappointed that funds have not been made available for efficient operation of our V.A. Hospitals. We join in their request that this condition be rectified without further delay.

We are the older veterans of our country who have served honorably in a war that seems to have been forgotten by many of our citizens due to the subsequent wars and conflicts. However, statistics prove that there were more casualties per combat day in World War I than in any previous or subsequent war involving our country. Our loyalty and patriotism can never be questioned because of the fact that many men and women who served in World War II and in Korea are our sons and daughters, and today many of our grandchildren are serving in Viet Nam. In our lifetime, we have lived through a period of trying times. We urged and supported the establishment of the Veterans Administration, of Veterans Hospitals and introduced and fought for the G.I. benefits for the Veteran and his dependents. We suffered through the depression at a tremendous cost in material things. We have contributed through our intelligence, our craftsmanship, and our hard work to make our country a more prosperous and better place in which to live than we found it when we were born. In summation, no American has ever been called upon to serve our country so much or so often as the World War I veterans and their wives, the Mothers of our children.

Now that we are fast approaching the final days of our life on this earth, the problems of merely existing in the face of the continuing, ever-increasing cost of living and the problem of old age, over which we have no control, have caught up with us. In all sincerity and in all fairness, we ask that you give serious consideration and approval to the enactment of our legislative proposals.

The two bills the Chairman, Mr. Teague, has introduced; H.R. 15571 on the establishment of the National Cemeteries under a separate division of the Veterans Administration, and H.R. 15572 deals with an increase to $400 in burial allowance, which would relieve the demands upon plots in the National Cemeteries. Chairman Teague is to be congratulated for his efforts in this respect.

The two bills introduced by Mr. Haley and Mr. Duncan relate to Nursing Care facilities and out-patient treatment. Increasing the number of nursing home beds under the direction of the Veterans Administration is most worthy and necessary. The bill providing for out-patient treatment for the non-service connected veteran on pension is similar to that which is presently available to the service-connected veteran on compensation. From an economic view, treatment that can be rendered in a Doctor's office would often relieve the demand for hospital beds.

The two bills introduced by Mr. Dorn and Mr. Adair relate to the increase in pensions due to the increase in Social Security passed by this Congress. There are valid reasons that Social Security and Public Annuities should not be counted to determine the eligibility for pensions. However, this is another subject and is covered by another bill.

We congratulate you Gentlemen on bringing a more equitable and realistic pension schedule through the passage of P.L. 90–275. We ask serious consideration of these bills by Mr. Dorn to increase the income limitations and the monthly pensions in the various sections of H.R. 15708 and H.R. 15709.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure the Members of the Committee are very familiar with the report of the United States Veterans' Advisory Commission. It was to this Committee that they first submitted their recommendations. For approximately 18 months, this Commission traveled throughout the United States, holding hearings for the purpose of determining future just legislation for the veteran and his dependents. Not the least doubt was expressed as to the qualifications of these members, for the Commission was made up of Past National Commanders of Veterans' Organizations, State Directors of Veterans' Affairs, Consultants from the Veterans Administration, and a well qualified Administrative staff. The Members of this Committee congratulated them for a job well done and the Administrator of the Veterans Administration praised them highly for their efforts. They were thanked and personally received citations from the President of the United States for their untiring efforts in this field, and that their final report would no doubt be a guideline for future veterans' legislation.

May I call your attention to Recommendation No. 17 of this report that read as follows:

"The Commission recommends that pension, as a benefit for War Veterans and their survivors, should be maintained as a Federal program providing financial aid above and beyond the levels of public assistance, and that, within reasonably improved limits, increases in other forms of income would not adversely affect veterans' pension benefits."

In addition, on the same page is the background for this recommendation.

After reading this, I feel you will agree that the veteran on pension, in circumstances similar to a person on public assistance, does not receive the financial aid nor the fringe benefits, such as free medication, out-patient treatment, hospitalization for himself and family, food stamps, rent subsidy and so forth, as those receiving public welfare.

On behalf of our 220,000 members and our 100,000 members of our Ladies Auxiliary, and indeed all veterans who served in World War I, I certainly hope you will give favorable consideration to our request in approving these bills. Every bill introduced by you Gentlemen has been favorably recommended as justified, in this Advisory Commission report.

S. 2658 introduced by Senator Yarborough and several similar bills in the House are mandates of our Convention. We firmly believe, as I am sure many of you do, that we older veterans should be eligible for benefits on an equal basis as veterans of previous wars.

S. 3359 introduced by Senator Yarborough provides that Social Security payments not be counted as income to determine pension eligibility. This view is supported by many Members of Congress and we hope that we will be given the opportunity when these bills are scheduled for hearings, to present our statement.

It is ironic that H.R. 372 is held in a Senate Committee and not released for passage, in view of several facts; namely, reliable Government sources estimate that passage of this bill would save one half million dollars, and with the efforts to hold down Federal spending, there is no logical reason for delaying H.R. 372.

H.R. 693 passed by the House, nearly unanimously, was passed by the Senate, but with amendments contrary to the bill passed by the House. We appeal to you Gentlemen to urge passage of H.R. 693 in the same form as the House passed this bill, at this time.

The bills by Senator Yarborough and other Members of Congress are also part of our program. We expect to ask for consideration of these bills at a later opportunity.

Again, I appreciate very much your time and patience in giving me an opportunity to present these bills.

A FATHER'S EULOGY TO HIS SON

(Mr. CORMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, on February 27 in a Fullerton, Calif., church, Warren J. Ferguson—who incidentally is a U.S. district judge and a good friend of mine—delivered a simple eulogy over the flag-draped casket of his 18-year-old son, Jack, who had been killed in Vietnam by a sniper's bullet while on patrol duty.

The awfulness of war is always the brave men—most of them so very young—who never return to live out the full years of their lives. To the Nation, these men are rightfully heroes. To their families, their loss is the tragedy, the sadness, and often the bitterness that comes when there are no answers to such manner of death.

The honor that Judge Ferguson paid to his son with the words of his eulogy also honors himself and Mrs. Ferguson. Notwithstanding the loss of a beloved son, whose life held so much promise and who died 10,000 miles from home in an alien land, Judge Ferguson spoke quietly of the boy, of his honesty, his compassion, and his goodness.

The Fergusons created a precious family life, filled with love and understanding for each other. This is what gave young Jack his special kind of courage to join the Marine Corps, although a minor physical ailment would have prevented his being drafted. And, it is this love and understanding that has given his family the strength to bear their loss.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert Judge Ferguson's eulogy to his son into the RECORD.

The eulogy follows:

EULOGY TO MY SON

I wish to share some memories with you in honor of my son.

When someone so dear and precious dies, the only words that come are, "Why—why Jack?" It is his mother, in her patient, quiet, understanding way who provides the thoughts that make his death bearable. She says, "We must thank God for giving us Jack for 18 years. Think how lonely life would have been if we had not had him at all."

He did not have time to set records in the Rose Bowl. Surely he would have. He did not have time to create a noble work of art. Certainly he could have.

But he lived long enough for those of us who knew him to realize what a fine, outstanding, courageous young man he was. His passion was honesty, and as long as people were honest he was patient. He couldn't stand dishonesty.

He adored his mother, and rightfully so. There wasn't a night before he went to bed when the two of them didn't talk. Both made each understand the other. He always brought his friends home, because, as he said, "I would like everyone to have a mother like mine".

It was with his sister Faye that he had his first experience with violence. They were at the Ambassador Hotel, where they witnessed the assassination of Robert Kennedy. It was a tragedy which bonded them close together.

Teresa provided the gleam in Jack's eye. His sister was his dream, and he carried snapshots of her which he proudly showed his friends. If he had lived just a few more month the Marine Corps probably would have adopted Teresa as their sweetheart.

His brother Pete kept him laughing. They made each other happy. Life was good for both of them when they were together.

I think Jack knew that Laura and I might some day lose him, so the very first day in the Marine Corps he found someone special for us, that we could take into our hearts, Gerry White. We are proud to call him our son. Gerry lost two brothers in Vietnam, and he didn't have to go. But he understood Jack's tenderness and compassion and wanted to be with him. Gerry brought Jack home.

There is no one more close in spirit with Jack than his cousin Lt. Bruce Keyes, United States Marine Corps, who feels the intense pain of grief.

Jack's greatest love was children. It is difficult to put into words the vivid memories we have of his love for them. It was an emotional experience every time he picked up a baby with those big, strong hands, holding it to his chest. We learned of his death last Saturday afternoon. That morning we received a roll of film from him. It was a happy morning, because we looked forward to having the film developed. Some pictures portray the brutality of war, but there are also beautiful pictures of Jack surrounded by Vietnamese children. He was making headway, because most of them were making the peace sign.

Shortly after Jack's death, one of his friends came by to visit with us. We asked him what he remembered most about Jack. He replied, "When he used to play with my four-year-old brother".

His religious faith was never worn on his sleeve. He was very quiet, and unless you read his letters and papers you would not realize his deep religious conviction. Laura told me of one of his papers in the 5th grade. The students were supposed to write what they wanted to be—what they would like—what they wanted to do. He wrote, "I want to be alone on a desert island with God." Then the little boy in him came out, and he wrote, "And God and I would have lots of good things to eat".

In Vietnam he spent his 56 days in the outposts, and he never had the opportunity to go to Mass. But his letters would tell us how beautiful the stars were. He wrote, "The stars I see are the same stars over you". The thing that brought him peace in that war was saying the Rosary under those stars.

Jack was hurt inside many times. But the thing that hurt him most—the thing that distressed him—was prejudice. He never felt sorry for himself, but he agonized over the misfortunes of others. Prejudice to him was something that didn't exist, and he could never understand why others forgot that all men are made in the image of God.

His personal courage was as great as his love, tenderness, compassion and religion. He didn't have to go in the Marine Corps. He didn't have to die. He had asthma and was hospitalized twice in the States. He could have easily gotten out, and no one would have called him a slacker. But that wasn't his way. He never let his own feelings and hurts interfere with what he should do best. He never asked for a dime; never asked for a favor; never asked for anything but to face life proudly with moral and physical courage.

It would be an easy thing for us to become bitter because of his death, but that is such a cowardly emotion. We are sad and hurt, and life will never be the same, but we are not bitter. If we were, we would not be honoring our son.

It may be said he was so wonderful because he did not live long enough to acquire anger, prejudice or hatred. I say to that, "Never, not Jack." But if it be true, I can say God must have loved him so much that he did not want him to be hurt like the rest of us.

Finally, I pray to God with all my heart that whatever I do hereafter my son will approve.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY IS IN A DEPRESSION TODAY

(Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, this week the Building and Construction Trade Department, AFL–CIO, is holding its National Legislative Conference in Washington.

Many of the members of this group will be on Capitol Hill to explain the growing problems in the construction industry.

The problems in the construction industry stem from one cause—high interest rates.

Earlier today I had the opportunity to address the delegates to this conference and I told them that homebuilding does not have a chance unless there is a rollback in high interest rates. President Nixon should and could demand an immediate rollback of interest rates to put the construction industry back on its feet.

Mr. Speaker, the construction industry is today in a full-scale depression despite the rosy statements being issued by administration spokesmen. It is time that the Congress and the administration regarded the problems of this industry as a crisis—a crisis which affects all Americans. We must bring down interest rates and live up to our promises to provide decent homes for all Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I place in the RECORD a copy of my remarks to the National Legislative Conference of the Building and Construction Trades Department:

REMARKS TO THE 15TH NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE, BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT, AFL–CIO

(By Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN)

Thank you very much for inviting me here this afternoon.

I am happy to see you in Washington. I hope your presence here will help cut through some of the double talk we are getting from the Administration experts about inflation, recession and high interest rates.

You people are on the receiving end of the high interest rate policies and I don't think any of you are going to be fooled by high-sounding Presidential messages designed to lull you while standing in the unemployment lines.

Republicans, since the days of Herbert Hoover, have been masters at putting a good face on recessions, depressions and rising unemployment. The Nixon Administration is no exception.

Almost daily some Administration spokesman cranks up the mimeograph machines for a new pronouncement to explain away rising prices, rising interest rates, declining housing starts and higher unemployment.

Just the other day, Mr. Herbert Stein, one of the inner circle of Mr. Nixon's Economic Advisors, announced that all of these economic troubles were simply a "test of the people's maturity."

The latest figures released by the Labor Department show that the construction industry has an unemployment rate of 7.9 per cent. In other words, one out of every twelve construction workers is out of a job. This is apparently what Mr. Stein means when he describes the Nixon policies as a "test of maturity."

The Nixon Administration needs fewer high-sounding phrases from its economists and more hard-nosed action to bring down interest rates before every segment of this economy is plunged into a recession, if not an outright depression.

It is a time for the Nixon Administration to stop hoodwinking the American people about the economic facts. Just yesterday the New York Times quoted the President as stating:

"This country is not in a recession at the present time . . . We are going to take action to avoid a recession at the same time we are taking action to cool the fires of inflation."

President Nixon's analysis of the economy is obviously highly selective. Echoing the words of his advisors, Mr. Nixon states, "We are not in a recession now."

He obviously isn't talking about the construction business, the homebuilding industry, or the thousands of state and local projects stopped dead in their tracks because of high interest rates. The construction trades are faced with eight per cent unemployment and the President says we are not now in a recession. Housing construction in 1969 was less than half of the minimum of the national housing goal of 2.6 million new units and the President says we are not now in a recession. Estimates for 1970 indicate that housing starts may drop below a million new units and that total construction activity may fall off 10 per cent from the 1969 figures. And the President says we are not now in a recession.

If these figures don't spell depression in the construction business then I would like to see President Nixon s definition of the word. If eight per cent unemployment in the construction trades isn't a recession then what does it take—10 per cent, 15 per cent, or 20 per cent unemployment before the Nixon Administration stops issuing rosy statements?

Many of this Administration's closest friends are from the big bank fraternity and Mr. Nixon may well be looking at their profit margins when he concludes "we are not in a recession now." It was not uncommon for these banks—the big ones—to record profit increases of 20, 30 and even up to 60 per cent during 1969. And when you have this kind of profit, it is pretty hard to think that anyone is in a recession.

But outside those bank boardrooms, there is rising unemployment, a continuing decline in the construction industry and a continuing rise in inflation.

At one moment, we hear an Administration spokesman declare that we have brought inflation under control. The next day's newspapers bring the news that prices are up. Just last week, amid assurances that inflation was under control, the Consumer Index reported that prices rose again in February—to 6.3 percent above the figures of a year ago.

At the same time, other Administration spokesmen are off assuring us that no recession is in sight and the newspapers report that unemployment has risen to the highest level in four years.

The Nixon Administration has accomplished what no economist thought possible—inflation and recession at the same time. And the American people—the workers—are caught in the squeeze.

The President's insistence on ignoring the economic facts won't solve the problem. The President really ought to look at the economic Report he sent to the Congress in January.

One of the principles he enunciated was: "Government must say what it means and mean what it says. Economic credibility is the basis for ongoing prosperity."

Rising unemployment and rising prices just don't match the Administration's assurances that there is no recession and no inflation. And these assurances don't match Mr. Nixon's call for economic credibility.

Our economic troubles can't be solved through any simple, easy formula. It will take some hard decisions on the part of the Administration and this will mean that the toes of some pretty big fellows will have to be stepped on. The big banks are going to have to be told that the profit making binge is over and that they will have to furnish loans at reasonable costs for home construction and other badly-needed projects.

The President will have to stand up and exert his authority over monetary affairs. He will have to insist that the Federal Reserve System follow a course of action that will bring about lower interest rates and al-suffering a recession or a depression such as locate credit in the areas of the economy now construction.

These are tough decisions that require a lot of political courage. I realize that but it must be done to protect the public interest and to prevent this recession from trailing off into a depression.

Instead, the Administration continues to send up messages and legislation designed only to tinker with the problem, not solve it. On March 17, the President sent the Congress a message on "construction inflation" and last Thursday, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development sent forward a housing bill.

Many of the things contained in these messages and bills are fine, but for the most part they are just a tinkering here and a tinkering there with the economic problems that are holding back housing and other construction.

Our housing problems will never be solved until there is a definite and mandatory allocation of credit to this sector of the economy. The construction industry simply cannot compete with the big corporations, the stock speculators, the gamblers, and others for the limited supply of funds made available in a tight money market. The homebuyer—and thus the construction industry—is at an impossible disadvantage when he must compete with these fast-buck artists. And we ought not have public policies which force the homebuyer into such a situation.

For many years, I have advocated that the Federal Reserve System purchase housing paper directly from Government housing agencies and in the open market. Through the purchase of these mortgages at a reasonable interest rate—certainly not more than 6 per cent—billions of dollars worth of credit could and would be channelled where it is needed—into homebuilding and other necessary construction projects.

Virtually every developed country in the world allocates credit to such areas of their economy. But in this country, the big banks have such a stranglehold over economic policymaking that we have never been able to push through such a program.

Some of the bank apologists argue that such allocation of credit is against the free enterprise way of doing things. This is so much hogwash. Credit is being allocated today—it always has been. But the trouble is that it is being allocated all in one direction—to the big corporations, to the speculators, to the big operators. All I am asking is that a small percentage of this allocation of the people's credit go where it is needed and where the people want it to go—into housing and other necessary development. The speculators can get by with a slight reduction in their credit capability.

Allocation of credit is the big thing that must be done to save the construction industry. There are other moves that could also help along with the allocation of new credit into this sector.

For example, I have introduced H.R. 14639, which would create a National Development Bank which could make direct loans or guarantee loans for low and moderate income housing, public facilities, and similar projects. This would be modeled after the old Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The bank would be capitalized with $1 billion but would have loan making ability 20 times that amount—in other words, a $20 billion bank. This would be an important new source of credit—of big credit.

In an effort to help the housing industry back on its feet, I have also introduced legislation which would encourage the private pension funds to invest a larger share of their assets in housing mortgages guaranteed by the Federal Government. These private pension funds—which are all tax-exempt—now have more than $115 billion in assets and the figure is growing rapidly. Yet only about $3.7 billion of the total is invested in real estate or mortgage loans. If more of these funds could be channelled into mortgages, we would see an immediate and sharp jump in homebuilding.

These are programs that the American people will support if they get the true facts about our economy. Unfortunately, they are being fed a lot of half-baked ideas about present economic conditions, particularly as they affect the homebuilding and construction industries.

Many politicians who don't want to step on the toes of the big bankers are talking about everything except high interest rates on home construction. They love to talk about rising labor costs, the high cost of material, the inflation in land prices, and so forth.

But they avoid—when they can—the big item—high interest rates. It is high interest rates that have priced nearly half of the U.S. population out of the housing market and forced apartment rents up across the Nation.

People who claim that labor and material costs are the villains are just dodging the issue. The figures are there in black and white and no army of economists can refute them.

Today, a $20,000, 30-year mortgage will cost the homebuyer more than $38,000 in interest payments. In other words, a $20,000 house will actually cost $58,000 with nearly two-thirds of the cost being the cost of the loan . . . interest payments. The interest charges—the payments to the lenders—are nearly double all of the labor, lumber, glass and land combined.

So if anyone is really serious about bringing down the cost of construction, they have to talk about interest rates first.

Homebuilding doesn't have a chance unless interest rates are rolled back.

In the past few weeks, a handful of small independent banks in scattered parts of the Nation have announced a deduction in their prime lending rates. The big banks—the ones that really control interest rates—haven't followed the lead of these smaller banks. They are still sitting there enjoying the fattest profits in years. They don't want to budge until they are forced to move.

Therefore, the big banks in New York and Chicago and the other money centers are watching the Administration closely. They are watching the statements of President Nixon and his key economic advisors—people like Secretary of the Treasury David Kennedy.

These big banks would roll back the prime rate before nightfall should President Nixon walk out on the front porch of the White House and make a strong suggestion that the Administration wanted action in this direction. A little moral suasion would do the job and we could start a general rollback of interest rates and put the homebuilding industry back on its feet.

When these smaller banks announced their rollback a few weeks ago, President Nixon had a wonderful opportunity to act. He could have simply urged the money center banks to follow a trend already started. But he remained silent and the big banks got the message—they saw that they didn't have to act. They saw that the President wasn't going to force their hand.

President Nixon missed this opportunity to help the American people get lower interest rates. But he still could do the job if he would speak up and demand a rollback. It should be done today. Under present economic conditions, the prime rate could easily be moved back from its present level of 8-1/2 per cent to at least seven per cent. And, in a short time, it should be moved back to the vicinity of six per cent.

The President should act and I hope that this union will do everything to encourage him to take this vital step.

Thank you.

AUTO EXCISE REVENUES SHOULD BE EARMARKED

(Mr. FINDLEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, the year 1956 was a critical turning point in U.S. transportation progress. The Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956, which was paired with the Highway Revenue Act of 1956, represented a significant change in national highway policy. Previously, funding for improvements or expansion in the highway system at the Federal level had occurred through the general fund, a system with well-known faults. It became obvious that Federal excise taxes had to be earmarked specifically for highway purposes in order to insure that the impending highway crisis could be adequately dealt with. The passage of the Federal Aid Highway Act and the establishment of the Federal highway trust fund marked the beginning of the most far reaching program of highway construction by the Federal Government in partnership with the State governments. The pay-as-you-go principle embodied in the highway trust fund has proved to be successful, underpinning the construction of 42,500 miles of Interstate highway systems and paying the costs of the ABC Federal aid highway program.

As we near completion of the interstate highway program we see that the goals of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 have been realized to a considerable extent. Significant strides have been made in the construction and maintenance of our primary, secondary, and urban road systems.

Not only has the Federal highway trust fund been highy successful in aiding the construction of the Interstate System, it has also relieved the Federal general fund of the cost of the ABC highway programs. The State governments in partnership with the Federal Government have undertaken vast highway construction and improvement programs.

But much remains to be done. Because of developments unforeseen at the time of the passage of the Federal Aid Highway Act, primarily in the areas of rising costs and expanded and more complex construction standards, there is need not only to extend the life of the Federal highway trust fund, but also to insure that its revenues are augmented from at least one new source. With the possible demise of the Federal highway trust fund on September 30, 1972, the attention of the Congress must be focused upon the fact that highway transportation problems are mounting rapidly and a stable means of financing the solutions will have to be found.

The need for a continuing, stable source of highway funds is clear. Additions have been made to the originally planned interstate system; standards for the construction of interstate highways have been updated to cope with modern transportation needs; greater attention has been devoted to the careful location of highways in urban areas with attendant higher costs; highway construction cost themselves have increased greatly; and in addition inflation has taken its toll on the highway construction dollar.

The Federal highway trust fund has met the acid test of governmental success—it has worked and worked well. Although in some cases there are arguments against earmarking governmental revenues to specific purposes, the arguments for the existence and continuation of the highway trust fund are persuasive.

The highway trust fund facilitates long range, efficient planning because it avoids abrupt changes in financing. The highway trust fund lends stability to our highway programs by removing the question of highway financing from the arena of momentary partisan politics. The existence of the highway trust fund with dedicated revenues also demonstrates that the topic of highways is of such crucial importance that it is generally beyond the scope of partisan controversy.

I therefore propose that the Federal highway trust fund be extended from October 1, 1970 to October 1, 1976, that the revenues received from the Federal automobile excise tax, which currently go into the general fund, be specifically earmarked for the Federal highway trust fund as long as the automobile excise tax is in existence.

The automobile excise tax is a tax upon the motoring public. Long ago Congress declared its belief that taxes upon motorists should be used for the construction and maintenance of highways. Since 1956, Congress has increased the tax rates on gasoline, trucks, buses, and trailers, tires and tubes, and also imposed new taxes on heavyweight motor vehicles. These funds, together with tax revenues from highway-used lubricating oils, truck and bus parts and accessories, which were previously designated for the general fund, have been included by Congress in the highway trust fund.

In fiscal 1969, collections from the Federal automobile excise tax totaled almost $1.9 billion, approximately 29 percent of all Federal highway user taxes received. This figure shows the extent to which the Nation's motorists are not receiving their fair share of roads constructed for dollars paid in highway-user taxes. Of course, should Congress decide to terminate the automobile excise tax, this source of revenue to the trust fund would cease.

With the inclusion of the Federal automobile excise tax into the Federal highway trust fund so long as the tax exists, and the continuation of the trust fund for another 4 years, massive programs to update existing highways and construct new ones, such as those recently undertaken in the State of Illinois under the leadership of Gov. Richard B. Ogilvie, can be successfully completed with overcommitting general revenues of State governments.

The Federal Government clearly has a continuing role to play in the construction and maintenance of modern highways throughout the United States. Our national well-being and economic progress depend upon the existence of a modern transportation system.

Because of its demonstrated success, the Federal-aid highway program based upon the Federal highway trust fund should not only be continued with respect to Federal aid for ABC roads but also additional revenues should be supplied to complete the jobs which Congress and the States have begun.

H.R. 3

A bill to extend the Highway Trust Fund and the time for completion of the Interstate Highway System until 1976, and to include automobile excise taxes in the Highway Trust Fund

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR COMPLETION OF SYSTEM

SECTION 1. (a) The second paragraph of section 101(b) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by striking out "eighteen years' " and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty years' " and by striking out "June 30, 1974", and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1976".

(b) The introductory phrase and the second and third sentences of section 104(b)(5) of title 23, United States Code, are amended by striking "1974" where it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "1976", and such section 104(b)(5) is further amended by striking out "final" in the antepenultimate sentence and by inserting before the last sentence the following: "The Secretary shall make a final revised estimate of the cost of completing the then designated Interstate System after taking into account all previous apportionments made under this section, in the same manner as stated above, and transmit the same to the Senate and the House of Representatives within ten days subsequent to January 2, 1973. Upon the approval by the Congress, the Secretary shall use the Federal share of such approved estimate in making apportionments for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1975, and June 30, 1976."

EXTENSION OF HIGHWAY TRUST FUND

SEC. 2. (a) Subsections (c)(1), (c)(3), (f)(1), (f)(3), (f)(4), and (f)(6) of section 209 of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956 are each amended by striking out "1972" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "1976".

(b) Subsections (c)(3), (e)(1), (f)(3), and (f)(4) of such sections are each amended by striking out "1973" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "1977".

INCLUSION OF AUTO EXCISE TAX IN HIGHWAY TRUST FUND

SEC. 3. Section 209(c)(1) of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956 (70 Stat. 397) is amended to add a new subparagraph to read:

"(I) 100 percent of the taxes received after June 30, 1971, under section 4061(a)(2) (tax on automobiles, etc.),"

DISPOSITION OF FEDERAL HIGHWAY-USER TAXES FISCAL YEAR, 1957–69

NEW HOPE FOR HOUSING

(Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the official arrival of spring last week carries with it the promise of new life and new hope. The symbolic significance of the week was not lost on the administration, and several developments in the area of home construction also carried the promise of new life and new hope. Because the home construction industry has been so heavily hit by inflation, we still do not have cause for unbridled optimism and rejoicing, any more than last week's weather was cause for celebrating the rites of spring, despite its official arrival. But on both counts we are justified in echoing the poet Shelley who asked: "Can spring be far behind?"

On Tuesday of last week President Nixon sent to the Congress a message on "combating construction inflation and meeting future construction needs." The message outlines several new initiatives being taken by the administration to combat the effects of inflation and stimulate increased housing starts. The need for such initiatives is obvious: Inflation coupled with other restraints have made a mockery of the 1968 housing goal of 2.6 million units per year over the next decade. We are barely moving along at half that rate and thousands of American families are feeling the pinch. Mortgage money is costly and scarce and reasonably priced homes are hard to find. As President Nixon pointed out, "today, the average price of all new houses offered for sale is $27,000."

Over the past year, the administration took several actions to offset the impact of inflation on home construction including increasing the flow of funds into mortgages, improving the operation of the mortgage market and increasing special assistance funds. Last week the administration recommended further steps including a doubling in the production of subsidized housing over last year, reallocating $1.5 billion of special assistance funds to programs to increase housing starts, and authorizing the Federal National Mortgage Association to deal in conventional as well as FHA and VA mortgages.

A contributing factor in the inflationary pinch on housing construction has been the high cost of labor. As President Nixon has pointed out in his message, the shortage of skilled construction labor has been largely responsible for the inflationary wage settlements in the construction industry. While wage settlements in other industries last year reflected an average increase of 7 percent, those in the construction industry were nearly double that amount. In the President's words:

> Employment opportunities in construction will multiply in the years ahead. We must provide people with the skills needed to take advantage of those opportunities and bring supply more nearly in line with demand.

It is estimated that between now and 1978, almost 2 million news jobs will be created in the construction industry. The normal operation of the labor market will supply many of these, but it is evident that new training and apprentice programs will be required to meet this need. The President has instructed various government agencies to accelerate such efforts in both vocational education and various Department of Labor programs with emphasis on apprenticeship, veterans' training, supplementary training, Federal construction projects and equal employment opportunity. To underscore the importance which the administration places on this, the President has called on the Secretary of Labor to submit a plan within 60 days, "expanding present enrollment in Department of Labor programs providing training for construction skills by 50 percent, increasing this pace over the next 5 years."

In the area of Federal construction projects, the President has directed all Federal Government agencies to include a clause in construction contracts requiring the employment of apprentices and trainees on such projects, and further requiring that one-fourth of these be in their first year of training.

In the area of equal employment opportunity, President Nixon has stated unequivocally—

> There can be no social justice until there is economic justice, and equal employment opportunity is the key to economic justice in America.

We are all familiar with the administration's commitment to the Philadelphia Plan which is an attempt to increase the opportunities for minority groups in the highly skilled construction trades. In addition, the administration is pushing for full enforcement of Executive Order 11246 and title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, both of which deal with discriminatory job hiring policies.

All the above recommendations and programs are being monitored by the President's Cabinet Committee on Construction which is responsible for maintaining an overview on such matters, improving upon current information systems, and making its findings and recommendations to the President.

President Nixon has correctly cautioned against trying to pin the blame for the housing crisis on any one group; it is the result of a system that urgently needs reform and modernization. In the President's words:

> We must take care, in making those reforms, to treat fundamentals rather than symptoms—essentially to bring the supply and demand of labor, money and materials into better balance. That is the only constructive way to stop the spiral of construction costs.

Last Thursday, the administration's housing bill was forwarded to the Hill by Housing and Urban Development Secretary George Romney. Among other things the administration is recommending homownership for the poor through the public housing program and the elimination of the 3-percent downpayment on FHA-backed mortgages.

Secretary Romney also announced that he was ordering local public housing authorities to reduce rents for families now paying more than 25 percent of their income for housing, effective immediately.

I want to commend the administration for these bold initiatives. It is my feeling that homeownership is fundamental to local community pride and can be a spur to cleaning up our ghettos. In Secretary Romney's words:

> There's no comparison between the way . . . people maintain these properties if they own the unit (rather than) rent the unit.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I cannot resist the temptation to mention "Operation Breakthrough" in connection with this spring housing report, since spring is also a time for breakthrough. I believe it was Noel Coward who wrote, "I'll see you again, whenever spring breaks through again." Operation Breakthrough, as you know, is aimed at producing low-cost, high-quality housing on a volume by utilizing new technologies and materials. Last month the 22 finalists were announced in the Breakthrough competition, and they will soon begin their prototype housing construction at some 11 sites around the country. These prototypes will be subjected to extensive testing and evaluation and those which do well will receive the HUD seal of approval. It is my considered opinion that Operation Breakthrough offers the best hope for solving our national housing crisis and realizing our goal of 26 million new units by 1978.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I wish to include certain extraneous material relating to the developments about which I have been speaking. These include a New York Times editorial praising the President's housing message, a Wall Street Journal article describing the administration's efforts to combat job bias in construction apprenticeship programs, a news release from Assistant Labor Secretary Arthur A. Fletcher on the same subject, and a Washington Post article on the administration's housing bill which was sent to Congress last Thursday. The items follow:

SPUR TO HOUSING

The actions taken by President Nixon yesterday to revive the sagging construction industry have three useful purposes: to ease the acute nationwide shortage of housing, to keep inflation control from exacting too high a price in unemployment and to speed the admission of Negroes and other minorities to skilled construction jobs.

What remains obscure, unfortunately, is how the program will contribute to checking the runaway rise in construction costs—a rise so steep it has made it all but impossible to build unsubsidized housing in this city at a monthly rent of less than $125 a room. The situation is not much more cheerful anywhere else. As the President noted, the resulting cost in crime, disease and community decay is intolerably high.

Some beneficial effect on the cost spiral undoubtedly will result from the steps the President has initiated to expand Federal support for mortgage loans. That effect will become even more pronounced if the Federal Reserve follows Mr. Nixon's far from subtle hint that the time has come for a general lowering of interest rates in the housing field.

But these gains may be more than offset by the incentive the Nixon moves to expand construction and work opportunities have given the overfat unions in the building trades to step up their wage demands. Restraint has always been a stranger to these unions. Last year they fed the inflationary fires by signing three-year agreement providing increases of 45 to 50 per cent for a half-million construction workers. Twice as many workers will be affected by negotiations starting next month, and there is every present indication that the unions will seek even larger pay boosts this time.

The outlook for greater union responsibility is somewhat brighter in the effort to break down the walls restricting Negro entry into top-rated construction crafts. The interaction of intensified outside pressure and voluntary union action has produced significant breakthroughs.

The Administration's "Philadelphia Plan" for compelling increased minority hiring on Federal construction projects has just won its first court test. The Human Resources Center at the University of Pennsylvania has come up with an alternate strategy for accomplishing the same basic ends through direct cooperation of unions, contractors and other groups. Harvard University pioneered last month by putting such a plan into operation on two new projects there. In Chicago and Pittsburgh the exclusionist unions and the black community are experimenting with negotiated plans to hasten employment. The more success such attempts achieve, the less need there will be for Philadelphia Plans and other forms of Government compulsion.

ADMINISTRATION TO PRESS ANTIBIAS EFFORTS IN CONSTRUCTION APPRENTICESHIP PROGRAMS

(By Richard J. Levine)

WASHINGTON.—The Nixon Administration will soon launch a new effort to promote equal employment opportunity in construction industry apprenticeship programs.

President Nixon is expected, probably this week, to direct the Labor Department to make a broad review of the effectiveness of Federal regulations designed to eliminate discrimination in apprenticeship programs.

The current regualtions were issued in 1963 by former Labor Secretary Willard Wirtz. They provide the Federal certification be withheld from apprenticeship programs that fail to select persons on the basis of "qualification alone." But, as currently written, the regulations don't require "affirmative action" programs for bringing in minority-group members.

About two-thirds of the nation's 360,000 apprentices currently are enrolled in programs registered either with the Labor Department or with state apprenticeship agencies.

Such registration, or certification, carries with it a number of advantages. Participation in a registered program can be the basis for an apprentice obtaining a draft deferment. If a program is registered, an employer is permitted to pay apprentices lower wages on Federal construction projects. And finally there is a prestige factor—apprentices in registered programs receive a completion certificate from the Labor Department's Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training.

MESSAGE IN WORKS

The review of the apprenticeship system is expected to be disclosed in a Presidential statement on construction labor. White House officials indicated such a message was in the works last week after two Presidential economic advisers outside the Government said they expected unemployment would continue to rise swiftly this year.

The President's statement, Government sources indicate, also may direct that two other steps be taken in the construction labor field. These are:

Expansion of Project Transition efforts to prepare more soon-to-be released servicemen for work in the construction industry. Project Transition, a Defense Department program launched during the Johnson Administration, readies GIs nearing completion of their tours for jobs in private industry through job-training, conseling and other assistance.

Establishment of a pilot project to use the rapidly growing system of employment service job banks for placing persons in construction work. The job banks provide a daily computer-prepared list of job openings in metropolitan areas.

But it is the review of the equal employment provisions of Federal apprenticeship regulations that is likely to stir the most interest and controversy.

Almost since taking office, the Nixon Administration has borne down on discriminatory practices in the construction industry. The establishment of the so-called Philadelphia Plan, which calls for contractors to make a "good faith effort" to meet minority-group hiring "goals" on Federally aided projects, angered both industry and building trades union officials. The AFL–CIO has repeatedly attacked the Administration for making the unions "whipping boys" and asserted that the Philadelphia Plan can't work.

Any attempt to tighten the regulations covering registered programs would almost certainly enrage union officials, who have vowed to resist attempts to force them to "water down" apprentice standards. Certified apprentice programs are run either jointly by unions and management or by employers alone.

However, with the wages in the construction industry increasing 15% a year and the prices of new construction rising sharply, Administration moves to increase the supply of labor in the building trade could prove politically popular.

Yesterday, the Labor Department reported that more than 8,000 apprentices from minority groups were admitted to certified programs in 1969. The 8,000 persons, Labor Secretary Shultz said, represented a record 11% of the 73,000 new apprentices admitted.

Mr. Shultz said the percentage of minority apprentices in all outgoing registered programs now is nearly 7.8%, up from 4.4% in 1966. Apprentice programs usually take about four years to complete.

About half the minority-group apprentices were Negro. Almost all the rest were Spanish-speaking American; about 1% were Indian and Oriental.

FLETCHER HAILS NIXON CONSTRUCTION STATEMENT AS "ONE OF STONGEST" EQUAL OPPORTUNITY CALLS EVER MADE BY A PRESIDENT

President Nixon's recent statement on meeting construction industry problems "is one of the strongest" pronouncements on equal job opportunity ever made by a U.S. President, Assistant Labor Secretary Arthur A. Fletcher declared today.

In a March 17 statement on combatting construction inflation and meeting future construction needs, President Nixon said, "There can be no social justice until there is economic justice, and equal employment opportunity is the key to economic justice in America."

Mr. Fletcher said that the President not only made a strong commitment to economic justice but ordered Federal agencies to take positive steps for insuring equal opportunity in Federally-funded construction work. Mr. Nixon directed:

All Federal agencies and departments to review their construction programs to make certain they are in accordance with the Executive Order (11246) requiring equal job opportunity in Federally-funded work and to provide assistance in Labor Department activities designed to bring about equal opportunity in the construction industry.

The Secretary of Labor to review and propose appropriate revisions of federal regulations governing equal employment opportunity in approved apprenticeship programs.

All agencies and departments to report to the Cabinet Committee on Construction by July 1 each year on their programs to insure that equal job opportunity exists in their direct and assisted construction projects.

Addressing a human relations workshop for teachers sponsored by the Phoenix (Ariz.) Union High School, Mr. Fletcher noted that the President estimated there will be 2 million new construction jobs by 1978.

"What this means," said Mr. Fletcher, "is that this Nation is presented with a golden opportunity to provide employment opportunities for its nonwhite labor supply by making a deliberate effort to see to it that an appreciable portion of those 2 million new jobs that will be in existence in the construction industry go to those who are members of the Nation's minority group labor supply."

Emphasizing that such an effort "could not and should not be interpreted as preferential treatment," the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Wage and Labor Standards said:

"What it would amount to is that a deliberate effort be made to share the wealth that will come into being in the construction industry with that portion of the Nation's labor supply that has been systematically denied an opportunity to share the wealth in this industry in the past."

UNITED STATES PROPOSES HOME AID FOR POOR, NO-DOWN FHA

(By Robert J. Samuelson)

Praising the virtues of home ownership, the Nixon administration yesterday proposed using the public housing program to give poor families title to their own homes or apartments.

In a new housing message sent to Congress, the administration also urged elimination of the existing down payment—a minimum of 3 per cent—on homes financed with mortgages backed by the Federal Housing Administration. If the legislation passes, initial payments by FHA home buyers would be limited to "closing costs" of the purchase, which usually total less than $1,000.

At the same time, the Department of Housing and Urban Development announced that it is ordering local public housing authorities to reduce rents for any families that pay more than 25 per cent of their income for housing.

The reduction becomes effective this Tuesday. If local housing authorities need more time to calculate the changes for individual families, the cuts will be made retroactive, HUD said.

According to HUD statistics, as many as a quarter of the 800,000 families living in public housing may receive reductions.

In Washington, Edward Aronov, executive director of the National Capital Housing Authority, estimated that perhaps 3,000 of 10,000 families here might pay lower rents. Detailed projections, he said, would not be available until NCHA has had the opportunity to apply HUD's definition of "income" to all local tenants.

HUD Secretary George Romney announced the rent changes, ordered by the Housing Act of 1969, at a news conference called yesterday to disclose the administration's ideas for new housing legislation.

Under HUD's proposals, public housing families could take control of their existing housing projects or buy new homes with the aid of a large federal subsidy.

The government has traditionally helped support public housing by paying the cost of the mortgages used to build the projects. These outlays, the legislation proposes, could be used to back mortgages for families who wanted to buy their own homes.

For existing housing projects, families could receive government payments by forming tenant associations.

"NO COMPARISON"

"There's no comparison between the way . . . people maintain these properties if they own the unit (rather than rent the unit)" Romney said.

HUD officials have become increasingly despondent over the growing physical deterioration of many housing projects. If tenant associations decided to buy their own projects, they would assume the management functions now exercised by local housing authorities.

Tenant groups that select this alternative, however, would receive less government support than existing housing authorities would under the legislation. Another provision of the bill recommends that HUD begin providing annual "operating" subsidies to local housing authorities. Tenant associations—or individual homeowners—would not be eligible for this assistance.

The "operating" payments would be aimed at covering annual maintenance and utility costs. Rents, which traditionally supported these expenses, are providing insufficient for more and more authorities, including Washington's.

Though most of the new provisions in the legislation deal with subsidized housing, the bill proposes some important changes for middle-income families.

Not only is the down payment on FHA mortgages eliminated, but the permissible ratio of the mortgage loan to the total value of the home is increased.

The loan can be 100 per cent of the first $20,000 of value, 90 per cent of the value between $20,000 and $30,000 and 80 per cent for the value over $30,000. Present law sets the mortgage limit at 97 per cent for the first $15,000, 90 per cent between $15,000 and $25,000, and 80 per cent over $25,000.

Though the home buyer is allowed to borrow more, the change also implies that his monthly repayments of mortgage principal and interest will be larger.

There was little comment yesterday on the new Housing Act, but the revision in welfare rents evoked criticism from a variety of housing interests.

However, Sen. Edward Brooke (R-Mass.) who sponsored the amendment to last year's housing legislation which mandated the changes, criticized the administration for not going far enough.

Under HUD's announcement, the government will pay local housing authorities a subsidy equal to the money they lose by reducing rents to 25 per cent of a family's income. But, Brooke contended, the legislation required the government to make more generous payments to improve maintenance, add recreational facilities and provide guard protection.

The National Tenants Organization said HUD's action—by providing subsidies only when nominal rents exceed 25 per cent of a family's income—would actually tempt many local public housing authorities to raise their rates to receive more government money.

CRITICISM OF VETERANS' HOSPITALS

(Mr. DUNCAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, all too often these days we find a tendency in our society to accentuate the negative—we see this on our television sets, in our newspapers, in our streets, and in other aspects of our daily lives. It is a trap that is easy to fall into, and, short of that, we must beware of contributing in even small ways to chipping away the structures of our society that we have built and nutured over the years.

The Congress has built a system of Veterans' Administration hospitals that is the largest, and I believe the finest hospital system in the world. That system has come under fire in recent days from many sources. Some of the criticism is justified, I am sure. Some of it results from ignorance. And unfortunately some of it is inspired. I think my colleagues in the Congress and my friends among the millions of veterans in this country would do well to look carefully at the sources of criticism and give particular attention to the purposes that the inspired criticism seeks to further. Moreover, we must not lose sight of the damage that even a friendly but heavy helping hand can cause in a situation as complex as measuring the quality of medical care being provided in our VA hospitals.

The committee of Congress, with all of their know-how in this area, must themselves proceed with caution in unleashing critical commentary on our VA hospital or in providing a sounding board for critics whose primary purpose is not that of helping veterans receive better medical care.

We have had instances where one of the critics of medical care, using a congressional committee as a sounding board, has referred to today's returning Vietnam veteran as an "intruder" into our society, in effect a potential time bomb, possibly destined one day in the future to react not to the rigors of war, its loneliness, its fear-ridden aspects, but react with violence or breakdown because of concluding that he sacrificed himself in a "filthy, ambiguous war." It should surprise no one that this critic of VA medicine and the Vietnam war has been active in SDS and less than a week before his appearance before a subcommittee of the other body delivered himself of a lecture on "American massacres in Vietnam." Other critics of VA medical care are sounding off and in attempting to gain support for their views maintain they are, at least for the present, "disregarding the war as a moral issue."

Other more responsible critics of the VA hospital system—and more knowledgeable, I might add—can, if they are not careful, nickel and dime the system to death. A suggestion has been made—and it is not new—that our VA hospitals should be limited to caring only for service-connected patients. I do not endorse the suggestion. But if we are going to measure the quality of medical care being delivered in VA hospitals solely on the basis of an arbitrary staff ratio, consider, if you will, the puffed-up staff ratios that would result if we did not admit our eligible non-service-connected veterans.

For some little time we have had more heat than light reflected on the situation in our VA hospitals. I have not been satisfied that we are doing everything possible to insure that our veterans receive medical care second to none. Critical problems exist today that require resolution. The policies which govern the delivery of VA medical care are substantially policies developed by the House Veterans' Affairs Committee on which I am privileged to serve, under the able chairmanship of our distinguished colleague OLIN TEAGUE.

I am sure these policies will be reviewed in forthcoming hearings because they are the heart of our system of delivering medical care to veterans. The House Veterans' Affairs Committee has itself reviewed and found what it considers deficiencies in the funding of our VA medical programs. I hope as we proceed we can look at policies and deficiencies and not confuse the two.

As to the deficiencies that exist or did exist, the record of the Veterans' Administration under Donald E. Johnson is clear. They have been or are being dealt with. And may I say that deficiencies are nothing new at the VA. Those that Don Johnson is coping with were present when he arrived. I was pleased that last Tuesday before the full House Veterans' Affairs Committee it was acknowledged by all of those who addressed themselves to the problem that those matters requiring our attention today, in order to provide quality medical care for all veterans, persisted as problems through the administrations of Presidents Kennedy and Johnson. As our hearings approach we would do well to look forward from a vantage point of understanding that war and inflation have, over the past 8 to 10 years, put the squeeze on VA medical programs and have as well put the squeeze on the millions of veterans receiving compensation, pension, or other fixed income.

The President is waging a war against inflation. He has positioned himself so as to win this war. And with the help of many Members of the Congress of both parties he is making up ground. As we approach hoped-for success we are all concerned with the reallocation of priorities and resources on the national level and within the Veterans' Administration.

But we must first get our economy under control. We must live within our means as a Nation and, of course, we must do so as individuals. There is no more insidious peril to the beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration than inflation. The major part of the resources placed in the hands of the Veterans' Administration are dollars—dollars that are literally passed on directly to beneficiaries.

These are lifegiving dollars and we mean for them to have value. Most of the dollars that the VA does not issue to veterans in the form of payments are lifesaving dollars. And we mean for them to have value as well. I could think of no more hopeless endeavor, one that no responsible veteran leader would want any part of, than to struggle for and obtain more and more dollars that provide less and less lifegiving payments and lifesaving services.

There are many positives to report in the Veterans' Administration. An excellent report was made recently by Donald E. Johnson, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. In his 8 short months Don Johnson has the VA moving. The record of progress during these 8 months may be found in Don Johnson's statement to the 47th Annual National Rehabilitation Conference of the American Legion in Washington, D.C., March 4, 1970. Mr. Speaker, I submit the Administrator's statement for the RECORD.

REMARKS BY THE HONORABLE DONALD E. JOHNSON

Chairman Lenker . . . distinguished members and guests of the American Legion's National Rehabilitation Commission . . . and my fellow-Legionnaires:

As always . . . it is a great personal pleasure for me to meet with you Legionnaires. However . . . this 47th annual National Rehabilitation Conference is especially meaningful to me.

Although I had the privilege of extending brief greetings to the Legion National Convention in Atlanta last August . . . this is my first opportunity . . . as Administrator of Veterans Affairs . . . to report to a National American Legion meeting.

I know that Dr. Jim Musser, Olney Owen . . . and their associates in the Veterans Administration's Department of Medicine and Surgery . . . and Veterans Benefits . . . have answered . . . as fully and frankly as possible . . . the many serious, thought-provoking questions which you submitted for this Conference.

I can add little to the detailed, technical information which they provide. Let me say here and now . . . however . . . that the door to my office is open . . . and it will always be open . . . so that any or all of you can come in to discuss those matters which you sincerely believe require my personal attention.

I come before you today . . . not as a Past National Commander of the American Legion . . . because . . . while I am proud of this title . . . and grateful for the many Legionnaires I am privileged to call friends . . . I realize full well that there is nothing so past as a Past National Commander.

Rather . . . I am here today as Administrator of Veterans Affairs . . . to give you some of the impressions I have formed after a little more than eight months in office . . . and to report on what is being done to achieve the mutual goal of the Veterans Administration and the American Legion.

This goal . . . of course . . . is service to those who served . . . and to their dependents and survivors . . . the delivery of a broad range of veteran benefits . . . when these benefits are needed . . . where they are needed . . . and in the amount needed.

One of my first and strongest impressions is that my concept of the service mission of the Veterans Administration is shared fully and enthusiastically by the VA's 170,000 able and dedicated employees.

With you Legionnaires . . . and with me . . . they believe that they have not only the responsibility . . . but the opportunity and the privilege . . . to provide:

Unsurpassed service to those who served . . . and to their dependents and survivors . . . and compassionate service . . . that goes far beyond the bounds of what they are required to do.

It is a matter of record that . . . until just a few years ago . . . the Veterans Administration operated on the premise that it existed to make available to veterans and their families the benefits provided by Congress . . . but it was up to them to learn about these benefits . . . establish their entitlement . . . and take the initiative in obtaining the benefits to which they were entitled.

There has been a revolutionary change in the veteran benefits philosophy of the Veterans Administration. As far as I am concerned . . . this change is not only welcome . . . but long overdue.

Now . . . the Veterans Administration operates on the premise that veterans and their families not only have a RIGHT to know about the benefits to which they are entitled . . . but MUST know about them if they are to take advantage of the benefits Administration's Out Reach program . . . and WANTS them to use.

The result of this change is the Veterans Administration's Out Reach program . . . a program with which you are very familiar . . . more than this . . . one to which the American Legion and our other national service organizations have made . . . and are continuing to make . . . such an indispensable contribution.

Because of your interest and involvement in Out Reach . . . I would like to review quickly today some of the activities and accomplishments of this vital and . . . I sincerely believe . . . most successful program.

Without question . . . the most dramatic chapter of the Out Reach story has been written on the battlefields of Vietnam.

For the first time in American military history . . . Veterans Administration representatives have been giving our combat troops overseas information and counseling on their veteran benefits.

In the past three years . . . more than 1 million 140 thousand G.I.'s have been briefed by Veterans Administration representatives in Vietnam. A total of 54 VA Contact officers . . . including nine now stationed there . . . have served average tours of six months in Vietnam. Two have given their lives in this important work.

I am sure you realize that all of these representatives have volunteered for Vietnam duty.

Less dramatic perhaps . . . but no less important . . . has been the Veterans Administration's program of counseling sick and disabled servicemen in stateside military hospitals . . . and those at separation points awaiting discharge.

Since this phase of the overall Out Reach effort began, . . . more than 1.7 million G.I.'s in these hospitals and separation points have been briefed on their veteran benefits. Many of them . . . especially hospitalized servicemen . . . have been given in-depth interviews at their bedsides . . . and assisted in applying for disability compensation, vocatonal rehabilitation training, and other benefits.

The Out Reach battle has been . . . and is being . . . fought on many fronts. One of the most strategic . . . and one to which the resources, experience and know-how of the American Legion have been committed so effectively . . . is our United States Veterans Assistance Center program.

Launched just two years ago . . . this Out Reach campaign has resulted in 600,000 Vietnam veterans being interviewed . . . assisted in applying for education and training . . . or helped in finding jobs.

Every veteran benefit is important. And every effort of the Veterans Administration . . . the American Legion . . . and our other service organizations . . . to assure maximum use of each benefit . . . is essential.

I think we can agree here today . . . however . . . that no single benefit will contribute more to the welfare of our Vietnam veterans . . . and to the welfare of America . . . than the Vietnam G.I. Bill education and training program.

It follows . . . of course . . . that the Out Reach efforts to contract our returning Vietnam veterans . . . and to convince them that they should use their education and training entitlement . . . are especially significant.

Let me emphasize that the Vietnam G.I. Bill cannot be considered completely successful until every eligible veteran has been contacted . . . and at least been made aware of . . . and fully assisted in applying for . . . his education and training entitlement.

This is especially true of the Vietnam veteran who did not complete high school before entering service . . . and who is considered to be educationally disadvantaged.

Nonetheless . . . I believe we can be encouraged by the increasing rate of participation of Vietnam veterans in the G.I. Bill education and training program.

Let me give you a quick "for instance."

We expect the peak enrollment in education and training this spring to top 810,000 . . . or about 35 percent more than the number of veterans and servicemen enrolled in training last spring.

Enrollment in college level training will hold at or near the 60 percent of total enrollment which has obtained from the outset of the Vietnam G.I. Bill . . . and which has been much higher than under the World War II and Korean programs.

I think we can safely say that because of these tremendous out reach efforts that our Vietnam era veterans are better informed about their benefits than have been the veterans of any of our earlier conflicts. To me this is the more satisfying, for certainly they have had to fight America's loneliest war as far as national solidarity is concerned.

Judging from my mail, however, I would say there are many Americans sincerely concerned because of recent publicity about the VA's capacity to provide medical care for these younger veterans.

I have seized every opportunity to give assurance that the VA does now, and will continue to provide care for these veterans just as we have for our older veterans. During the past fiscal year only some 44,000—or slightly over five-percent—of the total VA patients treated were Vietnam veterans, and it looks now as though their numbers will increase to only about 60,000 in this fiscal year. The numbers will grow, of course, just as has VA's ability to treat more and more veterans each year.

I don't need to tell this audience that there have been many news stories and newscasts in recent months about the VA medical program.

I do want to tell you, though, that I do not for one minute question either the propriety or the sincerity of the Congressional committees in bringing this matter to the attention of the public. Furthermore, I accept as well-intentioned the criticisms that have been voiced by the many critics in or out of government.

Nor do I discount in any degree the earnest belief by our VA hospital directors that they could effectively use more funds and staff, for I am sure this belief has prevailed for many years.

Without at this time entering into the controversy about VA medical care, I would like—in fairness to the army of dedicated employees now providing care in our 166 hospitals—to emphasize some of the "positives"; some of the progress that is being made in this vitally important field.

First, the matter of money.

The President on November 26, 1969, approved the F.Y. 1969, VA budget which included nearly 1-billion, 542-million dollars for medical care. This was the amount recommended by the outgoing Chief Executive and by Congress, and represented the most money ever appropriated for this purpose. And all of these monies have been made available to the agency.

Then, just about one month ago, the President submitted to Congress for F.Y. 1971 a budget that included 1-billion, 702-million dollars for VA medical care—another record sum.

To the 1-billion, 542-million dollars already appropriated for this fiscal year will be added another 91-million dollars to help cover salary increases.

On top of this, the VA received approval—just today—to ask Congress for still another 15-million dollars to become available this year in the quarter starting next April first.

Let me tell you some of the things this extra money will permit us to do.

Some 9.8-million dollars will be earmarked for our dental outpatient program. We will be able to complete 50,000 additional free examinations, and 45,000 more treatment cases, thus reducing the workload to a normal operating level considering the present, unprecedented demands.

Another 3-million dollars will go for specialized medical services. In a word, this means that instead of waiting until the next fiscal year . . . this money can be devoted to fully staffing specialized units, including pulmonary function—alcoholism treatment—day hospital treatment—and speech pathology units . . . as well as an extra blind clinic, an epilepsy center, and another spinal cord injury center . . . plus more than 600 coronary and intensive care beds.

Some 200-thousand dollars will help us beef up the staffs at our six existing spinal cord injury units by 71 full-time employees . . . 1-million dollars will go into the home dialysis program . . . and another 1-million will help meet increased demands for drugs and medicines.

We are today treating more sick and disabled veterans than ever before in the history of the Veterans Administration.

This fiscal year we expect to treat in our own hospitals an all-time high of more than 780,000 veteran patients. Next year this figure should go up to about 875,000.

To really evaluate this remarkable accomplishment we need to go back a few years. Back to 1958, for instance, when VA was able to treat only 608-thousand patients—172-thousand less than we will care for this year. Or even back to the mid-1960s when we were treating about 50,000 fewer patients.

It is worthy of note, I believe, to point out that in 1958—when we were treating 172-thousand fewer patients—VA was operating 121-thousand, 200 hospital beds, which is over 19-thousand more than are in operation today.

What I am pointing out is that how effectively beds are used is more important than sheer numbers of beds. The number of operating beds necessary to do the job has been declining steadily for many years. In F.Y. 1969 VA operated some 107-thousand beds; this year the number required has been a bit more than 100-thousand, and the estimate for Fiscal Year 1971 is 95-thousand-plus—and yet we have or will be treating more patients in each of these years.

I purposely stressed the word "estimate" in talking about the 1971 figure by way of clarification. Although VA estimated when the budget was prepared some months ago that we would need to operate some 5-thousand fewer beds in 1971, there is nothing sacred or binding about that estimate. If actual experience indicates more beds are needed—then I assure you we will place more beds in operation.

Although the estimate right now for hospital beds is down in the next fiscal year . . . we will have a 28-percent increase in nursing beds in VA hospitals . . . going from the present 4,000 beds to 5,155.

Another improvement I would mention concerns the staffing of our hospitals.

Just six months ago—at a time when he was reducing employment elsewhere in the government by about 50-thousand jobs—the President authorized a VA increase of 1,500 employees, with the vast majority of the increase ticketed for the medical program.

The new budget for the next fiscal year calls for another increase of 2,150 medical employees.

The ratio of hospital staffs to patients has increased steadily . . . from 146.2 employees per 100 general hospital patients last year to 150.2 this year, and this will go up to 156.8 next year.

Hopefully indicative of VA's ability to recruit physicians is the fact that as of the last reporting date there were 5,137 full-time doctors on the rolls, including 800 scarce-category psychiatrists. This is 373 more doctors than we had nine months earlier, including 26 more psychiatrists.

The outlook for hospital construction constitutes another "positive." Following on the heels of an appropriation of less than 8-million dollars in Fiscal Year 1969, and the government-wide moratorium on most construction projects this year . . . we have asked for 59-million dollars for construction in the next fiscal year. This will be the largest volume of construction placed under contract in 21 years.

The fact that VA is treating ever-more patients has, of course, had an impact on hospital waiting lists. The records reveal there were more than 25,000 on the waiting list in 1958, and the number was nearly 17,000 in 1964. Today the list numbers only 2,700 nonservice-connected veterans in the continental United States.

Medical research funds have grown from an appropriation of 48-million dollars in F.Y. 1969 to 57.6 million dollars this year . . . and we are asking for 59.2-million dollars in the new budget.

I have not cited these few examples of progress with the intention of rebutting any of the VA critics, for I realize full well that there will always be differences among sincere and reasonable men in a field as difficult to measure as medicine.

Instead, I have spoken out in the belief that all of us need to remind ourselves—as well as the thousands of veterans who will be VA patients in the days ahead—that there is much that is good about the VA medical program.

I am well aware of the adage that the mind can absorb only as much as the seat can endure.

Despite that awareness, I am moved to tax your patience with one more observation.

Although I have been Administrator of Veterans Affairs for only a little more than eight months, I learned early on the job that a considerable amount of criticism—from a wide variety of sources covering a broad range of subjects—is part and parcel of the position I hold.

Mind you, I am not complaining. I appreciate that any operation as mammoth and complex as the Veterans Administration is bound to have lots of critics. And I think this is as it should be, for constructive criticism not only is welcome, but enables us to do a better job.

Although I like to think that I do a pretty good job of maintaining my "cool," I must confess to you that I was hurt by that portion of your National Commander's statement yesterday morning before the House Committee on Veterans Affairs in which he linked my name with some mysterious, long-range program to phase out the medical and hospital program of the Veterans Administration.

To you, Commander Patrick, and to all my other friends in the great American Legion let me make this point absolutely clear.

I speak for the President of the United States as well as Don Johnson when I tell you that there is no program—long-range, short-range or intermediate-range—to phase out, or in any manner diminish VA hospital and medical care.

It strikes me, as a matter of fact, that providing more funds, and treating more sick and disabled veterans than ever before in the history of our nation is an odd way to go about phasing out a program.

I yield to no man in this audience, including your present National Commander, in my determination to maintain—and to strengthen the great VA medical program—as a separate entity as it is now constituted.

Should there ever be at anytime in the future . . . any attempt . . . by anyone in or out of the government . . . to phase out, destroy, or in any way lessen the importance of the VA medical program . . . let me assure you of one thing.

The first person they will have to deal with is Don Johnson.

And those of you who remember the fight I led in 1965 against the VA hospital closings decreed by the former President might agree, I believe, that Don Johnson can battle pretty effectively when veteran programs are threatened.

I am the same Don Johnson. My title may have changed, but certainly not my regard for veterans, nor my concern for their welfare.

Again . . . I apologize for taking so much of your valuable time.

However . . . I want you to know how grateful I am for the opportunity you have given me to join once again a gathering of this body of great Americans.

There have been times in the past . . . as there will be in the future . . . when the American Legion and the Veterans Administration don't see eye to eye.

There has never been a time . . . however . . . and I know that there never will be . . . when we shall seriously question the other's honor and integrity and dedication to the welfare of America's veterans, their dependents and survivors

This is all any of us could ever ask.

This is all America's veterans will ever need.

Thank you.

POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. SCHADEBERG asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SCHADEBERG. Mr. Speaker, as the postal strike continues, one thing is abundantly clear: This is not the time for quibbling. This is not the time to go searching for the blame in order to place it squarely on the shoulders of the administration, on the unions, or on the striking workers. The important thing is to realize why we are in this mess which threatens our economy and to move swiftly to correct the problem areas.

Congress has the authority to regulate the postal system. It is our responsibility to see that things are done in this area as expeditiously and efficiently as possible. There is no question that we have created an inefficient postal department and have contributed to the tremendous deficit under which the postal department has been forced to operate for years.

The postal department, like all others, has been created to do a public service. Yet, we have expanded the areas of involvement to the point that the Department is incapable of doing its main job and purpose—delivering the mails. The result has been to create a tremendous deficit that has been pushed onto the shoulders of the postal workers.

Let us examine certain of these. First of all, the franking privileges which we as Members of Congress enjoy should not be charged to the administration of the postal department, but to the House and Senate administration appropriations. The mailing privileges of the various departments and agencies should not be charged to the postal department. They should be borne by the respective departments and agencies. Each should pay its own way. The postal department should not be required to administrate pornographic mailings. The Justice Department would be the more appropriate agency.

As a result of the Department being forced to bear the administrative costs, that do not relate to delivery of the mails, the postal department has a hard time in clearing the cost of the mails. I have heard mention that we cannot give higher wages at this time because of the inflationary effect, but it is abundantly clear that we can give better wages and better working conditions without being inflationary if Congress would only address itself to the actual purpose of the Department—the delivery of the mails.

No one would question that the Department of Defense must bear all of its own expenses. It is not so required because it deals in a service—the defense of our Nation. Why then insist that the service provided by the postal department be any different? We constantly try to reduce the excess costs of the Defense Department. We can do the same with the postal department.

In the same fashion that we do not require that the men serving in the military make up for the deficit spending in the Defense Department, why then must we require the 750,000 postal employees, the men and the women who move the mails, to carry the burdens of this inefficient program that is a result of Congress' failure to act.

I believe that it does no good at this time to question whether Congress should legislate under the threat of a strike. Those persons who have engaged in this strike can be dealt with by the law after the mails are moving once again. But we must not make them the whipping boys for Congress' failures.

I firmly believe that it is Congress' responsibility to act now on the postal workers' salary schedules. The matter can take under consideration the needed reform at a later time, without undue reform.

We have the constitutional authority to regulate the mails. We must act now.

BRINKMANSHIP AND THE LETTER CARRIERS' STRIKE

(Mr. ADDABBO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I am very disturbed over the policy of brinkmanship which the President has adopted in handling the mail carriers' strike.

The House of Representatives met its constitutional obligations last year and passed a postal pay bill but the President, by his threat of a veto and insistence on postal reform, has crippled Senate action on the measure. Congress has adopted a policy of "comparability" in postal pay measures and the President has failed to meet his responsibility to report to Congress on pay scales for postal employees comparable to private industry.

Title 5, United States Code, sections 5301 and 5302, passed in the 1962 postal pay bill, states:

It is the policy of Congress that federal pay fixing be based on the principles that (1) there be equal pay for substantially equal work and pay distinction be maintained in keeping with work and performance distinctions; and (2) Federal pay rates be comparable with private enterprise pay rates for the same level of work.

The President shall (1) direct an agency to prepare and submit to him annually a report which compares the rates of pay for federal employees with the same levels of work in private industry as determined by an annuel survey by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Considering the views of employee organizations, he shall report annually to congress this comparison of federal and private industry rates and make such recommendations for revision of statute regarding pay schedules as he considers advisable.

I urge the President to address himself to the real issues involved in this crisis—to pledge his efforts to achieve comparable pay for postal workers and to admit that postal reform, while a high priority, is a separate subject. This is the only way the President can meet his constitutional obligation without aggravating an already dangerous situation.

Mr. Speaker, I call to the attention of my colleagues in the House an editorial which appeared in the March 21 edition of the Long Island Press. I include the text of the editorial in the RECORD at this point:

THE BITTER FRUIT OF INDIFFERENCE

No one—not even the strikers themselves—condones a walkout of the dimensions and disastrous implications of the postal strike, but as Francis S. Filbey, president of the AFL–CIO United Federation of Postal Clerks, said yesterday, "the public ought to know that this work stoppage is the bitter fruit of low wages and intolerable working conditions."

He might well have added governmental indifference and callousness.

The postmen have been pleading for a wage increase for a long, long time, but they have been squeezed in a power play between the President and Congress. Only Congress can grant the pay increase, but legislation has been stalled since last December because of President Nixon's insistence that it be tied to his postal reform proposal.

Why should reform be tied to what these men need to support their families? It is easy to condemn the strikers for putting pressure on everybody else to make their case. After all, this is against the law. But why is there no law to protect men in such a situation from being pawns in another battle?

Not only were they caught in this bind, but they had to struggle all this time on wages at the bottom of the governmental pay scale, and far below comparable work in the private sector. With inflation growing as fast as it is, these are the people who feel the pinch first and hardest.

COMMENTS ON BLS FEBRUARY COST OF LIVING REPORT

(Mr. ALBERT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of Labor Statistics report that the cost of living surged further upward during February, the sharpest increases being for food, clothing, and shelter, is but one more communique picturing another disastrous route in President Nixon's "no win" war against inflation. Press Secretary Ronald Ziegler's Pollyanna pronouncement from the White House, "every indicator that we have is that inflation is coming under control," is little short of tragic mockery. The mother vainly trying to stretch her devaluated dollar to outfit her children for Easter will find little solace in Mr. Ziegler's consoling words. The American housewife on her weekly shopping trip to the supermarket will find his remarks bereft of comfort. If her husband has been laid off or finds himself on a reduced workweek, she may well question whether or not she and Mr. Ziegler dwell in the same world. The young couple, who after years of sacrifice have finally purchased a home only to find themselves saddled with unconscionable interest payments, will certainly find the Press Secretary's comments both irrelevant and in poor taste. In order to meet their inflated mortgage payments, this couple will now be required to deny their children the amenities and, yes, in some cases, the necessities of life. The money which might have been used for Mary's piano lessons or the orthodontic treatment Jackie so urgently needs, must now go to pay the high interest tribute which this administration has levied on the American family of modest means.

The economic policies being pursued by the Republican administration are demonstrably an unqualified failure. Of far greater consequences, however, are their demeaning results on the quality of American family life.

INFLATION

(Mr. McCORMACK (at the request of Mr. ALBERT) was granted permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the cost of living rose once again in February, and the rate of increase was the sharpest in 20 years.

The administration, oblivious to the human effects of its inflationary policies, tried to delude the public with statements that inflation is being controlled.

Spokesmen at the White House said that inflation was defeated. The President, once again, said his policies are working.

The record speaks otherwise. In the period Mr. Nixon has held office, this Nation has seen a sharp increase in inflation, big jumps in unemployment, and a constant recessionary trend.

Talking about curing inflation will not cure the problem. The housewife knows that President Nixon's statement that inflation is under control is not correct when she finds posted price increases every time she visits the grocery store. The small businessman who has to pay excessive interest rates for money to stay in business will not believe it.

The millions who remember the series of comments of White House spokesmen, going back more than a year, that inflation was being controlled will also not believe it.

This Congress has provided the President with powers that need to be used in the fight against inflation. The President also must bring to bear the powers of the office he holds against the spiraling price increases of big concentrated industries, if there is to be effective Government action against rising prices.

Rhetoric will not reverse the inflationary spiral which is costing this Nation so dearly. President Nixon should use the authority which Congress gave him, and the powers of his office, to bring stability to our economy.

The large financial interests may not feel inflation's sharp bite, but the family of modest and middle income suffers daily from its effects. This Congress stands ready to work with the Executive in any sincere effort to combat the ever-increasing cost of living.

PEACE RESOLUTIONS OF THE GREATER MIAMI JEWISH FEDERATION

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, it is with apprehension that I have been observing the worsening situation in the Middle East and with sadness that I have seen the administration inflict an unjust and almost "punishing" policy on our most staunch ally and friend, Israel.

As Americans concerned with peace and safety, the Greater Miami Jewish Federation, representing over 200,000 Jews in Dade County, has recently expressed its anxiety over the administration's policy changes in the Middle East in the text of five resolutions.

I wish at this time to present these resolutions with the accompanying letter, transmitted to me by Mr. Morton Silberman, chairman of the community relations committee of the Greater Miami Jewish Federation, and to affirm my own commitment to our historic role of assistance and friendship to Israel.

The material follows:

GREATER MIAMI JEWISH FEDERATION,
March 18, 1970.

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PEPPER: We are hereby transmitting to you five resolutions passed at our Organizational Conference on the Middle East held in Miami on the 1st of March.

At the same time we wish to express our appreciation to you for the support you have given to the State and the people of Israel, and especially for your understanding of the fact that to help Israel is beneficial to the aims and purposes of our own United States.

Sincerely yours,

MORTON SILBERMAN,
Chairman, Community Relations Committee.

RESOLUTION No. 1

The delegates of the Dade County Jewish Organizations representing over 200,000 Jews in Dade County assembled in Miami, Florida on March 1, 1970, to express their deep anxiety over the direction of the Department of State and its policies in the Middle East.

We, as Americans, are profoundly concerned for our country's national interest and we share all mankind's yearning for peace.

Since the founding of the State of Israel, the people and government of the United States have affirmed their interest in America and have affirmed that it is in America's national interest to support the sovereignty and security of Israel.

We have read President Nixon's message to the National Emergency Conference on Peace in the Middle East this past January and note with satisfaction his statements of friendship, understanding and support for Israel. We also note that the President has stated that "the United States does not intend to negotiate the terms of peace." This follows his earlier statement that the Four Powers "cannot dictate a settlement in the Middle East."

We believe that the attempts of the Four Powers to draft the framework for a settlement have in fact impeded the progress toward peace.

We believe that the specific proposals submitted in December by our State Department, which suggest pre-determined borders between Israel and Egypt, and with Jordan, and that Jordan share in the administration of Jerusalem, and that there be a repatriation of Arab refugees which would flood Israel with a fifth column bent upon its destruction—that all of these endanger the security of Israel and imperil the cause of a lasting peace in the Middle East.

We therefore resolve to call upon Secretary of State Rogers to withdraw these proposals so that Arab Israeli direct negotiations (which have been called for by President Nixon) be undertaken without any preconditions. We believe that the role of America is to bring the parties together in direct negotiations: to stand firm against Soviet pressure; and to provide Israel with sufficient economic and military strength to deter any further Arab aggression.

RESOLUTION No. 2

We, the delegates of the Dade County Jewish organizations, assembled in Miami, Florida, on March 1, 1970, noting the historic friendship between the peoples and governments of the United States of America and the State of Israel, and applauding their respective efforts to promote world peace and secure an end to a state of war in the Middle East, do hereby resolve that:

1. The United States continue to supply economic and military assistance to the State of Israel in sufficient time, quality and quantity to obtain and maintain a balance of arms in the Middle East between Israel and her belligerent Arab neighbors; and that

2. The United States make a concerted effort, independently and through the United Nations, to secure face-to-face negotiations between Israel and the Arab States with no pre-conditions by either side; and that

3. The United States continue its participation in the so-called Big Four talks on the Middle East only so long as it specifies that there be no imposed settlement upon either Israel or the Arab States.

RESOLUTION No. 3

The delegates of the Dade County Jewish organizations, assembled in Miami, Florida, March 1, 1970, concerned with achieving peace in the Middle East and deeply perturbed by anti-Israel actions of French President George Pompidou:

1. Applaud the stand of the French press and people in publicly and vigorously opposing the Middle East policy of President Pompidou, and recall the historic friendship between France and Israel; and

2. Urge that France cancel the sale of 110 jet fighter planes to Libya, which sale would further increase the arms imbalance in the Middle East in favor of the Arabs; and

3. Call upon France to allow delivery to Israel of the 50 Mirage planes purchased and paid for by Israel prior to June, 1967.

RESOLUTION No. 4

The delegates of the Dade County Jewish Organizations assembled in Miami, Florida, on March 1, 1970, after noting the acts of terrorism against innocent civilians, Israelis, Americans, and citizens of other countries by Arab guerrillas, and noting that these acts are being committed not only in Israel, but also in Switzerland, Greece, Germany and other places:

1. Condemn these acts and all acts of air piracy committed by any or all nations or by their nationalis with their connivance as uncivilized and barbaric, and call upon the free nations of the world to join in such condemnation; and

2. Call upon the free nations and upon all world airlines to continue passenger, freight, and mail flights to Israel; and

3. Call upon these nations and airlines to bar all flights to Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Algeria, and Libya, until the Arab States take positive and effective action to end any and all additional acts of terrorism and air piracy.

RESOLUTION No. 5

The delegates of the Dade County Jewish organizations, assembled in Miami, Florida, on March 1, 1970, acknowledging the fortitude, and the vigorous and speedy action of Switzerland in acting against Arab nationals within her borders:

1. Note that the Swiss Government thereby formally recognized the relationships between the belligerent Arab States and the Palestinian terrorists, without which the Arab guerrillas could not be maintained; and

2. Do herewith commend the action of the people and Government of Switzerland in promoting world peace and ending acts of indiscriminate murder against innocent civilians.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S REFUSAL TO RECOGNIZE ISRAEL'S NEEDS FOR SURVIVAL

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, the administration's position in declining Israel's request for a commitment of additional fighter planes now is, I am very much afraid, going to encourage aggression against Israel and create a greater risk of war in the Middle East. In view of the declared determination of the Arab nations, aided by Russia, to destroy Israel, the only way there can be any hope of either the survival of Israel or peace in the Middle East is for the United States either physically to maintain the defensive force of Israel at a level in all critical weapons which will discourage aggression by the Arabs because it would be in vain; or for the United States to give positive and clear-cut notice to Russia that we will supply immediately, when needed, all the weapons Israel may need at all times to assure that she can successfully repel any aggression against her.

Our administration has done neither.

As long as we equivocate and dodge the issue of what we are going to do, we encourage the danger of Arab aggression which may well lead to the outbreak of a full-scale world war.

While the administration declines to send planes to Israel, the Russians are sending the most effective antiaircraft weapons to Egypt. And still we do not state a definite position as to what we are doing or going to do.

Only a little while ago, the situation was made worse in the Middle East by the position the United States took, giving the impression that we were trying to force a settlement upon the parties there, rather than putting all of our efforts into a program to try to get the contending parties face to face in negotiations.

I am afraid that this move is also going to cause a dangerous situation to deteriorate more. I hope the administration will promptly take a more clear-cut position in the interest of peace in the Middle East and in the world.

PEP PILL QUOTA—AN URGENT NEED

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would like to remind my colleagues of three bills now pending before the Subcommittee on Public Health and Welfare of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

These bills deal with the overproduction of amphetamines, or pep pills, and were all introduced by members of the Select Committee on Crime as a result of information developed during a series of hearings held by the committee across the country.

H.R. 16123, introduced by myself, Congresswoman MARTHA GRIFFITHS, Mr. ROBERT NIX, and Mr. JEROME WALDIE, would establish a quota system for the production of amphetamines in this country. It would also tighten up production and distribution controls so that we may be certain that legally produced amphetamines are produced legally.

Congressman CHARLES WIGGINS' bill, H.R. 16118, is identical to our bill, but also contains a no-knock search warrant provision. Congressman ROBERT V. DENNEY'S bill is similar to Mr. WIGGINS', but deletes the quota provision.

Our committee is convinced we need this legislation now. We have conveyed our concern to the subcommittee, and so that you may share our testimony, I ask that our remarks be printed in the RECORD at this point:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE CLAUDE PEPPER, CHAIRMAN, HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON CRIME

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, I very much appreciate the opportunity that you gentlemen have afforded me this morning.

As you know, my Bill H.R. 16123 is before your Committee. I was pleased that Congresswoman Griffiths, Mr. Nix and Mr. Waldie also joined in that bill as co-spsonsors. Congressman Wiggins, also of our House Select Committee on Crime has introduced H.R. 16151 which is also before your Committee. Mr. Wiggins' bill is identical to ours except that it includes a "no-knock" provision dealing with search warrants. Congressman Denney of our Committee has introduced H.R. 16118 which, except for production quotas and the designation of the Attorney General rather than the Secretary of H.E.W. to determine which substances should be controlled, is identical to Mr. Wiggins' bill.

All of us join in support of H.R. 13743 which was introduced by your distinguished Chairman, Mr. Staggers. However, we feel that this bill which is similar to S. 3246 which passed the Senate last December, does not go far enough in attempting to combat this extremely difficult problem.

As you perhaps know, our Committee held hearings here in Washington, D.C. and in several cities throughout the country. Substantial portions of those hearings were devoted to the subject of narcotics and dangerous drugs. The House Select Committee on Crime, which I am privileged to serve as Chairman, also held hearings in Boston,

Omaha, San Francisco, Columbia, South Carolina and Miami during the past year. We have just concluded four days of hearings in Metropolitan Washington, D.C. In every city that we visited, it was conclusively shown that, with the exception of San Francisco the drug problem has grown by leaps and bounds within just the last two years. San Francisco has been faced with a large problem for the last five years.

It is my understanding that narcotics and marihuana are not before the Committee at this time. For that reason, my remarks will be limited to amphetamines, barbiturates, tranquilizers and hallucinogens which are the substances covered in H.R. 16123. Our bill is essentially the Senate passed bill with narcotics and marihuana deleted. Because of the time element involved and the bisected nature of our bill and others before you, no doubt you will wish to make a number of technical changes. Basically, however, we are advocating S. 3246 with the following modifications:

1. A method for establishing quotas is incorporated for amphetamines; this would be done by the Attorney General along the same line that he now does for narcotics;

2. All people manufacturing, distributing or dispensing dangerous substances are required to obtain a license rather than the registration which is provided for the Senate passed Bill; specific authorization is given for pre-license inspection, whereas the Senate Bill is somewhat fuzzy in this area;

3. A requirement for separate and segregated record keeping in all controlled dangerous substances;

4. Approved order forms would be required for all controlled dangerous substances instead of just Schedule I and Schedule II substances.

5. The Secretary of H.E.W., instead of Attorney General would determine which substances should be controlled; however, the Attorney General would be the person to issue licenses and renewals, as is provided for in the Senate passed Bill;

6. The Senate Bill on prescription drugs for amphetamines, barbiturates and tranquilizers allows a six-month prescription with five refills; our Bill would limit the prescription to three months and three refills;

7. An outright ban on the production of methamphetamines, except for scientific research—this incorporates the same concept which is contained in H.R. 15432 which has already been introduced by our Committee.

1. PRODUCTION QUOTAS FOR AMPHETAMINES

Evidence induced in hearings around the country convinced all of the Committee Members that abuse of this substance is a menace to the public health and safety. Though oral use of amphetamines may cause difficulties, including psychological dependence and paranoid psychosis, it is more likely that these effects will be maximized through intravenous injections. It would appear that those who are now using amphetamines for this purpose, prefer methamphetamines, (popularly known as speed) which is a part of the general class of amphetamines. A "speed freak" is someone who engages in high dose methamphetamine abuse on a regular basis. With each injection, the abuser experience a "rush" or a "flash". The result of those injections is euphoria and hyperactivity. This phase can be prolonged by repeated injections for several days. The only limitation on the length of the user's trip is when he, because of exhaustion, is forced to come down; this is called "crashing". It is at this point in time that the paranoid reaction is most likely to occur. Then depending upon the psychological makeup of the individual, he could attack others or jump out of a window.

Other harmful side effects are, of course, hepatitis, malnutrition and undermining of the individual's health because of irregular sleep and eating patterns. There are also numerous recorded cases of permanent brain damage and even death.

Unfortunately, there was evidence in every city that we visited that there are a substantial number of young people engaging in this type of activity. Of course, these are not the only substances that are being abused; heroin, cocaine, L.S.D., barbiturates, marihuana, etc., are available for anyone with money to purchase them.

One must ask himself how these substances are so readily available. Since our Committee, to some extent, narrowed its inquiry to amphetamine abuse, I will try to limit most of my comments to that class of substance. The production of amphetamines in the United States vastly exceeds the legitimate medical needs of this country. I know we have received testimony that there are over 8 billion pills manufactured annually. According to figures furnished us from Federal Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, production in the United States of amphetamines and methamphetamines for calendar year 1968 as follows:

Amphetamine:
Total bulk production: 34,397 kg.
Amount exported: 10 kg.
Amount available for domestic use: 34,387 kg (3,438,700,000).[1]
Desoxyephedrine (methamphetamine):
Total bulk production: 12,372 kg.
Amount exported: none.
Amount available for domestic use: 12,372 kg. (1,237,200,000).[1]

Because of the Committee's extreme concern, on November 18, 1969, we held one day of hearings here on Capitol Hill dealing exclusively with the subject of amphetamines. The evidence to support imposing production quotas on amphetamines is overwhelming and supported by reputable medical testimony.

A handbook on drug dependency published by the American Medical Association lists eight uses for which amphetamines are prescribed by physicians:

1. Control of symptoms of narcolepsy.
2. Control certain hyperkinetic behavioral disorders of children.
3. Relieve or prevent fatigue in individuals with deteriorated psychomotor performance.
4. Treat mild depression.
5. Antagonize the pharmacological actions of depressant drugs.
6. Control appetite.
7. Induce insomnia and counteract fatigue in persons occasionally required to perform mental or physical tasks of long duration.
8. Enhance the action of analegisic drugs.

But except for the first two uses—control of narcolepsy and hyperkinetic behavior—the handbook notes that the other uses are subject to "varying degrees of professional controversy."

While amphetamines have a legitimate role in the treatment of narcolepsy and hyperkineticism, these are both exceedingly rare diseases. Dr. Sidney Cohen, Director of the Division of Narcotic Addiction and Drug Abuse of the National Institute of Mental Health has told our Committee the number of amphetamine tablets needed to treat these diseases would be a few thousand a year, not the eight billion which are now produced annually.

What, then, are these billion of amphetamine tablets being used for?

Dr. Cohen told us that 99 percent of total legal amphetamine production goes for weight and fatigue control.

These are both highly questionable uses of amphetamines.

[1] Average dosage unit strength for amphetamines and desoxyephedrine 10 mg. F.B.N.D.D. also advises that over 80% of their seizures of illegal amphetamines were originally legally manufactured.

Studies have shown that dieters will lose an average 6.75 pounds more during a six to twenty week course of treatment using amphetamines than if they were given a placebo. This additional weight loss is hardly sufficient to justify the dangers connected with using amphetamines. Because amphetamines increase blood pressure and have a direct action on the heart, they can seriously aggravate pre-existing diseases.

The argument for using amphetamines for weight control is further weakened by the availability of Fenfluramine, an appetite depressant which is not a stimulant drug.

The use of amphetamines for fighting fatigue runs from the college student who takes a tablet so he can stay up all night to study for an exam to the truck who swallows large numbers of pills so he can make exceedingly long trips without sleeping. Athletes sometimes use amphetamines to excel in a contest.

But even under the most minimal type of amphetamine misuse, deaths have been reported. For those taking large doses of amphetamines regularly, addiction can occur, and there is the possibility that brain damage can result.

In 1962, the Food and Drug Administration determined that there were over 100,000 pounds of amphetamines and methamphetamines available in this country. That works out to 25 to 50 doses a year for every man, woman and child in America. Evidence previously previously given indicates that amphetamine production has increased in the eight years since that survey.

Gentlemen, the health of this nation and especially its young people are at stake. If Sweden and Japan can place strict controls on amphetamines, I submit we must do likewise.

No doubt some Committee could productively make specific inquiry into the quantities of barbiturates and tranquilizers produced in this country, also. It is my understanding that Dr. Egeberg, Assistant Secretary has already appeared before you and advised that 10 billion sedative dosage units will be produced this year. This figures out to be 50 doses for every man, woman and child in this country.

It is not enough, however, to control the legitimate production of amphetamines. The immediate precursors also have to be restricted. In San Francisco we heard testimony from one Richard G. Bennetto to the effect that with an initial investment of $200 and a monthly overhead of $1800, he had managed to make a net profit of over $30,000 a month on sales of methamphetamine, "speed" from his clandestine lab. Bennetto was no chemist but he was taught all he needed to know by a fellow inmate during a 40-day jail term. Once he was released, he encountered no diffculties in purchasing equipment and chemicals from legal sources. Pebble Palace is a store in Daly City, California where such materials could be purchased with relative ease. Gene Meyers, Proprietor of the Pebble Palace, explained to the Committee his chemical sales operations. At the suggestion of a large chemical wholesale company Van Waters and Rogers, Meyers began stocking small amount of chemicals along with the glassware and jewelry that he sold. Van Waters and Rogers referred customers to the Pebble Palace and when orders came in for phenyl-2-propanone and methylamine 40 percent, the basic ingredients for speed, Meyers would in turn order the chemical in bulk from Van Waters and Rogers. Meyers' customers would place their orders for supplies for their so-called photography labs, their perfume companies or shrubbery sprays by telephone or in person. The whole operation was casual; invoices were recorded under first names and few questions were asked.

Meyers claimed that he would supply the Bureau of Narcotics with information on his customers but that he was not really concerned about the chemicals he was selling, nor was he aware that they were being used for illicit purposes until a customer was blown up in a clandestine lab. The explosion happened in March of 1969 at which time Meyers stopped selling phenyl-2-propanone. It was also in March that the B.N.D.D. agents asked Meyers to stop selling that line of chemicals and that phenyl-2-propanone became a controlled substance in California. The California reclassification of phenyl-2-propanone might slow down the the production of speed, but as long as the chemical can still be bought in the neighboring states, in much the same way that it was formerly purchased in California, the production will continue.

Certainly, if we ban the production of methamphetamine, stricter controls of precursors will be necessary to prevent illegal manufacturers from picking up the slack.

Realizing strict controls on amphetamines would cause considerable comment, we decided to contact others on the subject. The Committee solicited the opinions of the Deans of seventy-five medical schools and sixteen other groups such as the World Health Organization and the American Society of Bariatrics on the subject of the legitimate use of amphetamines.

Though few would welcome a total ban similar to that imposed in Sweden, the majority agreed that tighter controls were needed and that amphetamines were needed primarily for the treatment of such rare conditions as narcolepsy and hyperkinetic children. Only one source claimed that amphetamines were effective and should be used in the early stages of diet programs.

This information would seem to support our contention that 8 billion amphetamines are not needed to treat the rare cases of narcolepsy and hyperkinetic children. Few people supported their use as anti-depressants or stimulants.

For your information, I would like to submit at this time a tabulation of the responses and a cross-section of portions of the letters received:

UNIVERSITY, RESPONSE, AMPHETAMINES

Boston University: Hazard results from dosage and indiscriminate use. Should be used only under physician supervision.

UCLA School of Medicine: Amph. & Meth. used commonly in pharmacological research in animals and tissues to obtain info on normal physiological mechanisms.

Case Western Reserve (T. George Bidder, M.D.): If just amph. removed from scene, will solve nothing as will encourage experimentation with other drugs. Have to tackle whole drug problem not isolate drugs. Useful and effective when used properly under medical supervision. Little use for meth.

Dartmouth Medical (Dr. Richard Reth): Does have legitimate clinical use. Lack of patient follow-up accounts for some addiction and abuse. Suggests better control of distribution of legally manufactured drug. Also tighter control on prescribing and dispensing.

Duke University (Dr. Ellinwood): Amph. indispensable in treatment of hyperkinetic children, no alternative drug discovered yet. Good for treatment of Parkinson Disease. Good for short term treatment of obesity patients.

Emory University: Not want to see production and sale of amph. discontinued. Does have use in medical practice. If banned will be replaced by other drugs for abuse.

Georgetown University (Dr. Frank Standaert): Useful for control of certain disorders—narcolepsy, hyperkinetic children, depressions—when properly administered. Banning of amph. would not solve abuse problem. Commercially produced amph. are abused, but commercially produced products are not suitable for most dangerous form of abuse—intravenous injection. Such material is produced in clandestine labs. Ban would withhold it from those who need the drug for medical purposes and it would not curb illegal lab production.

University of Kansas: Little medical use for amphetamines. Patients do become tolerant to appetite suppressant effect after several weeks of continuous use. Also geriatric practice uses small doses for depressions. Feels that abuse potential outweighs medical value.

University of Kentucky (Dr. Harris Isbell): Only currently accepted uses of amph. that have any scientific proof are in the treatment of narcolepsy and hyperikinetic children. For treatment of depressions other drugs have been found. Of almost no value as anorexics of obesity. Intravenous abuse is the most dangerous. Illicit lab production accounting for an increasing amount of illegal trade—laws directed against manufacturers seem rather futile. Could do without amph. but making legal control tougher would likely stimulate illegal synthesis.

University of Nebraska: Amph. of value in certain experimental studies. Also, for depressions and neurasthenic neurosis, narcolepsy and hyperkinetic children. Not necessary for weight control.

University of Pittsburgh: Dr. Emil S. Trellis: Dr. Trellis works with those who hurt themselves with drugs in a psychiatric capacity. "Approx. 2 or 3 years ago, I was asked to testify in the defense of a woman who killed her husband. At the time she had been taking 90 mg. of amph. a day for several months as prescribed by a 'diet doctor'. Prior to her seeing this physician, she had two psychiatric hospitalizations during each of which she had been diagnosed as being psychotic. Approx. 2 weeks before the murder, she was reported by her family to be confused, agitated, and 'talking to herself' which suggested to me that she had been hallucinating. My testimony was a major factor. I was cross-examined for 45 minutes. My position was and is, that an amount of amph. could very well precipitate psychosis in a pre-psychotic individual. It took the jury approx. one hour to acquit her. The real issue seemed to me whether or not malpractice should have been considered."

University of Rochester: Report submitted by Drs. Bernard Weiss and Victor Laties. Amph. is effective and safe when used under strict controls to enhance performance and to improve performance degraded by fatigue or boredom. Tested on athletes, combat troops, pilots. No severe side effects when properly used. Physiologically and psychologically amph. is rather benign. Need more research into high dose levels to determine the reasons for the increasing abuse.

University of Tennessee, Dean Callison: Personal opinion in own experience that amph. are more harmful than useful. Hopes that U.S. follows example of Sweden.

University of Texas, Dallas: Dr. J. Crout: Abuse potential outweighs therapeutic benefits in adult medicine. But useful agent for disturbed children. Dr. K. Charalampous: Amph. could be dangerous when used to treat depressions. Limited usefulness for treatment of obesity. But amph. are good for treatment of disturbed children and narcolepsy. Should be controlled through production of limited quantities for rare appropriate usage.

Tufts University, Dean W. F. Maloney: Amph. should be dispensed only on prescription by a doctor. Outlawing of the drugs would lead to less rather than more control by creating an underground market. On this last point there is close to unanimous agreement, particularly among faculty members who work with drug abuse problems.

Tulane University, Dr. Robert Heath: Amph. useful for treatment of disturbed children. Should not be used for treatment of obesity.

University of Utah, Dr. K. Castelton: Amph. of some value in treatment of narcolepsy, hyperkinetic children, parkinsons disease, epilepsy and as anorectics. Also, has shown to produce actual improvement in human performance under conditions of fatigue and boredom.

University of Virginia, Dr. John A. Owen, Jr.: Has had bad experiences with clinical use of amph. as anorexigenic agents. Believes that few "thoughtful internists" would object if the U.S. followed the example of Sweden.

University of Wisconsin, Dr. P. L. Eichman: As a neurologist has used amph. for treatment of narcolepsy and brain damaged children. Sees problem as control of manufacturers and distributors rather than abuse through prescriptions.

University of Washington, Dr. J. M. Dille: Amph. are of medical and therapeutic value when properly used. Dr. Dille works in Open Door Clinic in Seattle for hippy community with drug problems. Sees abuse of amphetamines as most difficult problem at this time. But complete abolition of amph. would not be solution. Amph. are too easy to synthesize in clandestine labs. Possible solution would be to place amph. under restrictions similar to those enforced for narcotics. Present control of amph. not sufficient.

University of Vermont, Dean E. C. Andrews: Opinion of those involved in research that there is probably little justification for continued manufacture of amph. and class of compounds. Use should be limited to few well qualified investigators for experiments to evaluate therapeutic effect in specific conditions. Should follow example of Sweden.

Johns Hopkins University, Dr. Solomon Snyder: Amph. useful in treatment of disturbed children and Parkinsons disease. Also very useful agent for brain research. Therefore should remain available for these purposes.

University of Michigan, Dr. Maurice Seevers: Dr. Seevers presented a paper at the symposium in Stockholm in November, 1968 which established the basis on which the Swedish government decided to ban amph. Has been acquainted with the rapid development of abuse in Sweden. Also serves as a consultant to Minister of Health and Welfare for Japanese government in drug abuse program. After epidemic of amph. abuse after World War II, which reached its peak in 1955 with estimated 1 or 2 million users Japanese government took strong punitive measures and practically abolished their use except for a few medical specialists. Class of central stimulants, including cocaine and amph. are most dangerous drugs of abuse. Because of marked increase in violent crimes associated with the 2 major epidemics of abuse of amph., and the fact that amph. abuse and central stimulants is on the increase in metropolitan areas, and doubtful therapeutic advantages, Dr. Seevers believes that more rigid controls will have to be imposed on these drugs in the U.S.

University of Minnesota: Dr. Burtrum C. Schiele: used for treatment of narcolepsy, hyper. children, mild depressions. Vastly overused in treatment of obesity. Many more drugs are manufactured than are needed for legitimate purposes. If amph. were outlawed could use other central nervous system stimulants instead but would also be used for abuse. Though badly abused, would not want to see amph. become totally unavailable.

Dr. F. S. Abuzzahab, Sr.: Used in treatment of hyperkinetic children though there are other more effective and safer drugs that could be used in transquilizer field, e.g. haloperidol (Haldol). Limited value in obesity treatment. Supports legal control similar to the Swedish program where is available to those who need the drug.

2. LICENSING AND PRELICENSE INSPECTION

H.R. 16123 wouold require a license rather than registration for manufacturers, distributors and dispensers of controlled dangerous substances. It seems to me that stricter controls could best be effective under the terms of a license rather than simple registration.

We also felt that specific statutory authority should be given to the Attorney General to inspect prior manufacturing records of production and sale. Section 302(e) limits authority to inspect facilities, but no mention is made of records. Similar treatment should be accorded distributors. These provisions are contained in Section 303 (a1) and (b1) of H.R. 16123.

At the direction of our Committee, members of our staff have met with several people from private industry to discuss the Federal—state division of responsibility for licensing. Although not provided for in any of the bill submitted by Members of our Committee, you might wish to consider the following divisions of responsibility:

Federal

1. Licensing of interstate drug handlers by Federal government:
(a) Manufacturers.
(a) Repackers.
(c) Wholesalers.
(d) Other interstate handlers.
2. Responsibility for pre-inspection and auditing of records.
3. Referral of suspect leads to appropriate state agency.
4. Followup of state leads in interstate commerce.
5. Publication of all interstate and intrastate licensed controlled drug handlers each year.
6. Development of federal/state agreement in each state with single agency. Agreement based on following factors:
(a) Existence of state laws parallel to Federal laws.
(b) Agreement by state to conduct specified licensing inspections and audits.
(c) Federal government funding of state agency in ratio with number of licensed handlers reported by state.
(d) Federal assistance in training of state agency personnel.
7. Development and distribution of guidelines for parties licensed by Federal and State agency.

State

The state agency responsible would perform the following functions:

1. Licensing and preinspection of the following:
(a) Physicians.
(b) Pharmacies.
(c) Other intrastate handlers.
2. Conduct audits of records of all intrastate licensees.
3. Referral to Federal agency of all leads involving intrastate traffic.
4. Provide Federal agency with up-to-date list of all state-licensed handlers.

3. SEPARATE AND SEGREGATED RECORDS FOR ALL CONTROLLED DANGEROUS SUBSTANCES

As previously mentioned, we subpoenaed invoices from many drug manufacturers and distributors doing business on the West Coast in conjunction with our San Francisco hearings. After going through boxes and boxes of invoices, the need for segregated records concerning dangerous drugs became apparent.

It is a time-consuming task to pick out amphetamines and barbiturates from invoices which contain dozens of other items, such as Vitamin B12 and aspirin. I would venture to estimate that thousands of hours are lost yearly by F.B.N.D.D. agents painstakingly going through invoices, item by item, attempting to track down a particular drug shipment.

If controlled drugs and their immediate precursors were kept in a separate book, it would be a simple matter to locate and document the sale of these substances. Although Section 307(a) requires complete and accurate records, no provision is made for segregation. Under that Section in H.R. 16123, segregation would be required.

4. ORDER FORMS FOR ALL CONTROLLED DANGEROUS SUBSTANCES

In S. 3246, order forms under Section 308 of that Bill are required only for controlling dangerous substances contained in Schedules I and II. It would be my suggestion that order forms be required for all controlled dangerous substances. Although we very much realize, the increased bookkeeping that would be necessitated by such a requirement, the ease with which these drugs and their precusors can be obtained, dictates such a step.

For instance, in San Francisco my Committee heard testimony from James F. Hogan, Special Agent, Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, Ernest Sandler, President, Interstate, Drug Exchange, Plainview, New York, a mail order drug wholesaler, and Joseph Ashkin, President, Darby Drug, Inwood, Long Island, New York, also a mail order drug wholesaler.

Mr. Hogan, acting upon information given to him attempted to order controlled drugs from Interstate Drug Exchange four times. In three cases he passed himself off as a Doctor of Osteopathy or a Medical Doctor. In the fourth case he simply ordered the drugs under the name Mr. Hogan. He was denied only one shipment, that one calling for 25,000 units of amphetamine tablets.

From Darby Drug, Mr. Hogan, using similar tactics, ordered two shipments, one small which he received with no objection. The second shipment called for 25,000 units. The company sent him a letter requesting verification of his medical practice. He did not reply. Two days later the 25,000 pills were delivered in the mail.

It is true that in both firms' cases, when the large orders were received, the client's legitimacy was investigated. When the companies suspected that something was out of line they did cooperate with the BNDD. It is also true that a strong liaision exists between the companies and the BNDD and that the errors reported were human errors rather than criminal acts. But that doesn't stop the pills from being delivered.

Mr. Hogan testified that in his opinion, despite company-instituted controls, a smart dealer could acquire a large number of pills and divert them into the illicit market by placing small orders that would not attract attention.

Mr. Ashkin stated that his company spent $150,000 on computer equipment to help eliminate improper sale of drugs. The intention is honorable, but clearly it has not been effective.

Order forms would also prevent the bizarre situation exposed by our Committee investigations on the West Coast last Fall. A drug manufacturer in Chicago had been shipping millions of amphetamines over the last few years to a drug store in Tiajuana, Mexico. We had subpoenaed records of the American companies doing business in the area. We were able to show that there was, in fact, no drug store and that the address was fictitious. In fact, if one were to take the given street address literally, it would have been the eleventh hole of the Tijuana Country Club Golf Course. Acting on a tip from our investigators, the FBNDD was able to seize 1.2 million pep pills in transit to the fictitious drug store.

Now you and I know where those pills were destined. They would have been smuggled across the border into the United States. Or perhaps they would not even bother, since they could send a so-called agent to pick up the order from the customs broker in San Ysdiro.

The law must be changed to prevent situations such as I have just described. The order form provisions and the export-import controls contained in H.R. 16123 are designed to bring about that desirable end.

5. HEW RATHER THAN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE SHOULD DESIGNATE THE SUBSTANCES TO BE CONTROLLED

As the Committee knows, Title II of S. 3246 gives the authority, after consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and the Scientific Advisory Committee to designate which substances will be controlled and on what schedule they should appear. H.R. 16123 would vest this authority in the Secretary of H.E.W.

When the House Select Committee on Crime considered this matter, at Executive Session, a majority of our members came to the conclusion that this function more logically would lie with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. The decision is essentially a scientific and medical one with incidental law enforcement aspects. I firmly believe that since the decision we are talking about involves the public health of this country, it should be made by that Department of Government which is charged with that overall responsibility.

Although it is not contained in my bill, I think your Committee should consider the amendment to Section 602 of the Senate passed bill offered by Senator Hughes of the floor at the time that bill was considered. That amendment was as follows:

Amendment No. 451

On page 64, beginning with line 8 delete all through line 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 602. (a) The Attorney General is authorized and directed to carry out educational and research programs directly related to enforcement of the control provisions set forth an this Act. Such programs may include—

"(1) educational and training programs on dangerous substance law enforcement for local, state and Federal personnel;

"(2) studies or special projects designed to compare the deterrent effects of various enforcement strategies on drug use and abuse;

"(3) studies or special projects designed to access and detect accurately the presence of controlled dangerous substances in the human body, including the development of rapid field identification methods which would enable agents to detect micro-quantities of such substances;

"(4) studies or special projects designed to evaluate the nature and sources of the supply of illegal drugs throughout the country;

"(5) studies or special projects to develop more effective methods of manufacture or distribution to prevent diversion of controlled dangerous substances into illegal channels."

On page 64, line 22, immediately before "educational" insert "such".

Again, and in this point I am joined by a number of my colleagues on our Committee, public education and medical research more logically lie with H.E.W. Certainly, however, the Attorney General should have the authority and responsibility, to undertake research and public education with respect to the problems involved in enforcement of the law in this area.

6. PRESCRIPTION

Schedule III of Senate passed drug bill covers amphetamines and barbiturates. Under Section 309(b) prescriptions for those substances "may not be filled or refilled more than 6 months after the date thereof or be refilled more than 5 times after the date of the prescription unless renewed by the practitioner." H.R. 16123 would limit such prescriptions to three months and only permit three refills.

One of the facts uncovered by our Committee investigators was the practice of many addicts and some dealers, to go to a number of doctors and obtain the same prescription. This limitation would cut down on the quantity available through the use of this practice. It would also cut down on the number of unwitting addicts. These substances can create psychological dependency and in some cases physical addiction. It seems to me that an individual patient should not be allowed to go longer than three months without review of his condition by a physician when drugs that can produce these results are involved.

Your Committee might consider the approach taken to this problem by the State of California. They have set up a procedure whereby all prescriptions concerning these drugs must be transmitted to a central location and put on a computer. Parameters for normal usage by patients and usual quantities of selling by dispensers are programed into the computer. Print-outs are obtained on a systematic basis which will then show individuals who are obtaining these drugs in excess of legitimate medical need and pharmacies who are dispensing suspiciously large quantities of these drugs. This information is then transmitted to the appropriate law enforcement agency for their investigation.

7. BAN ON METHAMPHETAMINES?

To demonstrate the overriding concern of our Committee about speed, on December 23, 1969, we introduced H.R. 15432. As you know, methamphetamines are a class of amphetamines and have the same legitimate medical applications as amphetamines.

Unfortunately, this substance is preferred on the street over other amphetamines. Since there are other substances which can meet the legitimate medical needs, we felt legal sale should be stopped. The Bill does not stop all manufacture of methamphetamines and its ingredients. Since it does allow medical and scientific research. Such research would have to be authorized by a permit obtained from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Investigation on the West Coast revealed that a critical enforcement problem existed as far as illicit laboratories are concerned. No violation of existing law could be proved unless the operator had the finished product in his possession. H.R. 15432 makes it illegal to possess the necessary ingredients that go into speed.

As a result of our San Francisco hearings, Burroughs Wellcome Company of Tuckahoe, New York, notified us that two days after those hearings, the Directors of that Company voted to discontinue manufacturing methadrine. Similarly, Bates Laboratories of Chicago, the company which figured in the 11th hole of the Tijuana Country Club situation, has informed us that his company has also stopped production.

However, further research by our staff, indicates that we only attack a small portion of the problem if we put a total ban on methamphetamines. For instance there is very little difference between D-amphetamines and methamphetamines. Not only do the two drugs have a very similar chemical structure, but the initial effects and relative potency is about the same. Clinical reports indicate that the difference is slight and it would appear that methamphetamine addicts would switch to amphetamines with no coaxing, if the former drug was not available.

For the above reasons, I have modified my personal position to advocate that methamphetamine production be assigned a quota just the same as all other amphetamines. This would also be consistent with the treatment of these substances recommended by the World Health Organization Expert Committee on Drug Dependence. Manufacturers of that substance would have to go before the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to justify the efficacy of the drug and the amount needed to be produced to cover the legitimate medical need. However, if the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee is not agreeable to setting production quotas for all amphetamines, then I would be willing to again consider a ban on methamphetamines. This approach would at least be a partial solution to the problem.

SUMMARY

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, I wish to again thank you for allowing me to appear before you this morning.

As further backup for my testimony I would like to offer into the record at this point the transcript of testimony received at our hearings held in Washington, D.C. on November 18th, 1969, entitled, "Crime in America—Why 8 Billion Amphetamines?"

Because of time, I have only highlighted some of the testimony that was taken by our Committee in San Francisco last fall. Almost the entire record of those proceedings deals with the subject matter of your hearings. Since they are voluminous, I do not request that they be included in the record, but I have brought along sufficient copies for each Member of the Subcommittee. It would be my hope that each of you will have an opportunity to go through them.

In conclusion, I know that I am joined by all the members of my Committee in making the request that early action be taken on the proposals which are now before you. It is, of course, realized that drugs are necessary and make a substantial contribution to the public health of this country. Therefore, I recognize that your actions can not be precipitous. However, the problem faced is immediate and critical. For that reason, you can be assured of our support when legislation dealing with this subject is reported to the floor.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JEROME R. WALDIE, MEMBER, HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON CRIME

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee, I appreciate this opportunity to testify on behalf of H.R. 16123, which I have sponsored in conjunction with my colleagues on the Select Committee on Crime: Chairman Pepper, Congresswoman Griffiths, and Congessman Nix.

Our legislation is basically the same as S. 3246 with the deletion of narcotics and marihuana and the addition of what we consider several important modifications.

The most important difference in our bill is the establishment of quotas for the production of amphetamines. These quotas would be established by the Attorney General, much the same way that he presently establishes quotas for the legitimate production of narcotics; however, I would not be offended if this function were discharged by the Secretary of H.E.W. A second major addition in our bill is that all persons concerned with manufacturing, distributing, or dispensing all dangerous substances would be required to obtain a license to do business rather than merely register, as provided by the Senate bill. Our bill also provides for pre-license inspection of anyone desiring to engage in these fields.

Separate and segregated records would be required for all controlled dangerous substances so that those concerned with monitoring these substances would not have to wade through voluminous and irrelevant files.

An approved order form would be required for all controlled dangerous substances instead of just those on Schedule I and Schedule II of the Senate bill.

We propose that the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare be the one to determine which substances should be controlled, rather than the Attorney General.

Our bill also limits a prescription for amphetamines, barbiturates and tranquilizers to three months and three refills. The Senate passed bill allows a six-month prescription with five refills.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot over-emphasize the importance of controlling dangerous substances in our society. In the hearings our Committee has held throughout this country, we have learned that the direst predictions of drug abuse are all-too-often true. Our young are increasingly turning to drugs as an escape from a society which they neither understand nor empathize with. Our hearings have shown that drug abuse is reaching lower and lower into the schools, with drugs readily available now even in junior high and elementary schools.

Mr. Chairman, since your Committee is now concerned with non-narcotic dangerous substances, I will limit my remarks largely to the abuse of amphetamines. Abuse of this substance has reached truly epidemic proportions. They are readily available, usually inexpensive, painless to ingest, and potentially deadly. What is perhaps the most frightening aspect of amphetamine abuse is that most amphetamines encountered on the illegal drug market were legally produced by ethical drug manufacturers. Testimony before the Select Committee on Crime indicates that some 8 billion legally produced amphetamines reach the market every year. I ask why, Mr. Chairman? Why? I am convinced, and the medical testimony supports my conviction, that amphetamines have a limited legitimate use in medicine today. I have no objection for their use in treatment of narcolepsy and hyperkinetic behavior, but these two diseases are so rare that several doctors with long and large practices have told us that they have never encountered either. Where, then, are the rest of these pills going? A frightening percentage of these 8 billion amphetamines finds its way onto the ilegal drug market. An equally as frightening percentage are used by law abiding, ordinary, American citizens who want to lose weight. The use of amphetamines in weight control, however, is a highly questionable medical practice and even when advisable, amphetamine treatment is useful for only a short period of time. But there are countless men and women who have fallen prey to the infamous "fat doctors" who convince them that taking a daily dosage of amphetamines is all that is required to lose weight. These persons are doubly fooled. First, because most weight loss they will experience will come at the beginning of their treatment, and secondly, because they run the very real risk of becoming habituated to the drug they are taking. The use of amphetamines in diet control is the subject of considerable controversy within the medical profession, but the profession itself has yet to take measures that would restrict its use. The imposition of amphetamine production quotas would go a long way toward insuring that amphetamines are available for legitimate medical needs only.

Another abuse connected with the widespread prescription of amphetamines is that many young people are obtaining amphetamines on prescriptions that were originally written for their parents. An enterprising youngster can easily ask a druggist to refill a prescription for "his mother" after his mother has, in fact, stopped using the drug. This is why we have proposed that refills be limited to three, rather than the five contained in the Senate Bill. For a patient who needs more than three refills, a physician can easily write another prescription. The ease with which people can legally obtain amphetamines for illegal use must be stopped. The use of the quotas and the licensing provision contained in our bill would also help stop the kind of fantastic situation our Committee uncovered in our hearings in San Francisco. The Chairman has already told this Committee of the case of barrels of legitimately produced amphetamines headed for the 11th hole of the Tiajuana Country Club golf course. This one dramatic incident should make it clear to all concerned that the present system of controlling amphetamines simply does not work. That an ethical drug manufacturer can send millions of pills across the Mexican border to a non-existent address, and do this for years before someone uncovers the truth, is the kind of situation that we can simply no longer tolerate in this country. If the ethical drug manufacturer involved in this case can unwittingly become involved in the illicit amphetamine trade, consider how simple it must be for those whose avowed purpose is the illegal sale of amphetamines.

I would like to now briefly explain why we have designated the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare as the agent to determine which substances should be controlled instead of permitting the Attorney General to do so. It seems to me that the decision is overwhelmingly and completely a medical decision, and the Attorney General—any Attorney General—no matter what his qualifications may be, does not normally pretend to an expertise in medicine. The Attorney General is a law enforcement officer and our bill rightly provides him with that function. But H.E.W., with the medical and scientific facilities available to it, is the only agency which has the necessary knowledge to rationally and scientifically determine which substances are dangerous and which are not. By permitting H.E.W. to make this determination, I feel we give more credibility to our law, make it seem more legitimate in the eyes of young people. The youth of this country is sophisticated enough to know that the Attorney General is not a doctor. Just because the Attorney General says a substance is dangerous is not an overwhelming argument to many people to consider the substance dangerous. But H.E.W., I feel, does have the necessary respect so that its decision can carry some weight. H.E.W. can also carry out the necessary educational measures that are needed to convince people that these drugs are harmful. Again, in education, H.E.W. has the credibility that the Attorney General's office does not. In the end, just as this country could not legislate effectively prohibition, it will not be able to legislate abstinence from drugs. We must admit that drug abuse is a symptom of our time rather than a cause of much of the ills of our society. When people do not feel it necessary to use drugs, there will be little or no drug abuse. So our drug laws must be both firm and understanding. They must make it difficult to obtain harmful substances, but they must be realistic in determining what is harmful and penalties to be attached to violation of these laws.

Mr. Chairman, I urge your Subcommittee to carefully examine our legislation and give it the early consideration the problem so obviously requires. The time to act was long ago; the least we can do now is try to catch up.

Thank you very much.

STATEMENT OF HON. ROBERT N. C. NIX

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, I welcome this opportunity to vigorously urge your full support of H.R. 16123, which I have co-sponsored with my colleagues of the Select Committee on Crime.

The problem of drug abuse in America is far older than the current public consciousness of the problem. In the ghettos of New York and my own city of Philadelphia, drugs have long been a major means of escape from squalid surroundings. But just as those squalid surroundings went unnoticed for generations, so too did the problem of the drug abuse in the ghetto. Now that drug abuse has become a nation-wide experience, affecting all classes of Americans, the public and Congress is paying long overdue attention to a seriously neglected situation. Now, we find that our laws are inadequate to deal with the situation, as, indeed, they have always been. Let us now use the intense public interest in the problem of drug abuse to remedy this old and neglected situation.

I consider the bill which I have joined in sponsoring a major departure from both past legislation and the Senate-passed drug bill. Our bill goes one step further than the Senate bill in its establishment of production quotas for amphetamines.

A once important pharmacological discovery, amphetamines have now become a cancer in our society. They are legal drugs overwhelmingly used in illegal and questionably legal usage. They are the cheap and easy to obtain pep pills of the streets which find their way into the possession of many youngsters as well as adults. They are so easy to obtain, in fact, that to think that there is any effective control over their use today is almost absurd. The testimony our Committee has heard concerning the diversion of legally produced amphetamines into illegal channels is enough to make one wonder whether the present system even begins to cope with the problem. I, for one, think it does not.

We must, as our bill attempts, once again make amphetamines a drug used in the treatment of illness and nothing else. We must produce enough amphetamines to satisfy this legitimate medical need and we must not allow any production that would be surplus to this need.

To further strengthen this control of legitimately produced amphetamines, our bill tightens up procedures for their production. Rather than merely registering as provided in the Senate bill, our bill requires those engaged in amphetamine production and trade to receive a license.

Such licenses would be granted after an inspection of the facilities which would help determine whether there are adequate safeguards over production and distribution to insure that pills do not fall into the wrong hands. We would also permit a prescription for controlled substances to be refilled only three times within three months rather than the five times within six months as provided for in the Senate bill. The abuse of drugs obtained through legal prescriptions is so widespread as to require the adoption of this measure. I submit that it would create no hardship for those who legitimately need these substances, for their physician could simply write another prescription. But there are simply too many cases of people getting refills on prescriptions that were not written for them.

We also designate the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare as the agent to determine which substances should be controlled and the Attorney General as the agent to determine the quotas for amphetamine production. The entire problem of drug abuse is logically and naturally a medical problem, and we feel that the maximum involvement of H.E.W. in any attempted solution is required. H.E.W. has the facilities and the manpower for determining the nature and seriousness of these substances as well as for inaugurating the kind of educational programs that will be necessary to eradicate their use.

May I urge you, Mr. Chairman, and Members of your Subcommittee, to give our bill your most serious consideration. I am sure that you share my concern, and the concern of my Committee colleagues, that we must act and we must act quickly. The abuse of drugs is a much older problem than is generally recognized, and now that there is some momentum for change, I cannot urge too strongly that we act while this moment exists.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF HON. MARTHA W. GRIFFITHS

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, I take great pleasure in supporting H.R. 16123, which I have co-sponored with three other Members of the Select Committee on Crime.

I need not stress the urgency of the enactment of a comprehensive controlled dangerous substances measure. The urgency is evident every day in stories in our newspapers, in the eyes of our children on the streets and in the hearts of every parent who worries about his youngster.

I am sure that Members of the Subcommittee are familiar with the provisions of our Bill and the ways in which it differs from the Senate passed Controlled Dangerous Substances Act, S. 3246.

I, like my colleagues who are testifying on behalf of our Bill, will limit my remarks to the portions of our Bill dealing with amphetamines and licensing and prescription practices. The illegal use and abuse of amphetamines today is potentially as serious a problem as hard narcotic abuse. The fact that amphetamines are legitimate drugs only worsens the problem. Since doctors prescribe amphetamines for a variety of reasons, not all of them compelling, many potential drug abusers can rationalize their first experiences with these dangerous substances. If a doctor can prescribe amphetamines for fatigue, why shouldn't young people try to experience the same high as their elders? The casual use of a few illegally obtained amphetamine tablets can be the first step on the road to a life of serious and dangerous drug abuse. There is only one solution to this aspect of the problem: amphetamines must be made substantially more difficult to obtain, and then only for legitimate and necessary medical needs.

The ease with which amphetamines may be obtained, and their low cost, constitute all too great a temptation in this thrill-seeking-through-drugs period. Making amphetamines more difficult to obtain will not, of course, end the problem of their abuse. Many amphetamines are illegally produced for illegal consumption channels. The eventual and most meaningful solution to the problem of drug abuse in America will not be through legislation. Instead, it will be through a massive program of public health education that convinces all Americans that the abuse of drugs is no solution, even temporarily, to the real or imagined problems they feel. The abuse of drugs is a medical and psychological problem, not a legal one. This country has had ample evidence in the past to testify to the fact that outlawing a substance does not curtail its use unless the public accepts the reasons for making the substance illegal. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to emphasize that our Bill designates the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare as the agent to determine which substances are dangerous and to issue permits for their use in research projects. This provision, I feel, is a vitally important part of our Bill. The Congress of the United States appropriates millions and millions of dollars to H.E.W. annually. The least we ought to do is get a return on our investment by seeking and accepting their judgment as doctors and scientists as to which substances are dangerous and which are not. The Attorney General is not a doctor and while he is familiar with the problems of enforcing the law, he ought not to be the one to determine what substances fall under the law he is enforcing.

Our Bill does permit the Attorney General to set the production quotas for substances found dangerous by H.E.W., but I would even prefer to see H.E.W. set the quotas themselves. Who is in a better position to determine the adequate medical supply of amphetamines necessary than the medical staffs of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare? What particular expertise in calculating the amount of amphetamines necessary yearly does the Attorney General have? Again, I insist, this entire question is a medical one, not a legal one. The Attorney General ought and should enforce the law and the quotas that are established under it, but he should not be in the position of enforcing a quota which was not set by competent medical authorities. Furthermore, permitting the Attorney General to both set the quota and enforce it puts him in the positon of both legislator and law enforcement officer. We have always guarded against this practice, for it often leads to abuse, improper judgment and a lack of perspective. Simply because the problem of drug abuse is foremost in the minds of most Americans today is no reason to bend a law that will have to last considerably longer than the current interest in drugs.

Ours is a Bill, Mr. Chairman, which I feel must be passed. We must take action on the problem of drug abuse. We must do so quickly. Eight billion amphetamines a year is both medically and socially dangerous. I urge you to examine the testimony the Select Committee on Crime has received concerning amphetamine abuse, and I am sure that if you do, you will share the sense of urgency felt by all the Members of our Committee. Perhaps the only thing more criminal than the illegal use of illegal amphetamines is the illegal use of legally produced, profitable drugs.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT V. DENNEY

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee: Last week I introduced a bill providing for strict controls on the manufacturing and dispensing of dangerous drugs.

My bill, H.R. 16118, is designed to provide new means for the control of amphetamines, barbiturates and hallucinogenic drugs and their immediate precursors.

In large measure my bill is similar to the Controlled Dangerous Substance Act of 1969 which passed the Senate in late December of last year. As a member of the House Select Committee on Crime, I have come to the reluctant conclusion that the controls proposed in that bill are not adequate. Our committee has held hearings in Boston, Omaha, San Francisco, Columbia, S.C., and Miami during the past year. We have just concluded four days of hearings in metropolitan Washington, D.C. A large portion of those hearings were devoted to the subject of dangerous drugs. The evidence is abundantly clear that substantial portions of legally manufactured drugs are being diverted into illicit markets.

For instance, in our hearings in San Francisco in late October, 1969, we were able to show that millions of pep pills were being sold by an American manufacturer to an alleged drug store in Tijuana. It was brought out in the hearings that the manufacturer had never made any attempt to check up on his purchaser. It was further shown that the drug store did not exist, that the address given was in fact the 11th hole of the Tijuana Country Club. Under existing law, these sales were apparently legal, even though it is obvious they were to be smuggled back into the U.S.

Also, as a part of those hearings, at the direction of the committee, we nad an agent of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs order amphetamines and barbiturates from drug mail order houses around the country. In almost every instance, this agent was able to have his order filled merely by calling himself a doctor and citing some fictitious medical degree after his name.

The tragedy of "blown minds", wrecked lives and paranoid behavior, has created a condition that this country can no longer tolerate. My bill would essentially adopt the controlled dangerous substance act with the following changes:

(1) Require licensing of manufacturers, distributors and dispensers of dangerous drugs rather than registration as is provided in the Senate bill;

(2) Specific authorization for pre-license inspection;

(3) An outright ban on methamphetamine, i.e., speed—this incorporates the same concept which is contained in HR 15432 which has already been introduced by the committee;

(4) Require separate and segregated record keeping for all controlled dangerous substances;

(5) The Senate bill allows a 6-month prescription with five refills for amphetamines, barbiturates and tranquilizers. My bill would limit the prescription to three months and three refills.

Substantial evidence was induced in our hearings indicating that there is a vast overproduction of amphetamines, barbiturates and tranquilizers which far exceeds the legitimate medical needs of this country. It was shown during 1968 that there were 40 amphetamine dosage units manufactured for every man, woman and child in this country. This past year the figure has gone up to 50. Some of my colleagues on the committee, in reaction to this fact have suggested that quotas be established for the amount of amphetamines that can be legally manufactured. I believe such action to be precipitous at this time. We should proceed with the stricter controls that are included in my bill to see whether or not they will do the job.

I would like to feel that the drug companies will voluntarily exercise restraint. However, should the situation persist, then I feel we would be forced to take another look at the situation.

POSTAL PAY

(Mr. DULSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, at the request of my colleagues, and for the information of all Members of the House, I am presenting the following summary of the situation with respect to salary legislation for postal and other Federal employees.

SALARY LEGISLATION

Public hearings on salary legislation were conducted by our Compensation Subcommittee early in the first session of the 91st Congress, and the committee reported H.R. 13000 to the House on September 9, 1969.

The House of Representatives on October 14, 1969, passed H.R. 13000, the general Federal Employees' Salary Act.

The Senate passed H.R. 13000 on December 12, 1969, but completely rewrote the text.

THE HOUSE BILL

Key benefits in the House bill were:

For postal employees: A 5.4-percent raise, effective October 1, 1969, for employees in the first 11 pay levels;

A one-step increase July 1, 1970, for employees in pay levels 12 and above;

Acceleration of advancement of employees in their respective pay levels, so that each will reach the top salary step after 8 years of service, instead of the 21 years now required; and

For postal and all other Federal employees: Estbalishment of a permanent "Federal Employees' Salary Commission" to make recommendations to Congress in each February, beginning in 1970, for "comparability" salary adjustments—adjustments which would become effective upon approval by both Houses of Congress within 60 days of a concurrent resolution of approval.

During the floor debate in the House the distinguished minority leader read a statement by the President of the United States implying that the House version of H.R. 13000 would be vetoed if passed by both Houses and submitted to him.

THE SENATE BILL

The Senate struck out all of the House provisions and, in lieu thereof, provided—

For postal and all other Federal employees: Across-the-board percentage increases, effective in January of 1970, of 4 percent in the first nine grades—or levels—3 percent in grades 10 to 12, 2 percent in grades 13 and 14, and 1 percent in grade 15, with no increases above grade 15, and authorized the President to grant "comparability" adjustments in July of 1970 of not less than 3 percent.

The Senate's comparability adjustment would be reduced by whatever was paid under earlier increases except that no employee would receive less than 3 percent in July.

I have made repeated requests of the chairman of the Senate Conferees to meet promptly in conference on H.R. 13000, without result. The latest request was made this afternoon. The House Conferees stand ready to meet at any time of the day or night.

POSTAL PAY—POSTAL CORPORATION MIX

Six days after the Senate passed H.R. 13000 last December, there was presented in our committee a hybrid "compromise" measure, consisting of a modified postal corporation and part of the postal employees' pay raises already included in H.R. 13000.

This measure would have given each postal employee in pay level 11 or below a two-step increase effective in January 1970, and reduced the time required for a postal employee to reach the top pay rate for his level from 21 to 8 years. These are roughly equivalent to two items included in H.R. 13000, but exclude any comparability salary increase in 1970 or any other time. Nothing was provided for other Federal employees.

That measure was rejected later by those who originally presented it before the committee.

However, it was reactiviated some 2 weeks ago and rammed through our committee as a substitute for H.R. 4, the postal reform bill which the committee had been marking up quite effectively.

There was only one major change—the pay benefits for postal employees were largely confined to employees in the first six pay levels. Again, this substitute excluded any comparability pay raise for postal or other Federal employees in 1970 or at any other time.

The position of the administration, as outlined in the President's fiscal 1971 budget message, is that any comparability pay raise for Federal employees, including postal workers, should be postponed 6 months until next January.

This is notwithstanding the policy of Congress, laid down first in 1962 and reiterated three times since, that postal and other Federal employees are entitled to comparability pay adjustments each July to bring them in line with comparable civilian pay scales as of the previous July.

Postal and other Federal workers are now 21 months behind comparable civilian wage rates and the administration-recommended delay would put them 30 months behind. Little wonder then that the employees are complaining.

COMPULSORY UNIONIZATION ISSUE

(Mr. BLACKBURN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, the postal strike which is now gripping many cities in this Nation has brought to national attention the problem of compulsory unionism. I believe that now is the time for Congress to again investigate this issue since it will be a main point of controversy in the postal reform legislation which will be coming before this body within the near future.

Recently one of our foremost national syndicated columnists, David Lawrence, wrote an article concerning problems which arise as a result of compulsory unionism. For the information of my colleagues, I hereby insert this column into the RECORD:

[From the Washington Star, Mar. 11, 1970]

THE COMPULSORY UNIONIZATION ISSUE

(By David Lawrence)

The latest survey shows that nearly 83 percent of the union contracts made with companies nowadays provide some requirement either for membership in the union or dues paying on the part of the employee.

The Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., which has just completed a comprehensive study, says that the most prevalent form of union security is the "union shop," which requires all employees to join the union after 30 days on the job and to maintain membership as a condition of employment.

Eighty-six percent of the contracts cited in the survey call for the deduction of union dues from pay envelopes; in 9 percent of the contracts, employees who do not become members are required to pay service fees equal to the amount of union dues.

Hiring provisions—for example, requiring only that preference be given to workers living in the area or to those with prior experience in the industry—are found in 17 percent of the contracts. But agreements expressly stipulating that union members be hired are almost nonexistent, as these are illegal in companies subject to the Taft-Hartley Act.

In construction and other skilled trade unions, the labor union office supplies the worker when an employer begins a building project in a new area or expands his working force. As a practical matter, a building contractor who operates under a union contract usually asks the union office to send out carpenters, plumbers and other skilled craftsmen for jobs that open up.

This is where union leaders run into conflict with the government's efforts to impose racial quotas on hiring of new employees. Labor leaders complain that the government is trying to force them to take into their unions—and into construction jobs—unqualified Negroes.

Labor unions for the most part conduct their internal affairs amicably, though frequently there are bitter contests between rival candidates for office inside a union which stir up ill feelings. Officials of labor unions have found over the years that they can be re-elected only if they push steadily for wage increases. In a sense they are prompted by what may be called "labor union politics."

Employers recognize often that the union leaders would at times welcome some outside panel to pass judgment on their demands because strikes are costly and occasionally do not yield the anticipated benefits.

Labor unions have steadily grown in size until today the membership is approximately 19 million. The entire labor force is estimated at about 82 million. The unorganized labor population, however, is largely in rural districts and in occupations in which it would be difficult to effect organization.

Broadly speaking, labor union leaders feel that over the years they have benefited by collective bargaining, and that they have in many cases prevented the passage of legislation unfavorable to their own interests.

The power of the national labor union has grown extensively in recent decades. When a strike is called, an entire industry can be shut down because the local unions obey the orders of the leaders of the national union with which they are affiliated. Workers in the skilled trades are almost completely unionized. They have a monopoly in virtually all the manufacturing industries.

Nineteen states have what are known as "right-to-work" laws. These prohibit any labor union from compelling a worker to join a labor organization as a means of getting a job or remaining in a job. The labor groups, however, have managed to prevent the spread of such laws to other states.

What is surprising, of course, is that with all the talk about "liberalism" and "individual rights," a worker in numerous industries must join a union after 30 days in order to keep his job. The employer, moreover, has agreed to the mandate. The courts have never ruled against this obvious invasion of individual rights.

The argument usually heard is that the nonmembers can hardly bargain by themselves and that the labor union represents the only organized body which can conduct collective bargaining negotiations. But the compulsion nevertheless remains, and it is this factor which has led to the development of a National Right-to-Work Committee, which carries on a continuous crusade against any form of compulsory unionization.

ISRAEL'S NEED FOR AIRCRAFT

(Mr. BINGHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am dismayed by the Nixon administration's decision denying Israel's request for additional jet planes. It is not particularly reassuring that the denial is made on an interim basis, subject to review in the light of developments.

Clearly, the Arab States already have six or seven times as many jets as Israel because of the enormous assistance given to them by the Soviet Union. The United Arab Republic alone has 2½ to 3 times as many combat jets as Israel. This ratio represents a dangerous imbalance, in spite of the great superiority of the Israeli pilots and aircraft maintenance.

A very ominous new factor is the Soviet's decision to send in SAM missiles and Russian personnel to man them. It is impossible for me to understand why the President did not withhold his announcement until this new factor had been fully considered in all its implications.

I intend to press in this House for action to bring about a swift reconsideration and reversal of the President's announced decision.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

SENATE—Monday, March 23, 1970

The Senate, as in legislative session, met at 11 o'clock a.m. and was called to order by Hon. THOMAS F. EAGLETON, a Senator from the State of Missouri.

The Chaplain, the Reverend Edward L. R. Elson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Lord of life and God of our salvation, who has brought us to this week of holy recollection, grant that in our work and in our meditation we may be aware of Thy presence, strengthened by Thy power, and guided by Thy spirit. Give us eyes to see that the cycle of death and resurrection is the law of life, that to lose life for others is to find it again in service to Thee.

Teach us, O Lord, that suffering can be redemptive, that truth is invincible, and life impervious to physical death. Let the life of the spirit be nourished in us, that being made new by Thy grace we may serve Thee and this Nation for the welfare of all Thy children and for the establishment of that kingdom whose builder and maker is God. Amen.

DESIGNATION OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read a communication to the Senate.

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., March 23, 1970.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. THOMAS F. EAGLETON, a Senator from the State of Missouri, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
President pro tempore.

Mr. EAGLETON thereupon took the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

The assistant legislative clerk read the name of Robert Harry Nooter, of Missouri, to be an Assistant Administrator of the Agency for International Development.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE NOMINATION OF JUDGE GEORGE HARROLD CARSWELL

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, an appointment to the Supreme Court should be one that would heal, rather than further fragment, the restless mood currently characteristic of America.

Such an appointee could well come from the many distinguished and outstanding lawyers or jurists in any section of the country—North, South, East, and West; and because an otherwise qualified preeminent southern jurist or lawyer could serve to enhance the esteem of and confidence in the Court, such an appointee would have my support.

Judge George Harrold Carswell of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has been nominated by the President and approved by a majority of the Senate Judiciary Committee. We are now called upon to assess the merits of this nomination.

In the dry statistics of the matter, Judge Carswell's career may be briefly summarized as follows: After graduation from Duke University in 1942, he served as a lieutenant in the Navy in World War II. He ran for public office once—for the State Legislature of Georgia—and during the course of that campaign made a speech with which all are now familiar. Upon passing the bar in Georgia in 1948, and in Florida in 1949, he practiced law for 4 years. In 1953, he became a U.S. attorney for the northern district of Florida.

After 5 years' service in that post, Judge Carswell became a U.S. district judge in 1958 and served for 11 years until last year, when he was named to the appellate bench of the fifth circuit.

As one reads the testimony before the Judiciary Committee, it is clear that the service of Judge Carswell as a district judge has been without any discernible distinction. His performance as a district judge offers no seeds of promise that he has the much larger and much greater wisdom that will be needed as one of nine men who, when necessary, determine the constitutionality of the Nation's proceedings.

A dean of one of the Nation's outstanding law schools, Louis H. Pollak, Yale Law School, who canvassed a wide range of Judge Carswell's district court opinions stated:

> There is nothing in these opinions that suggests more than at very best a level of modest competence, no more than that, and I am talking now about the general run of contract, of tort, of Federal jurisdiction, of tax cases, the run of cases which a District Judge has before him.

And in regard to civil rights cases, he found a propensity to dispose of cases through techniques that avoided hearings. As a result, litigants could have been deprived of a day in court. Dean Pollak concluded that—

> The nominee presents more slender credentials than any nominee for the Supreme Court put forth in this century.

Perhaps, however, the most disturbing testimony before the committee was that of a former litigant in civil rights matters who appeared before Judge Carswell's court and who presently is an associate professor of law. Leroy D. Clark, associate professor of law, New York University Law School, who was representing the National Conference of Black Lawyers, discussed the long period of delay and dilatory tactics which he found characteristic of Judge Carswell's rulings. He also told the committee:

> It was not unusual for Judge Carswell to shout at a black lawyer who appeared before him while using a civil tone to opposing counsel. . . . Judge Carswell was insulting and hostile. . . . I have been in Judge Carswell's court on at least one occasion in which he turned his chair away from me when I was arguing. . . . Judge Carswell was the most hostile Federal District Court Judge I have ever appeared before with respect to civil right matters.

There was similar testimony from other attorneys.

We know that a trial judge's job is not an easy one. He is human. He will at times appear gruff and arbitrary. The testimony is nevertheless disturbing and my feeling about it was not relieved by Judge Carswell's general reply as to his belief that a judge should be courteous to counsel.

The Supreme Court is a high and independent branch of Government, which deserves the best talent that America has to offer. Particularly now when our country is torn by rifts and doubts, those who are to serve this Nation on that High Court should be capable of commencing that service in the knowledge that they can and do inspire confidence and unity.

We may hold a jurist in high honor even though we disagree with his decisions. In light of all the circumstances, the kind of stature that brings the respect of all Americans does not appear to be present in the professional credentials and attainments of Judge Carswell. For these reasons, I shall vote against confirmation.

VETERANS EDUCATION AND TRAINING AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1970—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 11959) to amend chapters 31, 34, and 35 of title 38, United States Code, in order to increase the rates of vocational rehabilitation, educational assistance, and special training allowance paid to eligible veterans and persons under such chapters. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The assistant legislative clerk read the report.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of March 18, 1970, pp. H1891–H1894, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. I am happy to say that I know of no objection on this side to the immediate consideration of the conference report.

I congratulate the Senator from California for bringing it up at this time. I am in favor of it.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I express my thanks to the distinguished minority leader.

There has been a bipartisan approach in the Senate, and I am delighted that this has been true, all the way through to final action.

Mr. President, today is a momentous day for all Vietnam veterans as this most comprehensive piece of veterans education and training legislation reaches the culmination of a long process that began well over a year ago. Final congressional action on this landmark bill is surely an appropriate event to mark the first legislative day of a new season—a season of growth and life just as the GI bill has meant so much growth and advancement for more than 8 million veterans since World War II.

It has been a great privilege for me over the past year to serve as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, following in the footsteps of the illustrious leadership provided by three former chairmen and present fellow members of that committee who have been of such great assistance in passing this measure. So I wish to pay especial tribute and express my deep appreciation today to these three colleagues: the full committee chairman (Mr. YARBOROUGH), my immediate predecessor as subcommittee chairman (Mr. KENNEDY), and the ranking majority member of the full committee (Mr. RANDOLPH).

Particularly, I want to call to the attention of the Senate the deep devotion and dedication brought to the work of writing, considering, and passing this measure and then hammering out an equitable compromise in conference by my distinguished friend from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH). His unceasing championship of veterans benefits, especially those relating to education and training needs and rights in three decades has brought us to the point we have reached today—where we are finally to offer Vietnam era veterans a really viable GI bill program, suited to the demands of the 1970's and with benefits approximating the degree of coverage under the Korean conflict program. Senator YARBOROUGH deserves the highest praise from all veterans for fighting to insure that these benefits are being raised to levels reasonably commensurate with the enormous inflation in education costs over the last 20 years. In working out a final resolution in the conference, he has been a valiant fighter, a shrewd negotiator and a wise counsellor, and I thank him for all this.

Also deserving special consideration for his great work on this bill is the most able assistant majority leader (Mr. KENNEDY). His sensitivity and insight in introducing S. 2361 a year ago served as an inspiration for and forerunner of S. 2668 which I subsequently introduced last June and the basic provisions of which are today traveling the next to last step toward enactment into law. Senator KENNEDY worked with me closely in developing the legislative scheme of the bill's title II programs aimed at dramatically improving opportunities for educationally disadvantaged and academically deficient veterans. And so I specially thank him today, also.

Senate consideration of this bill has been characterized by bipartisan and unanimous support and cooperation from subcommittee—October 6—and full committee—October 9—consideration to floor consideration—77 to 0 on October 23 and again on December 18—through the three long conference sessions—February 5, March 10 and March 17—and on to the floor today for final action. Indispensable to securing this bipartisan approach has been the most effective leadership of the ranking minority member of the subcommittee (Mr. SCHWEIKER) and the ranking minority member of the full committee (Mr. JAVITS), both cosponsors of virtually all the Senate measures in the bill. I thank them for the extremely valuable work they have contributed to this bill and our Vietnam veterans.

The remaining Senate conferees on the bill—Mr. MONDALE, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. DOMINICK, Mr. SAXBE, and Mr. SMITH—also contributed substantially to the ability of the Senate conferees to present a united, firm, yet reasonable position in the negotiations. They were most dedicated and generous with their valuable time. And I thank and congratulate them all.

Finally, and perhaps of greatest note is the most helpful attitude and conciliatory spirit and approach of the chairman of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, OLIN E. TEAGUE, who chaired the conference with such outstanding assurance, equanimity and openmindedness. Without his advice, forbearance, and leadership of the House conferees, ably assisted by his ranking majority and minority members and the outstanding work of the House committee staff director and his staff, there would be no bill today.

Although the conference required three long sessions and countless hours of staff work over 40 days and 40 nights to iron out the 19 differences between the House and Senate versions, I hope everyone will agree that the results were well worth the effort in order to bring to rest—so to speak—legislative ark and discharge these many new programs to the world. After I have described the provisions in the bill, I believe all will agree that their significance justifies my rhetoric.

TITLE I

Senator YARBOROUGH will speak about the GI bill rates in title I of the bill, but as chairman of the Senate conferees, I wish to report some basic matters to the Senate in justification of the conference recommendations.

The basic GI bill rate—the educational assistance allowance rate—would be increased by 34.6 percent under the conference bill. For the veteran with no dependents, studying full time, this means an increase from the present $130 per month to $175. For a veteran with two dependents, for example, this bill will mean an increase from the present $175 to $230 if he is studying full time. The same 34.6-percent rate increase also applies to the apprenticeship/on-job-training allowance and the farm cooperative education assistance allowance.

This amount of increase represents a compromise between the 27-percent increase proposed in the August 4 House bill and the 46 percent in the Senate October 23 bill. Although there was general agreement among all the conferees that it was vital to increase allowances to provide a comparable degree of coverage of comprehensive education costs—room, board, and tuition—to the proposition covered under the Korean GI bill program, initial disagreement arose in the conference about how most accurately to compute the cost figures in order to achieve this comparability. I believe we have struck a balance which is reasonable and equitable, although the Senate conferees fought tenaciously for higher rates.

According to Office of Education statistics, the average comprehensive college education costs in 1952–53 were $718. The nine monthly payments of the $110 allowance then in effect covered 138 percent of those costs for the veteran attending a public institution. The comparable 1969–70 public education costs are $1,110, and nine $175 monthly payments will cover 142 percent of those costs; this provides somewhat of a hedge against the expected education cost inflation for the first year.

So, as far as veterans in public schools are concerned, there can be no dispute that the results of the conference are completely appropriate. With reference to veterans attending nonpublic schools, however, the results are not quite so satisfactory. For 1952–53, comprehensive education costs at nonpublic institutions were $1,219, and the GI bill payment then covered 81.2 percent of those costs. Whereas the $175 monthly allowance recommended by the conference will cover only 65.9 percent of 1969–70 nonpublic education costs of $2,391.

A very substantial mitigating factor regarding coverage of nonpublic education costs is that whereas 37 percent of Korean veterans attended nonpublic institutions under that GI bill, the proportion has dropped to 27 percent under the present program. Admittedly, this is due in part to the fact that the rates have been wholly inadequate to cover private college education costs. But it also is undoubtedly a function of the vast improvement in the quality of public higher education and the tremendous competition for admission to private colleges.

Then Senate conferees would certainly have preferred an education assistance allowance rate, which would have been more equitable across the board. A more appropriate increase, taking into consideration the proportion of veterans attending nonpublic institutions, would have been a flat 40-percent increase—to $182. This figure would have almost exactly approximated the proportion of coverage of 1952–53 education costs averaged between public and nonpublic institutions on a weighted basis, counting 63 percent of public costs and 37 percent of the nonpublic. This formula shows coverage in 1952–53 of 113 percent of the average education costs so weighted. Whereas, in order to cover a 1969–70 weighted average, counting public costs as 73 percent and nonpublic as 27 percent, an $183 allowance is required.

With regard to the vocational rehabilitation subsistence allowance, now $110 a month for a veteran who has a 30-percent or greater service-connected disability, who is taking full-time institutional study, the conferees agreed upon a $25 increase, or 22.7 percent, to $135. The disparity between the House and Senate versions was very substantial on this provision, the Senate having increased the allowance to $160 per month and the House to $127. It was recognized that this allowance is intended for living purposes since the Veterans' Administration under chapter 31 of title 38, United States Code, pays the full education and training costs for such veterans. Because these rates were last increased in 1965, a cost-of-living increment was added to overcome the 20.6-percent increase since then in cost of living, according to the most recent Consumer Price Index figure. The additional 2.1 percent provides a small hedge against inflation.

The need for a significant increase in this subsistence allowance is well documented in the following excerpts from a recent letter to the subcommittee:

I attend Baylor University as a disabled veteran seeking vocational rehabilitation.

In favor of giving additional training allowances to our class are these facts:

1. While we do receive free tuition and text books, we have to buy many supplementary books (over $100 in one education class), supplies, fees, dues, etc. not paid for by the VA.

2. The VA pays the "going rate" at the school for tutors. This in Baylor's case is $1.75. I have had to pay the difference between $1.75 an hour and $5.00 an hour for several tutors. Tutors are not easy to come by. I am 55 years old and did not complete the third year of high school during the depression.

3. Disabled veterans frequently cannot drive cars or get driver's licenses. This has the double effect of making transportation to school more expensive and causing—in my case—the purchase of many supplementary texts and professional journals that are on reserve lists or not available at the library during the hours I am on campus. There is no public transportation available after 5:30 p.m. nor on Sundays in Waco, (and many other small cities).

4. The younger Viet Nam and Korean veterans (and Cold War), are likely to be able to hold part time jobs. The reason the VA is sending me to school is that I am "unemployable." I am unable to locate part time work. . . .

5. When I started to Baylor on the VA program, Cokes were 5¢. Now they are 15¢. Bus fare was 20¢. Now it is 35¢. To change a course was $5.00 and I was billed. Now it is $10 and cash must be on the barrel head. . . .

6. Once I get thru college, I'll probably be off the VA rolls. The government will likely gain substantial taxes from me whereas now my entire income is tax free—and at government expense.

To meet these escalating needs of vocational rehabilitation trainees, the Senate conferees sought to achieve a substantially higher increase than 22.7 percent, but were unable to prevail on the House conferees.

Finally, regarding the overall rate structure, it is important to point out that despite a substantial influx of Vietnam veterans into GI bill training over the past 8 months, the absolute proportion of participation in GI bill training has increased only slightly—about 10 percent—since June of 1969. At that time, only 20.7 percent of post-Korean veterans had participated as compared with 26.5 and 25.9 percent after 36 months of operation of the Korean conflict and World War II GI bill programs, respectively.

Through November 1, 1969, 23 percent of post-Korean trainees had entered training under the present GI bill, as compared with 30.5 and 30.3 percent after 41 months of operation under the prior two programs, respectively. So actually, despite some absolute increase in the current participation rate, that rate is now considerably further behind the Korean and World War II program rates than it was last June. In fact, it is now lagging by about 33 percent.

It is the hope of the Senate conferees that participation will be greatly encouraged and expanded by the new rate schedules.

Before leaving title I of the bill, I wish to report to the Senate with regard to the new farm cooperative and private pilot training loan programs contained in sections 102 (d) and (c), respectively, of H.R. 11959 as it passed the Senate on October 23. Although the Senate conferees eventually receded on these programs, neither of which was contained in either the August 4 or December 18 House bill, we did so only after the most extended debate and consideration in the conference and after every effort was exhausted to convince the House conferees of the need for these programs. In this effort, Senator YARBOROUGH, the author of these two provisions, did valiant service. And I think it is a great credit to him that despite his very strong personal convictions regarding these programs, when he saw no glimmer of compromise from the House side on them he placed as the highest priority the welfare of all Vietnam era trainees and the need to move this bill out of conference. In return for Senate recession on these provisions, however, the House conferees agreed to hold hearings promptly on a House bill containing the Yarborough farm cooperative program to be introduced by the chairman of the House committee.

Now, I will turn to title II of the conference bill.

TITLE II

Title II of the bill will, I believe, prove to be of enduring significance for many of the 1 million educationally disadvantaged veterans who will have separated from the service in the 5 fiscal years through fiscal 1971. The provisions to which I am referring arose out of S. 2668, S. 2506, and S. 2700 which I introduced last summer. They constitute the first major programs for academically deficient and culturally and educationally deprived veterans ever enacted in a GI bill.

The greatest need for these special programs and provisions is illustrated in a great variety of ways. First, despite the slight absolute increase, described earlier, in the present GI bill overall participation rate, there is no indication whatsoever that participation by those who need education and training the most, the high school dropout veteran has increased above the level in June 1969. Then that rate was only 6.1 percent of all post-Korean veterans without high school diplomas, three times lower than dropout participation in the two prior programs.

The result of this enormous underutilization is that, based on a recent study of 114,000 men recently separated from the Army after one term, unemployment among high school dropout veterans is 9.2 percent, considerably more than twice as high as the 3.5 rate for the total population at the time these figures were compiled. And the unemployment rate for black dropout veterans—18.4 percent—is twice again as high as the rate for all dropout veterans. A remarkable and highly disturbing statistic is that among black veterans with Armed Forces qualification test scores in the three highest percentiles, the employment rate averages more than 10 percent. This demonstrates graphically that our society is letting a most valuable potential resource be dissipated.

Further indication of the disadvantages of untrained veteran dropouts, especially blacks, is provided by the study's data on postservice occupations and average earnings. These are discussed in an excellent column by Richard Harwood, entitled "Greater Commitment Needed To Assist Vietnam Veterans," which appeared in the Washington Post on March 18. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREATER COMMITMENT NEEDED TO ASSIST VIETNAM VETERANS

(By Richard Harwood)

At least one version of the unpublished report of the President's Committee on the Vietnam Veteran is in circulation here and it contains a poignant paragraph on the plight of the poorly educated foot soldiers who have been saddled with the burden of this unpopular war:

"They return to civilian life very much the same as when they entered active service, except that they are a bit older, perhaps more cynical and more poorly motivated for readjustment. The alternatives available to such persons are very limited."

How limited these alternatives are is reflected in some post-service studies of what happens to these young men after they come home. If they are black and have less than a high-school education, 12 per cent find themselves unemployed, a rate that is three times the national average. The rate for the same class of white veterans is also high—5 per cent.

Those among the least educated who find jobs are not made affluent overnight by a grateful society. The black veteran without a high-school diploma averages $104 a week; his white counterpart averages $120. The situation is not much different when all returning veterans are considered—the well-educated as well as the poorly educated. Their average wage is $125 a week.

The explanation is simple. Only 5 per cent of these men wind up in the desirable professional and white-collar jobs this society has to offer. Out of 105,688 ex-service men covered in a Defense Department job survey 18 months ago, only 92 became lawyers or judges; 391 went into the medical and health fields; fewer than 1,600 went into architecture and engineering.

The rest wound up in the obscure clerical and blue-collar jobs that are the lot of Middle America—in factories, on construction gangs, in record-keeping, warehousing and truck-driving.

Only 12 per cent of the white veterans with high school diplomas and only 9 per cent of the blacks go on to college. And among those who take that step the going is rough. The government gives the single veteran $130 a month to buy higher education and to support himself, a figure that was settled upon as "non-inflationary" in 1967 and that has since been eroded by a 15 per cent increase in educational costs.

When President Nixon appointed his Committee on the Vietnam Veteran in June, 1969, he said he was "shocked and surprised" at the small number of veterans—between 20 and 25 per cent—who were taking advantage of the current version of the GI bill. One reason for this, his committee has learned, is that about half of the 800,000 or so men sent back to civilian life each year are never counseled or advised of their opportunities.

Moreover, the most handicapped GIs—those with the lowest IQs and fewest educational credentials—needed more than a friendly chat and a handful of pamphlets churned out by the Veterans Administration. They need, one critic of the present system has written, "convincing" forms of help that will enable the man on the bottom rungs of society to overcome "his cynicism by persuading him that he really does have a chance to obtain an education, acquire status, and become a productive member of the society from which he has been almost completely alienated . . . Regretfully, I find very little of this consciousness or planning in the President's Committee Report."

"Convincing" forms of help for these men will cost money and up to now there has been no suggestion whatever from the Nixon administration that it is prepared to raise the ante for returning GIs.

That was the attitude of the Johnson administration, too. It opposed efforts to provide more liberal education and training allowances in 1967 and continuing pressures from this administration to hold down costs are reported on Capitol Hill. There are strong arguments that this may be a shortsighted policy.

Stuart Feldman, a recent consultant to HEW Secretary Robert Finch on veterans problems, has written:

"Our continuing prosperity since 1945 has occurred on such a grand scale because of the trained labor force and management that the GI bill provided. The Vietnam returnees represent this same potential. The 80,000 black returnees discharged each year especially do. They are among the country's best chance to obtain black leaders. If the black veterans get an adequate education, they will provide the potential black lawyers, teachers, principals, corporate officials and technical employees the nation seriously needs if it is to become truly integrated."

The amount of money required is small as the bureaucracy measures money. What is needed is a commitment from Congress and the administration to do the right thing for people who have done the hard thing for this country since 1965.

Mr. CRANSTON. Moreover, this study shows that 10 months after service only 29.5 percent of these 1968 separatees were in school or training programs, and the figure for those using their G.I. bill benefits is only 26 percent. This is slightly higher than the overall 23 percent participation rate for the post-Korean program, but the significant factor is that almost all of the 114,000 men surveyed were 25 years old or under, and the participation rate for that same age group in the World War II program was 61 percent.

This study further shows that a veteran's likelihood of taking advantage of GI bill benefits is determined almost entirely by his preservice educational achievement rather than by his aptitude. For example, three times more veterans with some prior college experience returned to school than those who had not gone to college. Yet both groups were found to be equally intelligent.

Similarly, high school dropouts are four times less likely to take any further education or training than men who have had 2 or 3 years of college. Men of average intelligence who complete high school are twice as likely to further their education as high school dropouts with the same aptitude.

An excellent discussion of the problems and attitudes of returning black veterans appeared in the March 1970 issue of Trans-Action, and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that this article, entitled "Black Veterans Return," by James Fendrich and Michael Pearson be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. CRANSTON. The new programs contained in title II of the conference bill were fully explained and justified on pages 30 through 63 of Senate Report No. 91-487, to which I would refer all those seeking specific guidance.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF TITLES II AND III

In the section-by-section analysis of titles II and III I have discussed only those provisions in which changes of substance are made in the conference bill.

Section 201. Subsections (a) and (b), which were originally contained in sections 201 (a) and (b) of the Senate version, were accepted by the House in section 201 (a) and (b) of its December 18 amendment to the Senate amendment to the bill.

Section 202. Subsection (a) was originally contained in section 2 of H.R. 6808—which passed the House on May 19, 1969—and was also contained in section 202(a) of the House December 18 amendment. The Senate accepted the House provision with the modification contained in the "unless" clause in paragraph (2) which is intended to embody the qualifying language set forth on page 3 of the House committee report on H.R. 6808—House Report No. 91-243, 91st Congress, first session, 1969.

Subsection (b) was inadvertently included in the conference bill as it was accepted by the House on March 19, 1970. This provision was originally contained in section 2(b) of H.R. 6808 and was also contained in section 202(b) of the December 18 House amendment. A concurrent resolution to correct this technical error by directing that in the enrollment of the bill this subsection be deleted will be introduced and, it is expected, passed, in the House of Representatives today. As soon as it reaches the Senate, I plan to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. The House conferees agreed to recede on this provision and instead to treat this issue by the amendment contained in section 212 of the conference bill. The Senate conferees objected to this provision because of its intended effect to permit the Veterans' Administration to disregard a State law requirement that certain periods of apprenticeship or on-job training were necessary.

Section 203. Subsection (a) was originally contained in section 102(a) of the October 23 Senate amendment to H.R. 11959 and was accepted by the House in section 203(a) of the December 18 amendment.

Subsection (b), which was originally contained in section 2(c) of H.R. 6808, was contained in section 205 of the Senate October 23 amendment and was accepted by the House in its December 18 amendment.

Section 204. Subsections (a) (1) and (2) were originally contained in section 202(a) of the Senate October 23 amendment.

Subsection (a) (3) was added in conference in order to require that educational assistance allowance payments in the predischarge education program be advanced in a lump sum after the first month's payment and to permit similar educational assistance allowance advances to be made to eligible veterans pursuing training on less than a half-time basis under the regular GI bill. The required advances for PREP trainees were thought necessary to insure that trainees would receive their allowances under the PREP program in time to pay the approved charges to the school prior to the discharge of the "preveteran."

Subsection (a) (4) is substantially the same as subsection 202(a) (3) of the Senate October 23 amendment except as I shall indicate. This subsection adds two new subchapters to chapter 34 of title 38, United States Code.

Subchapter V—Special Assistance for the Educationally Disadvantaged. Section 1691. Clause 2 in subsection (b) of this section in the October 23 Senate amendment was deleted in light of assurances from the Veterans' Administration that its regulations were sufficiently flexible to permit substantial latitude to educational institutions designing college preparatory programs for eligible veterans under this provision. For example, the language regarding "supervised program work" in the original Senate measure was intended to permit approval of courses taught in other than a strict classroom setting. Under this provision in the conference bill, such a course may be part of an approvable precollege program if the college grants credit for it; and, by virtue of the "notwithstanding" provision and the new definition of full-time college training in section 206(a) of the conference bill, a full-time allowance could be received by the enrolled veteran if he was carrying 6 credit and 6 noncredit hours of courses—or their equivalent on a nonsemester semester basis—and the institution considered 12 hours or its equivalent a full-time load. If a veteran in this college preparatory program is fully occupied in the education program designed by the institution, in accordance with VA regulations permitting maximum flexibility, it is intended that he should be able to receive a full-time educational assistance allowance.

Section 1692 provides for payment of a special supplementary assistance allowance to a veteran enrolled in a post-secondary course at an educational institution on a half-time or more basis in order for him to purchase individualized tutoring services essential to correct a marked deficiency in a subject which is part of prerequisite or indispensable to his satisfactory pursuit of an approved program of education at that institution. When the educational institution properly certifies to the Veterans' Administration as to the essentiality of the tutorial assistance to correct such a marked deficiency, the qualifications of the tutor and the reasonableness of his charges, the veteran is entitled to receive a supplemental payment to his regular educational assistance allowance to purchase those services. The tutor could either be arranged for by the veteran, the school or perhaps a veteran's voluntary service group on the campus, as long as the institution makes proper certification.

Regarding section 1692, the House conferees believed strongly that, as with the modified PREP program in section 1695 et seq., payments should be made to the individual veteran under the GI bill rather than directly to an educational institution on the veteran's behalf, as was provided for in the Senate October 23 amendment. Also, the conferees agreed that the inclusion of remedial or refresher courses in this section was unnecessary in light of their coverage under the "notwithstanding" provision, permitting counting noncredit courses for payment of educational assistance allowance purposes, which is contained in section 206(a) of the conference bill; and that such an allowance was not needed for students at lower than a post-secondary level in light of the generally free or very low cost education available to them.

The words "marked deficiency" are intended to limit the tutorial assistance to veterans in academic difficulty for the purpose of preventing them from failing courses and permitting them to make satisfactory progress in them, rather than permitting them to achieve academic excellence or merely improve already satisfactory academic performance. For example, supplementary assistance would be available for a veteran needing tutoring in a subject prerequisite to taking a college credit course needed for graduation; a veteran needing tutoring in such a credit course itself; or a veteran needing tutoring in language skills, such as for a veteran of foreign descent, in order to pursue satisfactorily any college-level work taught in the English language.

The tutorial assistance may be provided by a qualified, certified tutor at the same time to two or three veterans requiring such assistance. But the clear purpose of the provision is that individual, special tutorial attention be available to the academically deficient veteran, and, therefore, no larger groups should be approved.

The tutoring allowance was limited to $50 per month for a total entitlement period of 9 months during a veteran's GI bill training. This should allow about 20 hours of tutoring per month at present going rates for undergraduate tutors—$2.50 per hour. It is recognized that some veterans may require more than 20 tutoring hours per month for more than 9 months during the period of their post-secondary education. The conferees felt, however, that in the case of a new, untried program it was more prudent to begin at a somewhat lower than optimum level of benefits and, after some experience in administering the program has been acquired, review the sufficiency of the benefits and entitlement, determine how carefully schools are carrying out their certification requirements, and whether there are abuses under this new program. Toward this end, the Veterans' Administration should consider the desirability of providing by regulation a reasonable limitation on the monthly tutorial hours for which one tutor can be certified by the educational institution.

Section 1693 contains the basic provision which was contained in section 1694 in section 202(a)(3) of the Senate October 23 amendment. The Senate receded on the proposed section 1693 contained in section 202(a)(3) of the Senate version, regarding grants and contracts for special veterans educational programs. The conferees were generally in agreement as to the desirability of these types of special educational programs for educationally disadvantaged or academically deficient veterans, and the agreed-upon conference language for section 1690 includes a specific encouragement to educational institutions to develop varieties of special educational assistance programs for veterans. However, the House conferees believed that the Veterans' Administration's general method of operation was not well suited to a grant or contract approach for such programs. Rather, it was felt that the VA format of individual veterans' entitlements should be maintained, and that many of the programs which the section 1693 provision would have authorized were covered under sections 1691, 1692 and the PREP program in section 1695 et seq., as they were modified in conference, as well as by existing VA contract authority under section 213, title 38, United States Code.

Subchapter VI—Predischarge education program. This program is substantially the same as, and even somewhat expanded over, the original provision in the Senate October 23 amendment. Three adjustments were made to tighten the program administratively and accord more with the philosophy of the House conferees. First, as with the special supplementary assistance allowance, payments would be made directly to the individual "preveteran" under the GI bill rather than directly to an educational institution on the veteran's behalf, as was provided for in the Senate October 23 amendment. Payments would be gaged to cover the cost of tuition and fees—including all reasonable admissions costs and those for determining suitability for enrollment—and necessary schoolbooks and supplies up to $175 per month. Under section 204(a) of the conference bill, these payments would be required to be advanced for the full term to the "preveteran" after the first month's payment.

The new subsection (b) in 1696 is intended to provide maximum flexibility to educational institutions in designing PREP training, just as with the college preparatory program in section 1691(a)(2) and (b), except that the language of section 1696(b) recognizes that there are unlikely to be any "same" programs in which "similarly circumstanced nonveterans" are enrolled and so leaves discretion to the Veterans' Administration to compute allowable rates in accordance with charges for similiar programs, a legislative gloss already placed on the present section 1682(b), on which this subsection was modeled. The reference in section 1696(a) to "in section 1682(b) of this title" should read "in subsection (b) of this section," and this will be rectified by authority of the concurrent resolution I alluded to earlier.

The PREP program contemplates that participating educational institutions will be able to recoup the full, reasonable costs entailed in providing predischarge education or training. Although it is recognized that some institutions may not generally charge tuition or fees for regular courses, it seems unreasonable that such institutions would be expected to provide special programs, such as PREP, without charging enrolled students appropriately.

Second, the role of the Commissioner of Education is eliminated, although the Administrator may, of course, utilize the resources of the Office of Education in establishing regulations.

Third, as insisted upon by the House conferees, the exemptions from present sections 1673(d) and 1675, which were in section 1697 in the Senate October 23 amendments, have been eliminated so as to exclude proprietary institutions from PREP participation unless the requirements of those sections are met; and correspondence courses are explicitly excluded in light of the availability to servicemen of the excellent U.S. Armed Forces Institute correspondence program.

On the other hand, the PREP program in the conference bill permits any serviceman after 180 days of active duty to enroll in an elementary or secondary school level program without charge to the regular GI bill entitlement under present section 1661, in the same manner as is provided for veterans under section 1691(a)(1), and to receive an educational assistance allowance computed to cover the costs of such education up to $175 per month.

It is important to stress that section 1697, which is derived from section 1698 of the Senate October 23 amendment, contemplates that educational and vocational guidance will be provided by the Veterans' Administration, through contract with the educational institution providing PREP or otherwise, at both ends of PREP programs: first, to counsel and assist the serviceman in enrolling in a PREP program and, second, at the end of the PREP program to insure that the then PREP'ed "preveteran" will be motivated and able to carry out the purpose set forth in section 1695—that he then go on to pursue future education or training under the GI bill.

Section 205, which was originally contained—with somewhat different language—in section 2(d) of H.R. 6808, was contained in section 206 of the Senate October 23 amendment and was accepted in section 204 of the December 18 House amendment.

Section 206. Clause (3) to be added to the present section 1684(a) of title 38, United States Code, was originally contained in section 3(c) of H.R. 11959 as it passed the House on August 4. It was accepted in section 203 of the Senate October 23 amendment. Clause (4) and the "notwithstanding" provision were originally contained in section 203 of the Senate October 23 amendment. The "notwithstanding" provision was accepted in section 206 of the December 18 House amendment. The House conferees receded on clause (4).

Section 207 was originally contained in section 208 of the October 23 Senate amendment, and the House receded on that provision. However, as to the implementation of this provision, see the discussion under section 301 below.

Section 208, which was originally contained in section 3 of H.R. 6808, was contained in section 207 of the October 23 Senate amendment and was accepted in section 207 of the House December 18 amendment.

Section 209, which was originally contained in section 3(c) of H.R. 6808, was contained in section 208 of the House December 18 amendment, and the Senate receded on this provision with the same amendment added to section 202(a) of the conference bill.

Section 210, which was originally contained in section 3(d) of H.R. 6808, was contained in section 209 of the House December 18 amendment, and the Senate receded on this provision. Regarding section 205 in the House December 18 amendment, applying the same Philippines peso treatment to chapter 34 as section 210 of the conference bill applies to chapter 35 and originally contained in section 2(e) of H.R. 6808, the House receded on this provision in view of the Senate's view that any such restriction applied only to those overseas veterans residing in the Philippines was unfairly discriminatory.

Section 211, which was originally contained in section 4 of H.R. 6808, was contained in section 209(1) of the Senate October 23 amendment and was accepted in section 210 of the House December 18 amendment.

Section 212 was added in conference as a substitute for the amendment to section 1673—which through inadvertance appears in section 202(b) of the conference bill. This provision was originally contained in section 2(b) of H.R. 6808 and was contained in section 202(b) of the House December 18 amendment. The addition of "and supervised" to the present section 1777(a) is intended to make clear that, in order to be approved for GI bill training, an on-the-job training program must have genuine on-job supervision of the trainee by a qualified instructor.

Section 213, which was originally contained in section 5 of H.R. 6808, was contained in section 209(2) of the Senate October 23 amendment and accepted in section 211 of the House December 18 amendment.

Outreach services program. Section 214 was basically contained in section 204 of the October 23 Senate amendment and the House receded on this provision with certain amendments. Provisions from section 241 of the original Senate provision are contained in sections 241 and 242 of the conference bill.

Section 241. Clause (1), regarding written advice of benefits at discharge, especially to dropouts, expands on the clause (1) contained in section 241(d) in the original Senate provision and generally codifies present Veterans' Administration practice.

Clause (2), regarding distribution of full information on VA and other benefits, is substantially the same as clause (1) in the original Senate provision.

Clause (3), regarding provision of aid and assistance to veterans, eligible dependents and Armed Forces members, is substantially the same as clause (3) in the original Senate provision. It also includes the crux of subsection (4) in the original Senate provision as well as the basic personal-interview requirement contained in clause (2) of that provision.

Clauses (3), (4), and (6) in section 241(d) in the original Senate provision were not retained, essentially because they are subsumed under other included provisions: as to clause (3), clauses (1) and (3) in section 243 in the conference bill include its basic thrust; as to clause (4) it is subsumed under aid and assistance in clause (3) in the conference bill; and as to clause (6), its substance is implicit in section 244 in the conference bill requiring an annual report to Congress.

Section 242. Subsection (a) is virtually identical to the original Senate section 241(a), except that the addition of the parenthetical carriers over the thrust of subsection (b) in section 241 in the original Senate provision. The words "need for" were inadvertantly omitted from the parenthetical after "including their", and this will be rectified by authority of the concurrent resolution I alluded to earlier. The new subsection (b) in section 242 of the conference bill was added to provide clear authority for the use of special telephone tielines to provide outreach services to more remote cities and communities.

Section 243 is substantially the same as section 242 of the original provision except that clauses (1) and (2) of the original Senate provision are merged in clause (2) of section 243 in the conference provision, and clause (5) of the original Senate provision was not included since basic contract authority is already contained in section 213, title 38, United States Code.

Clause (1) of section 243 in the conference bill provides clear recognition of the Veterans' Administration's responsibility to negotiate with and oversee the Department of Labor's veterans' employment and training functions and carries over the thrust of clause (3) in section 241(d) in the original Senate provision.

Section 244 carries over the thrust of section 243 in the original Senate provision and subsumes the followup requirements contained in clause (6) of section 241(d) in the original Senate provision.

The Senate conferees receded with respect to the relocation assistance allowance provision contained in section 241 (e) of the Senate provision. The House conferees believed that such a measure was more appropriate for inclusion in general manpower and training legislation. A general relocation assistance provision is contained in the administration's proposed comprehensive manpower bill, S. 2838, section 101(8), currently pending in the Employment, Manpower, and Poverty Subcommittee. However, there was agreement that job assistance for veterans and identification of veterans special employment and training needs was highly desirable and that the budget of the veterans employment service requires substantial expansion. And I am currently preparing amendments to S. 2838, in cooperation with that bill's sponsor, Senator JAVITS, to accomplish these and other purposes.

Overall, the veterans outreach services program which would be established by section 214(a) of the conference bill represents a clear congressional determination that a more extensive and intensive program of veterans' benefit counseling and outreach efforts is badly needed. Such a program can be of great service, not only to the educationally disadvantaged veteran, but also to any veteran who is unclear about the extent of his entitlements and where his future lies.

As the Senate report makes clear, the present VA USVAC program is not doing the necessary job, largely because of unreasonable budgetary and personnel restrictions imposed upon the VA by the Bureau of the Budget. A hopeful approach is represented by the Veterans' Administration's recent steps to cooperate with the Department of Labor, the California Department of Human Resources, and the County of Los Angeles in the establishment of a Veterans Service Center in the East Los Angeles, Calif., community in order to meet the needs of Mexican-American veterans residing in that area. Such intergovernmental and interagency programs may be an excellent method of effectively carrying out the new outreach functions.

The overall cost estimate of the bill for fiscal year 1971 does not include a figure for this program, because it is expected that the Veterans' Administration will proceed to survey its present contact and outreach facilities and develop plans for expanding these services in line with the provisions of this new subchapter. It is then expected that the Veterans' Administration will promptly submit to the appropriate congressional committees these plans and a recommendation for an expanded budget for this program in fiscal year 1970.

Section 215, which was originally contained in sections 6 and 7 of H.R. 6808, was contained in section 212 of the December 18 House amendment, and the Senate receded on this technical change.

TITLE III

Section 301. Regarding the effective date of the rate amendments in title I, the Senate October 23 amendment was retroactive to September 1, 1969, 7 weeks prior to passage, and the House actions were both prospective by about 2 months. The February 1 date retains almost exactly the same 7-week retroactivity originally provided for in the Senate October 23 amendment and should permit coverage of most of the second semester of the 1969–70 school year for most trainees.

Regarding sections 204(a), 206, 210, and 213, it is understood by the conferees that the Veterans' Administration will be able to implement the immediate effective date as to educational assistance allowance checks issued in May for April entitlements, assuming the bill is not signed until April. It is recognized, however, that certain administrative difficulties may be unavoidable and that some retroactive payments may have to be made.

Regarding section 207, the original Senate provision was made effective July 1, 1970, by section 210 of the October 23 Senate amendment. It is understood that the Veterans' Administration will be able to implement this provision fully on a current basis in May 1970 and that at that point it will provide retroactive notification for any eligible person who may have been missed between the effective date and that time.

Finally, regarding the PREP program in section 204(a) of the conference bill, it is recognized that that program cannot be implemented until the Veterans' Administration issues the regulations required under section 1696(a); it is understood, however, that those regulations will be promulgated, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense, at the earliest possible date.

EXAMPLE OF TITLE II BENEFITS

Before concluding discussion of title II of the bill, I think it would be most helpful to an understanding of the scope and sweep of the new special benefits and programs established in that title if I traced how they might affect one hypothetical veteran exposed to all of them.

Let us take a Mexican American from east Los Angeles who dropped out of high school after the 10th grade and was drafted at age 19. After he completes his 6 months basic training, he is approached by a college counselor under PREP who convinces him of the importance of continuing his schooling and he enrolls under PREP in a special accelerated program at a nearby private college to assist him in securing credits toward his high school diploma. He makes significant progress but is held back by his lack of facility in spoken and written English.

He then is sent to Vietnam; and after his tour, while awaiting discharge, is again recruited into a special 4-month college preparatory PREP program run by a nearby community college on the base where he is stationed. He shows such sufficient promise that the school suggests he enter their special college preparatory program for one semester, after which, should he perform satisfactorily, he would be granted an equivalency certificate and enrolled in the regular college program. However, during the end of the PREP program he becomes disillusioned due to his English language deficiencies, and fails to follow through despite the urging of the counselor working with the program that he go on to the college preparatory program.

He is discharged, after receiving the basic Veterans' Administration packet of materials about his benefits, to which, unfortunately, he is in no frame of mind to pay attention, and he returns home to East Los Angeles to search for a job. But to no avail; his lack of a high school diploma, his language deficiency, and his overall alienation and frustration at this point make him a very unsalable commodity on a job market already oversupplied with veterans and others with his same limitations.

One day in his 20th year, 6 months after his discharge, after having just exhausted his entitlement to veterans unemployment compensation, he is visited at home by another Chicano whom he remembers from his high school class and who is now enrolled in the nearby State college, having recently returned from the service. He is employed part time in the East Los Angeles Veterans Service Center, performing the outreach activities assigned to the VA in the new legislation. He empathizes with our veteran and vice versa; they share their common high school, Army, and Vietnam experiences; and before long our veteran has applied to the special veterans preparatory program at UCLA. There he takes sufficient psychology and sociology credit hour courses and enough remedial and refresher math and English courses to qualify for a full-time GI bill allowance under the new full-time definition and noncredit/credit provision. He also has some time available to work part time to help out with his family's finances.

After one semester, he is granted a G.E.D. equivalency certificate and enrolles in UCLA, where he begins to use his 36 months of regular GI bill entitlement, all prior benefits not having been charged against that entitlement. He carries the minimum number of hours to qualify for a full-time GI bill allowance, for he is uncertain of his ability to succeed. Because his English is still weak, UCLA certifies to the VA the essentiality of correcting that deficiency as prerequisite to his satisfactory performance in college undergraduate work, and secures for him an excellent tutor for 5 hours per week, whom he pays with his supplementary assistance allowance from the VA. He begins to improve markedly in the overall stimulating college environment—he has moved onto the campus—and at the end of his first semester, after 4 months of tutoring, his classwork has picked up and he has earned a "B" and three "C's" in his college course.

He then proceeds through college rather uneventfully except when, during the last semester of his senior year, he falls in danger of failing a European history course required for graduation. The university again assigns him a tutor, and he receives a supplementary assistance allowance from the VA for 3 more months, enabling him to pass the course and graduate from UCLA. He is then hired by IBM in a special junior executive minority hiring program.

Now, of course, it is highly unlikely that any one veteran would require or take advantage of all these special benefits; nor is it our intention that the assistance be quite so intensive in most cases. But all of this could happen, and who will say that producing this 24-year-old young man with a college degree from UCLA with a job and a starting salary of $8,500 per year, with a fine future and with self-esteem and dignity was not well worth all the effort and the relatively small extra Federal investment in his and our future. That total VA expenditure for this achievement, spread out over 6 years, was $8,580, $6,300 of which was for the 36 months of his regular GI bill entitlement. The total cost breaks down as follows:

Program, rate, and total cost
Six months special precollege program under PREP at $100 a month	$600
Three months college preparatory PREP prior to discharge at $150 a month	450
Outreach worker efforts at $2.50 per hour for 2 hours	5
Regular GI bill under special $175 a month for college preparatory program at UCLA, 5 months	875
Regular GI bill, $175 a month for 36 months	6,300
Special supplementary assistance allowance, $50 a month for 7 months	350
Total	8,580

If these new statutory authorities are to have any real impact, it is up to the junior colleges, colleges, and universities of our land—public and private—to develop these special veterans programs—under PREP, the college preparatory on-campus provision, the noncredit/credit provision and the special supplementary assistance provision—as well as cooperating closely with the local VA outreach services program.

There has already been recognition of the potential of these programs in the junior college community. The Carnegie Corp. recently granted the American Association of Junior Colleges $293,000 to extend and expand community college services to military personnel and veterans.

Mr. President, the AAJC/Carnegie program is described in a December 14 press release, which I ask unanimous consent be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The AAJC effort is an important start, but a major nationwide effort is urgently needed.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., December 12.—G.I.'s will receive assistance in making education and career plans under a new $293,000 national program announced today by the American Association of Junior Colleges.

The program, funded by Carnegie Corporation of New York, will concentrate on extending and expanding the services of junior and community colleges for military personnel prior to and after separation from the services, according to Edmund J. Gleazer, Jr. executive director of AAJC.

In general, the program will aim at increasing the employability or educationability of military personnel through predischarge training programs, and will open doors to community colleges following separation, Gleazer said. He pointed out that most two-year colleges already have both academic and vocational programs to meet needs of returning servicemen, but that military personnel are often not aware of the available opportunities.

AAJC will work closely with the Department of Defense and the U.S. Office of Education in developing necessary liaison with military separation centers, and with member community colleges in strengthening education and training programs. Project Transition, a Defense Department program for service people, provides a base for organizing of the AAJC effort.

"More than 1,000 community colleges are now operating," said Gleazer, "and most of these institutions offer a wide variety of programs through which veterans may further their education and improve their chances for rewarding jobs or advanced studies. Low costs and flexibility of admissions also add to their appeal for returning servicemen."

Under the Carnegie grant, AAJC will establish a national office to coordinate the program and will engage regional consultants to act as program expediters in assisting individual community colleges with program development. A series of regional conferences will be held to identify common problems and to effect cooperation among military commanders, military separation officers and college officials. The project will also include development of publications to guide servicemen in making appropriate choices, and to assist colleges in the developing and funding of new programs.

Gleazer pointed out that over three million men have been separated from the military during the Vietnam era—and that about 900,000 men are being discharged yearly. "While the military separation centers and the Veterans' Administration, as well as other government agencies, have tried to ease the transition from service to civilian life, the job is large, the job is personal, and all the resources of the nation are needed to bring it off," he added.

"The community colleges of the nation constitute one of the resources that has not been fully utilized. We believe the new AAJC program will be a step toward bridging an important gap between military and civilian life."

Mr. CRANSTON. The AAJC effort is an important start, but a major nationwide effort is urgently needed. At the same time, a major commitment will be needed from the Department of Defense to establish participation in PREP as a major national priority so that military base commanders will accord maximum cooperation to schools wishing to establish PREP programs.

CONFERENCE RECAPITULATION

In summary, Mr. President, in the conference negotiations, I think it can fairly be said that the Senate conferees were true to the mandate afforded by the 77-to-0 vote in the Senate on October 23. The Senate conferees prevailed in whole or with minor modifications on six of the 19 differences between the versions—Nos. 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, and 13—the four rate differences and the effective date—Nos. 1 through 4 and 19—as well as three other provisions, were compromised—Nos. 14, 15, and 16—the Senate conferees receded from three provisions—Nos. 5, 6, and 9—and accepted two House provisions. These differences and a brief outline of them are shown on a chart, H.R. 11959, "schedule of differences and conference action," which I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

H.R. 11959—SCHEDULE OF DIFFERENCES AND CONFERENCE ACTION

Provision	Senate	House	Conference Action
1. Vocational rehabilitation subsistence allowance rates.	46 percent increase for single veteran w/no deps. from present $110 to $160/month for full-time training. Increases in other columns are straight 46 percent in all categories.	18 percent increase for single veteran w/no deps. from present $110 to $130/month for full-time training. Increases in other columns are straight 18 percent in all categories.	22.7 percent increase; to $135 per month Straight 22.7 percent increases in other columns.
2. Educational assistance allowance rates for veterans (including correspondence courses and flight training) and war orphans, wives and widows.	46 percent increase for single veteran w/no deps. from present $130 to $190/month for full-time training. Increases in other columns are based on flat dollar increase equal to amount of increase in col. 1 plus 10 percent cost of living increase in dependency add-on.	31 percent increase for single veteran w/no deps. from present $130 to $170/month for full-time training. Increases in other columns are straight 31 percent in all categories.	34.6 percent increase; to $175 per month. Straight 34.6 percent increases in other columns.
3. Farm cooperative educational assistance allowance rates.	46 percent increase for single veteran w/no deps. from present $105 to $153/month for full-time training. Increases in other columns are straight 46 percent in all categories. No part-time rates provided.	31 percent increase for single veteran w/no deps. from present $105 to $138/month for full-time training. Increases in other columns are straight 31 percent in all categories, including part-time rates.	34.6 percent increase; to $141 per month. Straight 34.6 percent increases in other columns.
4. Apprenticeship monthly training allowance rates.	46 percent increase for single veteran with no dependents from present $80 to $116 per month for full-time training. Increases in other columns are straight 46 percent in all categories.	31 percent increase for single veteran with no dependents from present $80 to $105 per month for full-time training. Increases in other columns are straight 31 percent in all categories.	34.6 percent increase; to $108 per month. Straight 34.6 percent increases in other columns.
5. Farm cooperative program stressing on-farm training.	Provision similar to Korean GI bill farm cooperative program with no part-time rates.	No provision	Senate recedes.
6. Flight training loan program for private pilot's license.	Provision for loans up to $1,000 or 90 percent of regular charges for private pilot's license course.	do	do.
7. Expansion of special assistance for educationally disadvantaged.	Provision substituting new subchapter in lieu of present § 1678 (special training for educationally disadvantaged) expanding GI bill payment without charge to entitlement to all pre-college academic training (including elementary) regardless of where offered and making more flexible measurement of full-time training in such courses.	do	House accepts modified Senate provision (sufficient flexibility of measurement of courses exists under present V.A. law and regulations).
8. Special supplementary assistance allowance.	Provision for supplementing regular GI bill allowance payments for remedial, tutorial counselling or other special supplementary assistance up to $100 per veteran/per month.	do	House accepts modified Senate provision (remedial and refresher courses adequately covered under other provision already accepted by House—section 206(a) of bill—; tutorial allowance paid as supplement to veteran's regular GI bill allowance—not directly to school—limited to $50 per month with a 9 months total period of entitlement when college or post-secondary technical school certifies to VA that tutoring is essential to correct marked deficiency in subject required as part of prerequisite to, or which is indispensable to the satisfactory pursuit of, an approved education program).
9. Contracts and grants for special veterans' programs.	Provision authorizing appropriation of $15 million for fiscal year 1970 and $30 million for fiscal year 1971 for VA grants or contracts with educational institutions to plan and develop and in some instances conduct special educational programs for eligible veterans. Provision authorizing VA contracts and grants for private nonprofit organizations to conduct outreach activities (Diff. 12.).	do	Senate recedes (covered in part by provisions in 7 and 8 above and 10 below and existing V.A. authority).
10. Predischarge Educational Program (PREP).	Provision for payments up to $150 per month per veteran to educational institutions offering "pre-veterans" education or training prior to discharge to encourage them to prepare for further education under GI bill.	do	House accepts modified Senate provision (payments up to $175/month or cost of fees, tuition, books and supplies, whichever lesser, made directly to any "pre-veteran"—not to school directly—without charge to basic 36 months entitlement, after 6 months on active duty, with advance for full program required with second month's check).
11. Measurement of full-time college undergraduate courses under chs. 34 and 35.	Provision to liberalize 14-hour requirement for full-time study (and part-time requirements administratively) in general accordance with college's definition of full-time study.	do	House recedes.

Provision	Senate	House	Conference Action
12. Veterans outreach services program.	Provision for expanded and reoriented VA outreach programs in local communities, employing former educationally disadvantaged veterans, to locate educationally disadvantaged veterans and advise them of their entitlements to GI bill and other benefits and assist them in gaining employment (including payment of relocation allowances).	do	House accepts modified Senate provision (basically shortened but not altered substantively except for addition of authority—already exercised to limited extent by VA—to use special telephone tie-lines to provide outreach services, and deletion of relocation assistance allowance provision believed more appropriate for inclusion in overall manpower bill).
13. Notification of children of eligibility under ch. 35.	Provision to require VA to notify eligible war orphans and children of totally disabled veterans of eligibility for GI bill benefits by their 13th birthday.	do	House recedes.
14. Bar to approval of bartending, personality development, or nonspecialized sales training courses for chs. 34 and 35.	No provision	Provision to add such specific prohibitions to ch. 34 for veterans in addition to existing bar against vocational or recreational courses; House report language permits nonspecialized sales management course to be approved if it can show placement of more than half its graduates in jobs. Provision to revise ch. 35 specific approval bars in present law to accord with proposed ch. 34 language, deleting present bar against dancing courses.	Senate accepts modified House provision (incorporating in provision House report language on exceptions for non-specialized sales management courses).
15. Apprenticeship limitation	do	Provision to prohibit State approving agency approval of apprenticeship training when VA judges trainee has achieved journeymanship level of capability regardless of State law determination to contrary.	Senate accepts modified House provision.
16. Philippines education payment	do	Provision to authorize 50 cents on the dollar payment of allowances to veterans residing in Philippines (including Old Philippine Scouts) and such veterans' war orphans, wives, and widows residing in the Philippines.	Senate accepts House provision on ch. 35 House recedes on ch. 34 provision.
17. Nonduplication of Federal benefits law repeals	do	Provision to repeal provisions of Public Health Service Act and Higher Education Act of 1965 (added in 1968) which are void as a result of modification of nonduplication bar in both versions of H.R. 11959.	Senate recedes.
18. Less than part-time training for war orphans, wives, widows under ch. 35.	do	Provision permits less than half-time training (now prohibited by subsec. (c) of sec. 1732 which is deleted) for war orphans, wives, and widows under ch. 35 and computes payments for such training on the basis of the lesser of (A) the cost of tuition and fees or (B) $170—the amount proposed in the House bill for full-time training.	Do.
19. Effective date:
(a) Rates	Feb. 1, 1970	1st day of 2d calendar month beginning after date of enactment.	Feb. 1, 1970.
(b) Notification of children's eligibility (diff. 13).	July 1, 1970 (diff. 13)	No provision	Upon enactment.
(c) Farm cooperative: savings clause.	1st day of 3d calendar month after date of enactment (diff. 5).	do	Senate recedes.
(d) Other provisions			Upon enactment.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the total fiscal year 1970 and 1971 estimated costs of the conference bill are as follows:

Mr. President, it would be a singular oversight if I did not recognize the invaluable assistance in drafting, analyzing, and revising the conference bill and all of the other bills, the provisions of which it now contains, on the part of Hugh Evans of the Senate Legislative Counsel's Office, and the fine cooperation and technical assistance throughout this long process of Alfred Bronaugh and Charles Johnston, Assistant General Counsel and Deputy Assistant General Counsel, respectively, of the Veterans' Administration.

The counsel for the Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee, Jon Steinberg, contributed immensely to the entire effort in a remarkably creative, dedicated, and effective way. His loyal assistants, Marian Mertens and Bette Noble, put in many early and late hours, too, for which I am most grateful.

Finally, I wish once more to express my appreciation for the leadership and assistance of Chairman TEAGUE and the House committee staff director, Oliver Meadows, who despite many years' work on improving the GI bill were able to bring to our deliberations a singular receptivity to new ideas and approaches. And, again, I thank Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH, chairman of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, and all the members of that committee.

Mr. President, I recommend strongly to my colleagues that they agree to the conference report.

EXHIBIT 1

BLACK VETERANS RETURN

(By James Fendrich and Michael Pearson)

"In every period of historical crisis there are groups, occupations and classes who are 'accidentally' located in the nutcrackers of history. Such groups experience in extreme form all the cross-pressures, tensions and contradictions of a society in the process of tearing itself apart."—Joseph Bensman

Black veterans of Vietnam now number well over 100,000 men, and their ranks are growing every day. Their presence in the racially polarized United States is causing a good deal of nervous apprehension in some quarters, and not a little gleeful anticipation in a few others. The reasoning is the same in both cases: black veterans are assumed to be as alienated from American society as other young blacks, if not more so; and when push comes to shove, as many Americans on both sides of the color line believe it inevitably will, then the black veterans—trained, hardened and glamorized by the experience of combat—will naturally assume leadership in the racial struggle.

The analogy, of course, is the Algerian war of liberation against the French. In countryside as well as city, the Algerian leadership cadres were drawn from among those men who had served in French forces during World War II, and in Indochina. So too in America, it would seem only reasonable to suppose that leadership of an insurgent black movement would pass to men who, if they had gotten nothing else out of the Vietnam War, had at least received a (for once) truly relevant education.

Many people will probably dismiss the foregoing as alarmist nonsense, or wishful nonsense, which is often hard to distinguish from the alarmist variety. Most writing on radical social movements has suggested one of two answers to the question of where one should look to find the alienated core of activists that will provide the movement with its most dedicated leaders and followers. The first answer is psychological: leaders and followers are thought to be drawn from the "true believers," "misfits," "deviants," "marginal men" and other personally unstable members of the society. The second answer, of course, stresses the class basis of participation. The early Marxists emphasized the industrial proletariat as the major source of activism, but later theorists, looking at the experience of Third World countries, pointed to the cities' lumpen-proletariat and the peasants as the most promising recruits, led by disaffected or relatively deprived bourgeois.

All of these interpretations provide fruitful insights into the dynamics of leadership and participation in radical social movements. We would simply like to suggest another line of investigation here, one that examines a particular social grouping within a social class, but a group whose members are subject to tremendous structural strains in a time of rapid social change. Few would deny that black members and veterans of the armed forces of this country constitute such a group.

Until recently, the black community placed high value on joining the military; it was an investment in upward mobility. The military was thought to be the most colorblind institution in white society, offering a way of life in which a man was evaluated and rewarded for his achievements alone. Then, not so long ago, values and beliefs began to emerge in the black community that conflicted with those that had supported military service. Black spokesmen excoriated the war in Vietnam. Military virtues came under heavy fire from all segments of the society. National leaders close to the civil rights movement pointed to the devastating distortion of national priorities allegedly brought about by the military industrial complex. In Vietnam itself, blacks did not fail to notice that they were suffering a disproportionate number of casualties, a function of the fact that black soldiers stood a much better chance of being sent into combat than whites did. Black leaders back home tasted the bitterness of seeing their people fighting for a so-called democracy abroad while democracy had not yet been realized in their own lives. In 1967 Martin Luther King spoke out with eloquence:

"We are taking the young black men who have been crippled by our society and sending them 8,000 miles away to guarantee liberties in Southeast Asia which they had not found in Southwest Georgia and East Harlem. So we have been repeatedly faced with the cruel irony of watching Negro and white boys on TV screens as they kill and die together for a nation that has been unable to seat them together in the same school. So we watch them in brutal solidarity burning the huts of a poor village, but we realize that they could never live on the same block in Detroit."

Evidence of the strain produced on the black soldier could be found everywhere. Reenlistment rates, once a source of pride and proof of opportunity for blacks, dropped by 50 percent between 1966 and 1967. In R & R (rest and recreation) areas in Southeast Asia, there have been repeated outbreaks of racial hostilities among the troops, and similar conflicts have plagued training camps in the States, especially those of that paragon of esprit de corps, the marines. Here and abroad there have been attempts to organize black power groups within the services.

Within the black community at home, opinion surveys such as Gallup's reflect increased ambiguities about black participation in the armed services. In 1966, 35 percent of American blacks opposed the war in Vietnam because they felt they had less freedom to fight for; in 1969 the proportion was 56 percent. Today, by a margin of two to one, blacks feel that their sons and relatives are fighting a disproportionate share of the war. Seven out of eight believe that Vietnam costs are hurting the war on poverty at home. Given this climate of opinion, it is little wonder that a large percentage of black soldiers have decided to leave military service.

Yet when a young black man is discharged, he is exposed to new sources of strain. After having served the military as best he could, he will doubtless have evolved a set of expectations of rewards and recognitions due him as a veteran. However unrealistic these expectations may be, the second-class citizenship that awaits him will be real enough. The black veteran returns to a society that is racist by its own admission, a society, furthermore, that is unwilling to reform itself even to the extent recommended by its own presidential commissions—unless the recommendations concern new ways of controlling civil disturbances. Moreover, although the data are incomplete, it appears that black participation in veterans' benefits is much lower than their participation in similar benefits after World War II and Korea. Such being the conditions of the blacks' rediscovered civilian status, one is surely justified in asking whether these conditions aren't likely to promote exceptionally high levels of alienation among black veterans, as well as strong identification with the most militant aims of the black power movment.

HOW ALIENATED?

The purpose of this study was to explore the independent variables associated with alienation among black veterans. We wanted to define the correlates of alienation first in the experience of blacks in the armed services, then in their experiences in adjusting to civilian life and finally in certain indicators of weak or strong social controls operating on them.

The data were collected during the fall of 1968 by interviewing a random probability sample of 199 black veterans who lived within the Jacksonville, Florida metropolitan area and who had been discharged from active military service since January 1, 1963.

Because of the unique difficulties in sampling and interviewing black veterans, we arranged for the cosponsorship of the Jacksonville Urban League. Black veterans were hired and trained to complete the enumeration: 25 pilot interviews under field conditions and the 199 cases used in this investigation. Before going into the field, our way was prepared by a local television station, two radio stations and the black weekly newspaper, which explained the general objectives of the study to the black community.

First, however, we had to weigh the truth of our assumption that black veterans are indeed alienated men. Black alienation here means, not political apathy, but an active rejection of white institutions and values, as well as support for those beliefs and representatives of the black community that encourage sentiments of black nationalism and separatism. We considered alienation to be high when a man expressed distrust in white political authorities because they are regarded as incompetent, stupid and opposed to the realization of the collective goals of black people. Such a man would reject a public philosophy that pays lip service to the beliefs of justice, equality and opportunity and replace it with a positive black identification, a set of attitudes that fosters a separate social psychological identity leading to demands for political and social separation of blacks from white America. At the same time he would express support for leaders and organizations that have rejected traditional militant reform efforts and advocated in their rhetoric and action the restructuring of American society. Finally, such a man could be expected to be sympathetic to the use of violence as a constraining influence on white society.

Having defined alienation in these terms, we then attempted to measure the degree to which our respondents could be said to fit the description. We did this by asking them to reply to a 29-item questionnaire. The results, which follow, were somewhat equivocal but clear.

The first dimension of alienation we measured was distrust in white authorities. The two most distrusted authorities were policemen (57 percent) and labor leaders (37 percent). There were only two white authorities that were trusted more than distrusted. They were congressman (37 percent compared to 22 percent) and members of a civil rights commission (56 percent compared to 13 percent) The latter was the only white authority that was trusted by more than 50 percent of the veterans.

The second dimension was rejection of the public philosophy. Seventy-seven percent of the veterans believed that this nation is more concerned with law and order than with justice. Sixty-seven percent believed the concept of equal opportunity was only a myth. Finally, only 40 percent of the veterans believed they were being judged on their abilities instead of their race.

The third dimension was favorable sentiment for political and social separation. This was a somewhat more extreme manifestation of alienation than the preceding dimensions. However, 40 percent of the black veterans prefer preferential hiring practices for blacks, 39 percent want blacks to run their own schools and 38 percent feel blacks should work separately outside the Democratic and Republican party in order to gain more political power. Possibly because the question was stated in absolute terms, only 11 percent agreed that blacks and whites could never live peacefully together.

The fourth dimension was sympathetic support for violence as a constraining influence against whites. Although 5.2 percent felt black leaders should only try to peacefully persuade white leaders to change their politics on race relations, 36 percent agreed that violence is the only way for blacks to obtain their rights. Fifty-eight percent agreed that a major race riot could easily break out in Jacksonville and 33 percent felt black-white relations are going to get much worse before they get better.

On the fifth dimension, positive black identification, the responses indicated a high degree of proud race-consciousness. Ninety percent agreed that African history should be part of the curriculum for black children. Sixty-five percent identified themselves first as black men and then as Americans. Fifty percent considered Afro-hairstyles appropriate for black women and 46 percent agreed to the principle that blacks should buy from black merchants.

THE BLACK VANGUARD

The last dimension was support for radical black leaders and organizations. Their leaders and five organizations were selected because of their public rejection of the traditional reform efforts of the black moderates and their advocacy of a radical restrucing of American society. None of the leaders and only two of the organizations were evaluated positively by a majority of the veterans. The latter were the Congress of Racial Equality (60 percent) and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (58 percent). In the summer of 1969 SNCC dropped the word "nonviolent" from its title and substituted "national.") While a majority of the veterans did not positively evaluate radical leaders and organizations, the lowest level of support was 33 percent for both the Deacons for Defense and Justice and the Black Muslims. It is also interesting to note the rather even split on the Black Panthers. Of those veterans who had opinions, 39 percent gave the Panthers a positive evaluation and 40 percent a negative evaluation. Of the three black leaders Stokely Carmichael was given a slightly more positive evaluation (43 percent) than H. Rap Brown (38 percent) or Malcolm X (37 percent).

Some precautions are necessary in interpreting the results. The sample was drawn from a list compiled in one large southern city and may not be representative of the larger population of black veterans. Studies of political participation do however suggest that urbanism is a more important source of bias than regional differences; that, urban samples of blacks in both the North and South may be more similar in their degree of black alienation than rural and urban samples of southern blacks. Therefore, the findings of this study may reflect the characteristics of veterans who return to metropolitan areas rather than regional variations.

After examining our findings on alienation, it is possible to conclude that the majority of black veterans are not highly alienated and not likely to join a radical social movement, and therefore will not be a significant force in determining the future of black-white relations. It should be noted, however, that the course of the black protest movement during the last 15 years has never been determined by majority opinion. Instead, there have been vanguards of blacks that have been thrust into active forms of participation when their particular qualifications and skills became important to the protest movement as it evolved. The number of black Vietnam veterans is already substantial and can be expected to increase; if only 10 percent of these men became actively involved, they could provide a sizeable core of a radical movement.

ALIENATION AND MILITARY EXPERIENCE

Next, we looked into the question of the relation between these black veterans' alienation and their experiences in the armed services. As expected, there was a very strong correlation between their attitudes toward the military and their degree of alienation. Those who had the most negative attitudes toward the military were also the most alienated. But, beyond this, some interesting details were revealed in this second part of our survey.

Men who had been drafted were more alienated than those who had enlisted. Fifty-eight percent of those who were drafted fell into the highly alienated group compared to 34 percent who enlisted. Those who had achieved a rank of sergeant or above in the service were much less alienated than those in lower ranks. Only 39 percent of these men were highly alienated, whereas 47 percent of the privates and 54 percent of the corporals were highly alienated. Length of service was also related to alienation, with those who had served for two years or less being more highly alienated than those who had served three, four, five or more years. The most recently discharged veterans were also the most alienated.

Another factor we wanted to uncover was the relationship between a man's alienation and the amount of contact the veteran had had with whites. We expected that those black veterans who had made few, if any, white friends would be more alienated than those who had made more. This proved to be correct. However, our guess that the greater the proportion of blacks in the unit, the greater the alienation, proved to be wrong. So too was any association between alienation and combat duty in Vietnam, although those who had seen action in Vietnam did tend to be somewhat more alienated than others who had been sent there.

WHEN JOHNNY COMES MARCHING HOME

When a black man is discharged from the armed forces, he is exposed to a new set of experiences that can foster alienation. After fulfilling the requirements of being a soldier, there are the serious ambiguities of not receiving adequate recognition and rewards as a veteran. And our survey indicates that the black veterans' recognition and rewards are inadequate indeed.

Although the data are incomplete, it appears that black veterans' current participation in veterans' benefits is much lower than in previous years. The participation of World War II and Korean veterans in educational benefits was 53 percent for nonwhite veterans and 45 percent for white. In 1968, less than 20 percent of the veterans were taking advantage of the GI bill. Moreover, special programs such as Project Transition have not been very effective in helping Vietnam veterans readjust to civilian life because of various bureaucratic difficulties in getting release time to take advantage of the program. The lack of meaningful reforms and the strains of adjusting to second class citizenship suggest the development of alienation and potential participation in black radical movements.

We asked the veterans if they had been in contact with the local Veterans Administration office and whether they had received adequate assistance. Although the number of respondents is small, 73 percent of those who sought but did not receive adequate help from the VA were highly alienated. This is compared to 52 percent who did not contact the VA office and 40 percent of those who sought and received assistance. The same pattern exists for participation in educational and/or vocational training. Forty-one percent of those who had participated in the GI bill were highly alienated, as against 51 percent who had not participated. The veterans were also asked if they had sought and received adequate assistance in finding work from public and private employment agencies. Sixty-one percent who received an inadequate amount of help were alienated, whereas 53 percent of those who didn't bother to seek help were alienated, as compared with only 22 percent who sought and received help.

Why more of the veterans did not seek assistance is puzzling. It could be because they felt they had adequate incomes and jobs, or they didn't know about the available assistance, or the grapevine convinced them the help they were entitled to wasn't worthwhile. The first alternative is least plausible. Only 14 percent of the sample were in white-collar jobs, 16 percent were skilled workers, 51 percent were either semi-skilled or unskilled, 13 percent were unemployed and 6 percent were full-time students. Morover, the median income was less than $100 a week for those who were working. The second alternative would indicate insufficient outreach for those agencies authorized to assist veterans. Either because of insufficient resources or different priorities, VA and the employment offices were not encouraging black veterans to utilize these benefits. The third alternative could apply to those who had looked for help in finding work. Of this group, 49 receive adequate help, but 43 did not. With that large a minority, it is easy to see how the word could get around that would discourage others from seeking assistance. Whatever the reasons, a large proportion of these veterans are not participating in the benefits and rewards theoretically their due, and these are more alienated than participants.

The potential for alienation is also manifest in the veteran's background in the explosive ghetto. The ghetto has been decribed by David Boesel and his colleagues as a system for the maintenance of racial hegemony that is composed of a series of functionally reciprocal institutions that are run by whites, and control the black community.

The mutual reciprocity of those institutions has caused them to fit together as parts of a control system through which the decisions of white people with power determine the major outlines of the lives of black people without power.

Not surprisingly in such a system, there are only rather weak institutional forms of social control developed by the ghetto itself, for example, the family and the churches.

But unlike some elements of his community, the returning veteran is not totally subject to the full intensity of white social control. He is neither on parole nor up to his neck in debt, nor under the influence of white school and welfare officials. And he may well have only a marginal commitment to his job. Moreover, being young and frequently single, he is less likely to be under the influence of black institutional control as well.

Predictably, then, our survey showed that veterans under 22 were much more alienated (76 percent) than those who were 23 or 24 (52 percent), 25 to 28 (40 percent), and 29 and over (21 percent). Since a wife and family frequently act as a conservative influence on attitudes and behavior, single or divorced men were expected to be more alienated than those who were married. This pattern was confirmed. Sixty percent of the single or divorced veterans were highly alienated compared to only 38 percent of the married veterans. Active religious participation was also considered as exposure to a set of beliefs and practices that counteract the growth of alienation. We found that only 37 percent of the actively involved were highly alienated compared to 55 percent of the nonparticipants.

There is a good deal of debate these days about the possibility of an increasingly radical movement. Reports of planned subversive activities, sabotage and sniping have been proclaimed by segments of the news media as evidence of a new revolutionary direction of the black protest movement. Some social scientists have pointed out the sensationalism of the reports and the reasons why police and reporters would magnify the threat of violence, as for example Terry Ann Knopf's article in the July/August 1969 issue of Trans-action. And the cover letter to the Riot Data Review states these reports "have been composed of two parts fantasy to one part fact." While the Review and Miss Knopf give a good descriptive analysis of what actually occurred, the disclaimers in their interpretation have played down the existence of small-scale subversive attempts at spontaneous uprisings and terrorism.

We hold rather more realistic (some would say gloomy, others hopeful) views on the possibility of a black radical movement. If these assessments prove to be correct, we believe black veterans will contribute a significant proportion of the membership. Not only are they caught in the "nutcracker of history" while serving in the military, they also experience in their civilian adjustment strains that are most conducive to their involvement in a radical movement. Unless there is a significant reduction in the sources of strain and a more effective rather than repressive social control, veterans like Robert Williams and Ahmed Evans and veterans' organizations such as the original group of Deacons for Defense and Justice may be harbingers of a whirlwind of defensive and offensive violence.

We cannot help but wonder what Alexis de Tocqueville would say if he were to visit the United States today. But surely he might exclaim, "My God, the Americans are a peculiar people! They have set up a welfare system that penalizes any poor person who shows initiative. They have a Department of Agriculture that has destroyed the family farm. They develop a Peace Corps and yet spend 80 billion dollars on a war machine. They are legislated by a committee system of government, controlled by southerners who are frequently elected by a minority of their constituents. But most importantly of all, in their own unique form of social engineering, they train young black men in the armed forces, return them to a society that does not want to provide them opportunities, and then turn them loose in a volatile ghetto as eminently qualified black revolutionaries."

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CRANSTON. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished chairman of the full Labor and Public Welfare Committee who has done such distinguished work in this field of aid to veterans.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, today we have before us for consideration another landmark piece of legislation in the field of veterans education. After long and careful consideration, the conferees on H.R. 11959 were able to agree on a bill that makes significant increases in the education and training allowances provided for under the cold war GI bill. These increases are intended to fulfill three principal purposes:

First, to ease the financial burdens of those young veterans who are struggling to obtain an education;

Second, to provide reasonable allowance rates which will encourage more veterans to use their valuable educational benefits; and

Third, to restore comparability between the cold war GI bill benefits and those paid veterans under the Korean conflict GI bill.

With the consideration of this conference report, we are coming to the end of a struggle that began in January of 1969 when I introduced S. 338, the original rate increase bill. My reason for introducing this bill was because of my great concern over the lack of participation in the education and training programs under the cold war GI bill. Under the World War II GI bill, 50 percent of the eligible veterans used their benefits. Forty-two percent of the veterans of the Korean conflict participated in education programs under the Korean conflict GI bill. However, out of the over 7 million eligible veterans of the cold war and Vietnam era, only 1.3 million have used their benefits under the cold war GI bill. This constitutes a participation rate of only 20.7 percent, or one out of each five veterans. One cause of the low participation in the cold war GI bill education and training programs was stated by the Veterans' Administration to be the low allowance rates paid a veteran each month, which did not meet the inflationary costs of education. Evidence presented before our subcommittee revealed that the cost of tuition and fees in private colleges have increased by almost 107 percent since 1958, and that these costs in public colleges have increased by 67 percent during the same period. In addition, the cost of living has also skyrocketed. The evidence also revealed that monthly educational allowances paid veterans were woefully inadequate to meet these costs and in fact, the cold war GI bill was simply not doing the job the Korean conflict GI bill did. More specifically, the Korean conflict GI bill paid approximately 98 percent of the average tuition, board and room costs at public and nonpublic colleges whereas the cold war GI bill is presently paying only 67 percent of these costs. What this means is that the veterans of the cold war and Vietnam era are getting shortchanged in their educational opportunities.

After thorough hearings and study, the Senate Veterans Affairs Subcommittee unanimously reported out to the full Labor and Public Welfare Committee a comprehensive bill which not only included my bill to increase the allowance rates but also included several new programs designed to help the educationally disadvantaged veteran and to counsel veterans on their rights under the cold war GI bill. This bill received unanimous support in the committee. The Senate demonstrated an unusual display of nonpartisan support for this bill by passing it by a vote of 77 to 0 despite the threat of a Presidential veto. The House in the meantime passed a bill which contained much smaller rate increases than the Senate bill and did not contain the new programs.

In conference, the objective of the Senate conferees was to produce a bill that would benefit as many veterans as possible and retain the new programs which are badly needed. After long and hard bargaining, we believe we have accomplished a substantial part of that objective.

The bill that we are considering today provides for an increase of almost 35 percent in the monthly payments for veterans enrolled in the education, farm training, and apprenticeship programs. What this amounts to in dollars and cents is that a single veteran with no dependents who is attending college on a full-time basis will receive a monthly allowance of $175 instead of the present allowance of $130 a month. This is an increase of $45 over the present rate. Under this bill a veteran with one dependent will receive an allowance of $205 per month instead of $155 as provided under the present law. The veteran with two dependents will now receive a monthly allowance of $230 whereas the present law pays only $175 a month to those veterans.

Veterans with more than two dependents will receive an additional $13 per month for each such dependent instead of $10 as is provided in the present law.

Veterans who are enrolled on a full-time basis in the farm cooperative and have no dependants or in the training program will receive, under this bill, a monthly allowance of $141 instead of the present allowance of $105. Veterans with one dependent will have their monthly allowance rate increased from $125 to $165, and veterans with two dependents will now receive $190 per month instead of $145. For each dependent over two, the veteran will receive $10 per month under this bill instead of $7 per month as provided in the present law.

Single veterans who are enrolled in apprenticeship and other on-the-job training programs will receive $108 per month during the first 6 months training period instead of the present allowance of $80. During the second 6 months period the veteran will receive $81 a month instead of $60, for the third 6-month period he will receive $54 a month instead of $40, and the fourth 6-month period he will receive $27 a month instead of $20 a month. Like the other programs, the veterans with dependents will receive proportional increases for each dependent.

Veterans who participate in these programs on a part-time basis will, of course, also receive, on a proportional basis, the 35-percent increase. These increases are retroactive to February 1, 1970, so that veterans can participate in the expense allowances for the full spring semester of school.

In addition to these increases, the bill provides a 22.7-percent increase for funded veterans who are taking vocational rehabilitation training. A single veteran with no dependents who is participating in this program on a full time basis would receive an allowance of $135 a month instead of the present $110 a month.

In addition to the important allowance rate increases, the Senate conferees were successful in retaining the major portions of title II of H.R. 11959 which are intended to assist the educationally disadvantaged veteran obtain the education and training he needs to prepare him for a useful and productive career. Title II of H.R. 11959 contains three programs designed to carry out this purpose.

First, this bill provides for a special supplementary assistance program which would pay to a veteran who is having academic difficulty an amount not to exceed $50 per month for a maximum of 9 months for tutorial help. This program is intended to furnish a veteran who is having difficulty with a course the additional help he needs to prevent him from failing. In many cases, special tutoring will prove to be the margin of difference between success and failure in college.

Second, this portion of H.R. 11959 establishes a predischarge education program which is designed to assist servicemen in preparing for future education while they are still on active duty. Under the PREP program, the VA would pay to the veteran an amount which would reimburse him for the cost of tuition, fees, books and supplies he incurs in taking remedial or refreshertype courses prior to his discharge from the service. This program will prepare the veteran for advanced education and give him the confidence he needs to continue his education.

Third, title II establishes a veterans outreach program which would expand the VA's counseling services to insure that veterans understand their rights under the cold war GI bill. One reason for the low participation in GI bill education programs is that many veterans leave the service without knowing that these benefits are available to them. This program should prove to be of great benefit to all veterans.

These three new programs are the result of the thought, planning, and hard work of the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs, Senator CRANSTON. I commend him for introducing these new measures which will increase participation in the cold war GI bill education programs. I also commend Chairman TEAGUE and the other House conferees for recognizing the need for these programs and agreeing to accept them.

I also wish to commend Senator CRANSTON for the leadership he has provided in obtaining this great veterans bill. As a result of his tireless efforts and great dedication, we were successful in obtaining this bill which will mean so much to the veterans of America. American veterans are indeed fortunate in having Senator CRANSTON representing their interest in Congress. It has been a pleasure for me to work with him, and I encourage him to continue his fine work for better veterans laws.

I also wish to commend the excellent work of the members of both political parties of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee and especially the members of the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs. They have put aside partisan considerations and given their full support to this bill. I wish to commend Senator SCHWEIKER, the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs, and Senator JAVITS, the ranking minority member of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, for their leadership and assistance on behalf of our veterans.

The bill that the conference committee has agreed to is sound, both financially and morally. Never has it been needed more. I urge all my colleagues to give it their full consideration and support.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, how much of an increase in GI educational benefits was allowed by the Senate when the measure passed the Senate last October?

Mr. CRANSTON. The figure that is being paid now is $130 a month. The Senate passed a bill that would have provided $190 a month.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Was that a 46 percent increase?

Mr. CRANSTON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. And what is the final agreement of the conference committee?

Mr. CRANSTON. $175 a month, which is a 35-percent increase.

Mr. MANSFIELD. And now that the conference report has been approved unanimously by the Senate, it will go to the White House for final approval?

Mr. CRANSTON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from California for his tenacity and doggedness in this area. I also congratulate the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) for the same attributes. They are both strong and effective advocates in behalf of veterans and they have shown it by their action—performance is always the true test of commitment. I recall the many years that the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) fought to extend these educational benefits to veterans of the Armed Forces who served since the Korean conflict. I recall his great success in this endeavor. I am happy to vote that the able and distinguished Senator from California has joined this effort. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs he has performed splendidly.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for his support and for his very welcome comments on the work we have been doing together on this measure.

I thank the distinguished chairman of the full Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the senior Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH), for his work and for his comments regarding my work. I congratulate him on the results today of the fine leadership he has offered.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I join and associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from California.

The distinguished majority leader has been a bulwark of strength in the fight for justice for these cold war and Vietnam veterans.

This is another milestone in my 12-year fight for justice for the veterans of the cold war era. My first GI bill was passed in 1966, after an 8-year fight. We improved it by an amended GI bill in 1967, and then improved it further by another amendment in 1968. This is the fourth cold war GI bill. We are making some progress.

We have always had the aid of the distinguished majority leaders in our efforts. I thank him for his continued support. We are now up to 10 percent of the level of the payments made under the Korean GI bill. It is not enough; however, it is a major step forward. Many of the veterans have been denied an education because of the low payments allowed them. Only about 21 percent, or one out of five, of the discharged veterans have received any kind of educational training under the cold war GI bill.

I think this is a disgrace.

We must continue our efforts to obtain meaningful educational benefits for the veterans of the cold war and Vietnam era.

I again thank the distinguished Senator from California for his dedication and skilled leadership with regard to this measure.

CRISIS IN CALIFORNIA VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITALS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, my colleague in the other body, the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, has been rendering a great public service in publishing the results of his committee's survey of the conditions in Veterans' Administration hospitals on a State-by-State basis. In every case the survey has shown a critical shortage in both funding and staffing.

Today, the survey results of Veterans' Administration health facilities in California were released. As with the surveys for the 28 States so far released, the one for California indicates "that California VA hospitals are not receiving sufficient support to provide the kind of medical care that California veterans deserve," and, in my mind, must have. An alarming funding deficiency of at least $5.6 million—the third largest deficiency in the Nation after New York and Pennsylvania—exists in California VA hospitals for the current fiscal year. This deficiency exists despite a January augmentation of $1,001,382 from the Veterans' Administration Central Office to California hospitals—based on the Congress unrequested additional appropriation of $17,600,000 for fiscal year 1970. This $5.6 million deficiency is a very conservative estimate; for example, many unreported deficiencies at the West Los Angeles Veterans' Administration Center are still under study; and a final tabulation will very likely show California's shortages to be the greatest in the Nation.

New figures just released by the Veterans' Administration, and hence not included in the results of the House committee survey, show that California VA hospitals have just been allotted $1,226,700 for the last quarter of fiscal year 1970. Of this sum, $821,100 is for fee dental services largely for Vietnam veterans. This additional money will be expended, with Bureau of the Budget approval, on a deficiency basis in anticipation of a supplemental fiscal year 1970 appropriation of $15,000,000 for medical care through an amendment to the President's March 12 Supplemental Appropriations Message to Congress. That the Veterans' Administration has been successful in squeezing even this amount from the administration is no small task, and I hope that the efforts of Chairman TEAGUE in the other body and our Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee's 6 days of oversight hearings were helpful in that budget exercise.

The fact remains, however, that the $405,700 augmentation for medical care other than dental services represents only a small portion of the California VA hospital deficiency—slightly more than one-quarter factoring through the 3 months' funding on the basis of a full year's deficiency of $5.6 million—not including dental care needs. Although fee dental needs, estimated by VA central as $2.5 million, seem to have been fairly well covered for the final quarter of fiscal year 1970 by the allocation of $821,000 for that purpose, there is no assurance that a similar level of funding will be carried over for fiscal year 1971 or subsequent years for that category or the general medical category. And I am continuing to study the dental care situation with respect to fiscal year 1971 needs. In sum, despite California's veteran population of more than 11 percent of our Nation's veterans, it has received only 8 percent of the supplemental $15,000,000 allocation to meet its great funding shortages.

These shortages mean the hospitals will be unable to provide needed drugs, medical and dental supplies, prosthetic arms, legs, artificial eyes, and other sensory aids to many veterans requiring them. Funds in the amount of over $2.8 million have not been made available to fill existing personnel vacancies, let alone to provide the 2,900 staff which would bring staffing ratios up to minimal levels to achieve some comparability with ratios in community hospitals.

These shortages demonstrate clearly that in our Nation's largest State, where more than 11 percent of our Nation's veterans reside, the Veterans' Administration health care situation is extremely grave. The deficiencies highlighted in the House committee survey are actually preventing the VA system from delivering the same level of care provided in fiscal year 1969.

Over $461,000 is lacking to meet the costs of community nursing care expenses for those veterans who no longer need the intensive care provided in the hospital facility and should be moved to these less intensive and less expensive facilities.

These deficiencies in the ability of Veterans' Administration hospitals to provide high-quality medical care to California veterans are shocking. The commendably candid statement of the Director of the West Los Angeles Veterans' Administration Center, the largest single VA complex in the country, that a major crisis is impending, that morale is atrocious and that patient care is subminimal is unfortunately symptomatic of problems in many VA facilities across the Nation.

Recently, the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs, which I am privileged to chair, completed 6 days of oversight hearings on the quality and quantity of medical and hospital care in VA facilities. Testimony from some of the Nation's most outstanding medical experts, Veterans' Administration hospital staffs, service organizations, and individual veterans, clearly indicate that we are facing a nationwide crisis in VA medicine; that staffing ratios are at dangerously low levels; and that much needed renovations, equipment purchases, and construction have been put off far too long.

In short, as will be illustrated fully by a subcommittee report now in preparation, the hearings in the Senate completely corroborate the findings of the House survey.

The Senate Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee hearings revealed the California VA system is failing to operate or utilize fully highly expensive and urgently needed specialized medical units, for example:

At the Fresno VA hospital, the surgical recovery room is not being fully utilized because of a $31,000 deficiency. The inhalation therapy program and the mental hygiene clinic are both underfunded and underutilized—the inhalation therapy program short $32,000, and the mental hygiene clinic short $42,000

At the Livermore VA Hospital, the surgical intensive care unit, the pulmonary function laboratory, and a special nuclear medical unit are underutilized because of a staff shortage created by a deficiency of about $145,000.

At the Long Beach Hopsital, underutilized units because of staffing shortages are a surgical intensive care unit, a mental hygiene clinic, and a day treatment center. Funds were not available for approximately 40 positions to properly staff these units.

At the Martinez VA hospital, approximately $67,000 is needed for adequate staffing of special medical units specializing in speech pathology, nuclear medicine, cardiac catheterization, pulmonary function, and electron microscopy.

At Palo Alto, the VA General Medical Hospital, because of funding deficiencies, was unable to fill 12 nursing positions for special coronary care and intensive care units. As a result, these units are now operating at substandard levels.

At Sepulveda, the VA hospital has 18 vacancies which a deficiency of $200,000 prevents them from filling. These positions are needed to staff fully the hospital's surgical intensive care unit, the day treatment center, and the mental health center.

Several specialized medical programs for which construction has been completed and equipment made available were not activated until the last half of the current fiscal year, and were activated at that time only because of a Bureau of the Budget decision to release the $17,600,000 which congressional action restored to the VA appropriation to achieve the level originally requested by the Johnson administration. These programs included intensive care units at Palo Alto, Fresno, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Sepulveda: an alcohol treatment program and an organ replacement program at Los Angeles; programs for electron microscopy and stereotactic brain surgery at the Long Beach hospital; and a special reference laboratory at the San Francisco Hospital.

In addition, utilization of some specialized units has been postponed entirely for fiscal year 1970. These are an intensive care unit, a coronary care unit, and a speech pathology program at the Long Beach VA hospital, for which staffing costs would total about $141,000; a prosthetic treatment center at San Francisco which would cost about $17,000 to staff; and a speech pathology program at Martinez which would require about $23,000 for staffing.

To meet these deficiencies, I intend to press for substantially increased VA funding, both in the expected VA supplemental budget request for the current fiscal year, and in the appropriations for the next fiscal year. I have been working closely with the chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, and we plan to develop a coordinated approach in both the House and the Senate.

It is essential to add supplemental funds in a number of areas not only to insure adequate continuation of vital fiscal year 1970 programs, but also to enable the VA to finance these programs at a supplemental level when it begins to operate under a fiscal year 1971 continuing resolution. Otherwise, under the terms of the expected continuing resolution, the VA will be restricted to the fiscal year 1970 level, and needed expansions in health care will be deferred still further.

Specifically, I feel we must supplement the VA's 1970 budget in at least three most critical areas: community nursing home care, Vietnam veterans' dental care, and hospital maintenance and essential equipment replacement costs. Supplemental funds are also needed to open and fully operate most of the 65 specialized medical programs in VA hospitals—four of which are in California—which are not planned for activation in fiscal year 1970 at all. Supplemental funds must also be provided to permit the understaffed spinal cord injury units—of which the only one west of the Mississippi is in California—which care for and rehabilitate some of our most severely disabled veterans, to operate at the staffing ratios recommended by the VA's own SCI medical advisory group. These seem to be the most acute needs requiring immediate action in the supplemental appropriation for the current fiscal year.

Turning to the budget for the next fiscal year as proposed by the administration, it offers no increased resources to meet the vast needs we have been uncovering. It is at best a stand-still budget in light of inflation in the cost of providing medical care and salary increases. Substantial additional money is needed in many areas. The following at least must be done: increase the medical care staffing ratio and appropriation item to make a significant start toward achieving an adequate staffing level; and catch up on long-deferred construction of new facilities and renovation of the old, and particularly, begin a stepped-up effort to air condition the 33 VA hospitals in the hottest parts of the country—some of the most critical needs are in California.

I also will recommend substantial increases for funding the VA health personnel training and education program, and shall seek to make that item a separate figure in the appropriation bill to permit an expanded, on-going effort. The same separate appropriations treatment should be given the research budget, rather than lumping it with education and training in the medical care appropriation item. It is widely recognized that as research, education, and training programs in VA hospitals improve, so will the quality of the care provided the veterans there.

I am giving serious attention to the need for an increase in VA research funds to study cost effectiveness in the delivery of care and to engage in substantial programs to monitor the provision of health services. Also, I am considering the need to establish a fourth VA blind center, to serve the Southeastern United States, as well as to insure that the West Haven Center is expanded to its full complement of 20 beds.

Although substantial appropriations increases will have a decided impact on improving the VA hospital and medical care system, I am also convinced that much new legislative authority is needed for the VA health care program. Among the measures I am planning to introduce soon are bills aimed at improving the staffing situation in VA hospitals. These bills will provide the VA with new responsibilities: first, to train and employ more doctors, nurses, and allied health professionals—especially physician's assistants; second, to revise personnel authorities to enable the VA to compete more effectively for scarce health professionals; third, to install an ongoing continued educational program for all such personnel with greater emphasis on career ladder development at all levels; and fourth, to require that every VA facility attain within 3 years, a staff-to-patient ratio comparable with an index community hospital. Present disparities are enormous: 1.5 to 1 for the VA general hospital, 2.7 to 1 for the average community hospital, and 3.5 to 4.0 to 1 for the university hospital.

Increased staffing and funding alone will not provide all the solutions to the shortcomings the Veterans Affairs Subcommittee and the House Veterans Affairs Committee has documented. For the VA medical program to provide first quality care for our veterans I have become convinced that several principles should be followed, and I plan to introduce additional legislation to implement these principles. First, the VA system must be viewed as part of a larger pattern of community medical care if it is to prosper as a modern high quality health system. The VA's problems cannot be resolved in isolation. Thus, I will shortly introduce legislation to build upon the present VA relationships with regional medical programs and other community planning efforts.

Another principle I feel should be put into effect is that the VA system be more fully responsive to the medical needs of all veterans and their families. I plan to introduce a family bill which would provide VA hospital care for the dependents of totally and permanently disabled living veterans, as well as survivors receiving disability and indemnity compensation, and also enable the VA to treat a veteran's family where that is necessary for the veteran's total care and rehabilitation, as in the instance of mental illness, and physical disability. Provision will also be made for the VA to stress home care programs.

In line with the ideal of total health care of the veteran, I am considering another bill to amend present restrictions on the treatment of conditions which are unrelated to service-connected disabilities for which the veteran is hospitalized and to permit outpatient care for non-service-connected disabilities in order to prevent, as well as prepare for, reasonably foreseeable periods of hospitalization. Other bills I am working on would stress the provision of comprehensive restorative programs for the severely disabled veterans; would establish care in a VA nursing home as a clear component of hospital care; would greatly expand the present presumption of service connection for actively psychotic mental conditions; and would enable a doctor to satisfy his military obligation by serving as a VA hospital staff physician.

In coordination with Senator HAROLD HUGHES, chairman of the Special Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Narcotics, I am preparing a bill to provide for a comprehensive program of treatment and rehabilitation of chronic alcoholism and drug dependency for veterans in need of such services.

Enactment of these proposals coupled with substantially increased funding for VA medical programs will, I believe, go a long way toward remedying many of the deficiencies in the current program uncovered by the subcommittee's recent hearings as well as by the excellent House committee survey. I am sure there will be wide public and congressional support for these efforts to counteract the deterioration in the VA medical system which is so aptly illustrated by the California situation.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, in adopting today the conference report on H.R. 11959, a bill which would sharply boost the education and training benefits for our Vietnam veterans, the Senate will have taken final action on a most meritorious piece of legislation. It was adopted unanimously by the other body, and deserves our support.

The conferees recommended a 34.6 percent increase in the monthly allowances provided for under existing law for veterans participating in education and training programs under the GI bill. For the single veteran, this means an increase in benefits from $130 to $175 monthly. The same relative percentage increase is provided for the widows and children of brave Americans killed in combat or who died from service-connected disabilities. In addition, wives and families of totally disabled service-connected veterans will likewise benefit if they are enrolled in programs of education or training.

The conference report is a compromise between the pressing needs of our veterans, and the fiscal responsibility obligated to our hard-pressed taxpayers. I am sure all Senators wish that more could have been done for these gallant men. Yet, this legislation, based on the wishes, of the President, is a fair and reasonable increase in benefits.

Mr. President, if we are going to spend the taxpayers' money on the education of our youth, it is far better to do it for veterans who have served their country well, than on federally subsidized hippies, yippies, and leftwing professors who spend their time bent on destroying the basic structure of our educational system and our Government.

There are over 4,300 veterans attending colleges and universities in my State of West Virginia who will benefit from this legislation. I would hope that more of the 37,000 West Virginian veterans of the Vietnam war who have not participated and who are eligible, would take advantage of these programs. I am proud to state that West Virginians are men who are proud to stand and say that they fought in Vietnam, proud to say they served their country and their flag.

Mr. President, the Senate is about to complete work on this legislation, but its work on behalf of our veterans is far from done. We must not forget those veterans who cannot attend school, who cannot seek employment, and cannot start a family. For Vietnam is a modern war, where our boys wounded in action are but minutes from a field hospital where miracle drugs and modern medical techniques prevent death.

These brave Americans, sent to faraway lands, inflicted by wounds of horrifying weapons which would have killed in any preceding war, are cruelly crippled for life. These men return, not met by flags flying, or bands playing, or by patriotic citizens waving their hands in appreciation. They are shuffled off to hospitals or their homes, where they can lie forever watching on television the burning of draft cards, rioting in the streets, and the mockery made of our courts of law. All this in a country to which these men have given their most personal sacrifice.

Mr. President, we must not allow any veteran to become a second-class citizen. As they have willingly supported the commitments made by our Government we in turn must not forget them. They deserve the best in medical care and rehabilitation. The proper utilization of personnel, equipment and health care must continue to be improved. The Veterans' Administration must be afforded the continuing support of a grateful Nation, if it is to meet its obligation to all veterans and particularly to the 270,000 Americans wounded in Vietnam.

Mr. President, we owe our American veterans the best.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I support the conference report on H.R. 11959, the veterans education and training bill.

As ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, it was my privilege to help fashion this legislation from the subcommittee level on and to be a cosponsor of many of the separate bills for innovative veterans' programs which became incorporated into this final piece of legislation. The Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON) has done an outstanding job as chairman of the subcommittee, and we in the Senate have been fortunate on this bill to have the strong contributions of both the committee chairman, the Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH), and the ranking minority member of the full committee, the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS). We have at all times approached this bill from a bipartisan viewpoint.

The bill approved by the conference committee will raise the GI educational assistance allowance by 34.6 percent. Applying this to a single veteran with no dependents, he presently receives $130 a month and now would get $175 a month. This represented a compromise between the 46 percent rise passed by the Senate and the 27 percent increase passed by the House. While it is not as great an increase as we in the Senate would have liked to achieve at this time, it goes a long way toward closing the gap between the GI allowances and the rising expense of getting a college education today.

The innovative provisions of title II of the Senate bill, while modified through the action of the conference, remain substantially intact. These are: a supplementary tutoring allowance to returning veterans in college, at the rate of $50 a month for up to 9 months; the PREP program of predischarge educational opportunities for servicemen; the extension of GI benefits to veterans enrolled in remedial or refresher courses, and the new outreach program.

As a cosponsor of these provisions when they first appeared as separate bills, I strongly support them and hope that these new programs, like the general increase in GI education benefits, will help close the growing education gap which our returning veterans have been encountering, particularly those who have educationally disadvantaged backgrounds.

I feel strongly that our returning Vietnam veterans, quite aside from the education opportunities they deserve from a grateful Nation, are a vital human resource. We must not allow our returning veterans to lose out on the education and job opportunities that are only accessible to well-trained young men. We need a system that will not only reward the well-trained veteran but also help the educationally handicapped veteran to catch up. This legislation, with its new programs which I am proud to say have originated in the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs of this body, is a good beginning toward this goal.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to mention action taken by the conferees to eliminate a provision from the bill affecting veterans who are apprentice barbers.

The House bill contained a provision which prohibited Veterans' Administration approval of a veteran's apprenticeship or on-the-job training where the Administrator "finds that by reason of prior training or experience such veteran is performing or is capable of performing the job operations of his objective at the same performance level as the journeyman in the occupation."

The Senate committee considered this provision after it was passed by the House as part of H.R. 6808, but the committee found insufficient justification for including it in its version of the bill.

This provision, according to the Veterans' Administration, would have resulted in a cutoff of VA on-the-job training payments to veterans in Pennsylvania who had completed their formal barber training in a 9-month school but who were still serving their 15 months of apprentice training to qualify for a journeyman barber's license.

The Veterans' Administration, if the provision became law, was prepared to rule that these apprentice barbers were performing at journeyman level once they finished school. Hence they would not be eligible for on-the-job training benefits. But in Pennsylvania, a barber does not receive his journeyman license until he has trained for 24 months—which usually comes as 9 months in a barber college, followed by the 15 months of apprenticeship. During the 15 months, the apprentice barber must work for an established barber. He is barred by law from going into business for himself, and he usually finds it difficult to attract customers during this period when he is still learning his craft.

The conferees resolved the disagreement by eliminating the provision. However, as a safeguard against paying VA benefits to barbers who might be "apprentices" in name only, a new requirement that on-the-job training must be "supervised" as well as "organized" was added to the law. I feel this is a solution that will allow barber apprentices in my State to continue receiving VA on-the-job training benefits, instead of having these benefits arbitrarily stopped. At the same time, we added new language to safeguard against abuses of this highly worthwhile assistance.

Mr. President, I urge that the conference report on H.R. 11959 be promptly adopted.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to.

DELIVERY OF MILITARY MATERIEL TO THE GOVERNMENT OF CHIANG KAI-SHEK ON TAIWAN

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I note with some alarm that efforts continue unabated with respect to delivering uncalled-for amounts of military materiel to the government of Chiang Kai-Shek on Taiwan. In testimony before the House Armed Services Committee last week, a spokesman for the Office of the Chief of Naval Operations called for loaning three U.S. submarines to Taiwan, in spite of the fact that the administration itself had not deemed it necessary to request them. The committee accepted this argument and added this provision to the bill it reported.

Representative DONALD M. FRASER has taken the lead in fighting this attempt to introduce a new weapons system into an already tense area under provocative circumstances, and I would like to commend him for this effort.

There are several reasons why I believe it would be unwise to allow this action of the House Armed Services Committee to stand. Nationalist China at present has no submarines, and no trained submarine personnel, I am informed. It would take a long period of time, perhaps as much as 2 years, to take the submarines in question from the reserve fleet, prepare them for active service, and train the necessary Chinese crews. Once in service with the Chinese Navy, the United States would retain little control over their use. It is one thing to use submarines to provide anti-submarine-warfare training for Chinese surface ships and aircraft, and another to employ such vessels in ways which might increase tension in East Asia. These submarines would not increase Nationalist China's security, would cost a considerable amount of money and time to place into active service, and might make us the reluctant beneficiaries of the byproducts of excess zeal on the part of the Nationalist Chinese.

Robert M. Smith of the New York Times has provided a useful summary of recent developments in this matter, and I commend it to the attention of Members of the Senate who may be distressed, as I was, to learn of this unnecessary initiative. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Smith's article, which appeared on March 14, 1970, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOAN OF THREE U.S. SUBS TO TAIWAN IS ASKED

(By Robert M. Smith)

WASHINGTON.—The House Armed Services Committee has proposed a loan of three United States submarines to Nationalist China.

The Administration, which proposed lending some vessels in the bill under discussion, had not included Taiwan on its list of recipients, and the addition seems likely to provoke a floor fight when the bill is considered in the House next Wednesday.

The Armed Service Committee, whose chairman is Representative L. Mendel Rivers, Democrat of South Carolina, sent to the floor an Administration-sponsored bill last month that extended the long-term loan of one submarine to Greece and one to Pakistan. The bill would also provide two destroyer escorts each to South Vietnam and Turkey.

In addition, however, the committee added the loan of two submarines to Turkey and of three to Taiwan.

Earlier this winter, a provision of the foreign aid bill that would have given Taiwan a squadron of Pantom jet fighters stirred such controversy that it was finally dropped.

Representative Donald M. Fraser, Democrat of Minnesota and chairman of the liberal Democratic Study Group, said today that he would offer an amendment to the committee's bill striking the loan of the submarines to Taiwan.

The Defense Department supports the loan of vessels to Greece, Pakistan, Turkey and South Vietnam but has not taken a position of those for Nationalist China.

The Defense Department's witness before the Armed Services Committee, Capt. G. M. Hagerman, director of the foreign military assistance division in the office of the Chief of Naval Operations, said that in his opinion the United States should lend Taiwan the submarines. The reasons he gave were stricken from the hearing report for security reasons.

Asked for its position on the loan this evening, the State Department said the issue was "under review."

"It has to be considered at a senior level," a department spokesman said.

VESSELS ON RESERVE

The action of the Armed Services Committee came to the attention of Capitol Hill today when the Democratic Study * * * summarizing the bill's provisions and pointing out that it would reach the floor next week.

The submarines involved are diesel-powered and would come from the Navy's reserve fleet.

According to Captain Hagerman's testimony, Taiwan has no submarines and no personnel trained to operate any.

The committee's report on the bill said the submarines would allow Taiwan to mount an antisubmarine defense in an area where the United States was cutting back on its own naval forces.

"In the over-all defense of the western Pacific," the report said. "The Republic of China had undertaken a role in participating in antisubmarine warfare activities." He continued:

"Permitting China to have three submarines does not introduce a new weapons system into the area, but lets China replace the United States in the localization of the defense of an area where the Communist Chinese have over 30 whiskey-class submarines provided by the Soviets and flying the Red Chinese flag." "W" class Soviet submarines are medium-range patrol vessels, although some have been equipped with missiles.

"In addition to helping to meet their threat, the report added, "providing the submarines to China at this time will permit China to continue having submarines to use in antisubmarine warfare training, since the services the United States has heretofore provided for this training are being curtailed.

"The area for which China is exercising some antisubmarine warfare responsibility is one of the areas where we will be providing reduced protection due to the cutbacks in our Pacific surface and submarine fleet."

An aide to Representative Fraser said that the Congressman opposed the loan of the vessels to Taiwan because he felt it would introduce another weapon in an already tense area, and would be a provocative gesture.

ADDRESS BY MAJ. GEN. CARROLL H. DUNN BEFORE THE ARKANSAS BASIN DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, the Arkansas Basin Develoment Association has just completed its annual meeting in Tulsa, Okla., which I had the pleasure of attending. Maj. Gen. Carroll H. Dunn, Deputy Chief of the Corps of Engineers, was one of the featured speakers.

In his excellent speech, General Dunn illustrated the tremendous impact of the Arkansas River navigation project by calling attention to the fact that the project has already attracted industrial pledges for actual construction exceeding the $1½ billion mark. Although the navigation complex will undoubtedly result in unprecedented industrial growth and economic expansion, General Dunn stated that with effective management the Arkansas River project could prove that efficient navigation projects and the preservation of ecological and esthetic values can be compatible. Certainly, pollution control must be an integral part of the industrialization of the Arkansas River, and I shall do all that I can to insure that the water and air in the Arkansas River Valley remains clean and uncontaminated.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that General Dunn's remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOR A PROTECTED ENVIRONMENT

(By Maj. Gen. C. H. Dunn)

Senator McClellan, Senator Bellmon, Congressman Belcher, other members of Congress, honored guests, members of the Arkansas Basin Development Association, Ladies and Gentlemen: Even though today is Friday 13th, I consider it lucky to be here—not only to renew old and lasting friendships made during my years in the Southwestern Division, but to share a few thoughts with you along the lines of where we should go from here.

The Arkansas River Project today basks in the Nation's water resource spotlight. It has given meaning to President Theodore Roosevelt's great line: "Conservation means development as much as it means protection."

Even critics of damming rivers and digging navigation channels must be impressed with the size of this undertaking and the spirit with which it was pushed forward. Even those who want the Nation to march back to the wilderness must marvel at the foresight, enthusiasm, energy, and unity of purpose displayed by this Association and backed by the people of the Arkansas Basin in bringing this project to the threshold of completion. But, this project would have gotten nowhere had it not been for the impetus provided by such men as the late Senator Bob Kerr, Senator McClellan, Page Belcher, and other members of the Congressional delegations who provided the most essential element of all—support for the necessary appropriations. I hope you will join me in paying these men a debt of gratitude.

Even as an unfinished project, this waterway has attracted industrial pledges and actual construction which have already passed the one half billion dollar mark. Permits have been issued for construction of 35 ports and 17 marinas valued at more than $30 million. Last year, 76 million people visited the 53 reservoirs and six navigation pools completed in the basin, and increase of 10 million over 1968.

The wonders of the Arkansas River Project have been recognized on another front with its entry in the competition for the American Society of Civil Engineers Outstanding Civil Engineering Achievement for 1970.

No doubt it will take more years of observation and striking examples of project performance before there is a conversion of some of those who have in the past opposed river basin development. It does, at the same time, present a real challenge to build a better environmental "mousetrap." This project must be not only practical but also appealing.

People have to live and eat. To do this they must exist in a balanced environment, one which combines an adequate supply of good clean water, clean air, freedom from flood and drought, electricity, transportation, recreation—benefits you have here in ever growing abundance. In the crowded population corridors in the Boston-New York-Washington, and Cleveland-Detroit-Chicago areas, people are growing weary of the day-to-day drudgery, working to make a living in an atmosphere of smog-laden air, polluted water, and that hemmed-in feeling. Millions are gazing toward the Southwest. In Arkansas and Oklahoma, there have been more reservoirs built since World War II than in any other similar part of the country. This may well start an increasing population growth in the area, just the opposite of the migration of the thirties.

Rather than break our arms patting each other on the back, however, let's not forget that completion of the construction phase of this development is by no means the signal to disband and let the future take care of itself. Your President spoke of this in his report this morning. The big effort in the field of water resource development before, during, and after construction continues to be planning. The same applies to developing an effective management program for a newly completed project such as this one.

Waterway development presents many special environmental problems and the Arkansas Project is no exception. Some say efficient navigation projects and preservation of ecological and esthetic values can't mix. This project will be watched closely on this score.

You must protect what you have and one sure-fire way of doing this is to keep your environment in balance. In recent years, objectives other than engineering and economic ones have become increasingly important and competitive. Heavy emphasis is being placed on good stewardship of the natural environment, the conservation of fish and wildlife, the provision of expanding opportunities for healthful outdoor recreation, and other measures contributing to a better and happier life.

The rapid and massive expansion of our urban-industrial society keeps pushing the countryside—the open spaces—further and further back. Many people are deeply concerned that we may be sacrificing too much of the natural environment in order to fulfill our material requirements. This is particularly true in the more thickly populated portions of our country, where the tensions of modern life are generally greatest and the need for relaxation and recreation more pressing.

As cities continue to grow, residents will want to be able to leave their homes, leave their crowded highways, and find beautiful landscapes, green fields, wooded hillsides, and clean water somewhere nearby. Riverbank development must be controlled to insure that the air above and the water flowing by will remain clean. By comparison with many of our other major river basins, you now have little contamination from municipal or industrial wastes with which to contend.

A solution to the serious natural pollution problem posed by the salt content of the Arkansas River is required. I can assure you that the Corps of Engineers, other Federal agencies, and the States involved are doing their utmost to find a solution. In this connection, the Tulsa District has recommended a 250 million dollar project calling for construction of improvements in the Red and Arkansas River Basins to reduce brine pollution from natural resources. This is being coordinated at the Washington level. That salt pollution resulting from petroleum and natural gas operations is being dealt with through State action.

I am pleased to note that a bill designed to curb pollution of Oklahoma streams is now pending in your Legislature. You must have adequate regulatory safeguards and strict enforcement to insure that your rivers will not become polluted as new population centers and industrial development take place.

I mentioned earlier that effective management must go hand in hand with the planning necessary to protect your development and keep your environment in balance. The Arkansas River project must have an organization that will treat this region as an entity rather than leaving the planning function solely to each community along the river bank on a piecemeal basis.

Essentially then, there must be a broadly based organization which will consider all viewpoints objectively and without the personal, vested interests of a particular section. Such an organization will be called upon to weigh the merits of conflicting uses for the best overall public good. I urge that this Association be such an organization prepared to make recommendations to the Governors and State agencies involved. You have come too far and accomplished too much to stop now. You have the knowledge and the background as to the needs of this basin, both from geographic and use points of view. You constitute a natural body to continue an enlightened overview and to help plan the development as a whole.

In closing, let me tell you of a comment in one of the Washington papers last week quoting a college girl from Indiana who was one of the participants at a student-editor conference on the environment. She said: "If you lived in the Wabash Valley, you'd be very much against pollution. There are no pretty days in Terre Haute."

There are many pretty days and good times ahead for the Arkansas Basin. Let's make sure it is kept that way.

Thank you very much.

MOTION PICTURE CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I continue to receive a number of communications relating to my statements concerning trends in the motion picture industry, the film classification system, and the possibility that films which have been rated as not appropriate for minors may be performed on television. Recently the American Legion and the American Legion Auxiliary, Ninth District, Arkansas Department, adopted resolutions endorsing my efforts in this field.

In my previous statements I have not expressed my personal opinions about particular movies but have quoted the comments and observations of critics, performers, educators, and concerned parents. Dr. Benjamin Spock in his recent book "Decent and Indecent" discusses this subject in a section of the book entitled, "A Reactionary View of Obscenity and Brutality." Dr. Spock and I are not usually in agreement concerning issues of public policy, however, his thoughts on this subject are very similar to the observations I have previously made. Since Dr. Spock is probably this country's best known authority on child care his views are of particular interest. He writes:

For decades I was an uncompromising civil libertarian and scorned the hypocrisy usually involved in the enforcement of obscenity laws. But recent trends in movies, literature, and art toward what I think of as shock-obscenity, and the courts' acceptance of it, have made me change my position somewhat, particularly in view of other brutalizing trends . . .

To justify legal or customary standards of decency I don't think it should be necessary to prove that adults have committed sex crimes or that adolescents have lost their virtue as a direct result of reading a story or looking at a picture.

No single experience will make that difference. However, various psychological observations have shown clearly that people's standards are always being modified—sometimes down, sometimes up—by the ethical atmosphere in which they find themselves. This applies to sexual behavior and to violence. Experiments have proved that after viewing films of violence, people become at least slightly more cruel in their relations with others. . . . Adolescents from even protective families are allowed to choose their own movies. Yet in a recent federal court decision concerning a film about delinquency that depicted "scenes of brutality, prostitution, homosexuality and sodomy," two of the three judges agreed that, though they were "revolted," the film was not obscene according to the stipulations of the Supreme Court because (1) it was not "designed to appeal to the prurience of the average American" and (2) was not "utterly without redeeming social significance." Another recent film showed a mother practicing a perversion on her child. . . .

I'd suggest that, for public presentations, there be levels of tolerance of taboo. What is allowed to be displayed openly on newsstands and in bookstores for children as well as adults to buy, and what is shown on television during children's viewing hours and in theaters open to all ages, should only be what average citizens would consider not disturbing to children, not debasing to their ideals. This would not mean that immorality, coarseness, or social wrongs could not be indicated, provided it was done in a way that would not crudely shock the average child. . . .

I agree that plays, movies, late television programs, books, magazines should be able to deal seriously or lightly with themes that involve sexuality and immorality—for the purpose of education, catharsis of the emotions, escape, or titillation—without harm to adults over eighteen. I appreciate and approve of all these kinds of works. But I think they should be labeled and reserved for adults. To be sure, some adolescents will see them but only after taking the initiative in circumventing the law or their parents—which will make the experience have a different meaning for them if society allows the producer to offer them such productions. . . .

I'd distinguish today a third category of movies, plays, novels, articles, and paintings in which a primary aim is to shock, revolt, or embarrass by explicitly depicting sexual intimacies—especially those of a loveless, perverse, or brutal kind—and other works that horrify with vivid details of nonsexual brutality. Most though not all of these works are obviously feeble in their artistic or social significance. . . .

Now it is mainly writers, artists and producers with little discernible artistic or social integrity who are leading the assault on standards. And the courts are using as their only criteria for guilt the "appeal to prurience" and the "utter lack of social significance," which are too limited and technical to bar the kinds of material I consider destructive.

Of course I'd be best satisfied if people would decline in such great numbers to support shocking presentations that the producers would give up in discouragement. This would be the ideal way to bring about change without submitting to the arbitrariness of laws and judges. But since I don't believe that an overwhelming revulsion is likely to occur for another ten years, I would now join a majority, if such developed, in favor of new laws which would determine guilt simply on the basis of judges' and juries' sense of shock and revulsion. . . .

I do recognize that what is considered shocking or brutalizing will vary with the times. I admit that the laws I suggest might delay the publication of a future "Lady Chatterly's Lover," which would be a substantial loss in the interval; but its worth would be vindicated in the end. I agree that my reasoning is the same that all censors and prophets of doom have used. On the other hand, nations and civilizations have actually disintegrated when their belief in themselves and their adherence to standards were lost.

Mr. President, almost every day I read in the press or receive in the mail news clippings which vividly describe the current situation in the motion picture industry. A recent issue of the Washington Daily News contained a description by columnist Don McLean of the film entitled "The Damned." Mr. McLean's column reads in part:

The other night I went to a movie that I don't think even I'M going to be mature enough to see for at least 10 or 15 years. The name of the picture is "The Damned," and it was produced by Warner Bros. I saw it at the Motion Picture Association screening room, a temple of entertainment built by MPA President Jack Valenti about a block from the White House. "The Damned" has been playing for about a week at the MPA, to selected audiences—namely the press and various embassy delegations. I attended on Italian night, along with a few other reporters and many people from the Italian Embassy.

And now to "The Damned." This is a heartwarming story about free enterprise carried to extremes. The main characters are part of an enormously wealthy German family that's in the steel and munitions business. It manages to survive all of Germany's wars and peacetimes and always gets along with the party in power. Naturally, this doesn't sound like any German family anyone has ever heard about, so the film must be sheer fiction. The movie family's name is von Essenbeck. The time is just as Hitler is solidifying his dictatorship.

As the story opens, the whole family is gathered for the birthday of Grandpa von Essenbeck. (He is later murdered in his bed and we get to see all the bullet holes.) Part of the entertainment consists of Martin von Essenbeck, the 21-year-old grandson, doing a female impersonation. (Right away we know he has problems.) There's a tremendous power struggle going on for control of the family business. There are a couple of nude scenes with Friedrich Bruckmann (Dirk Bogarde) and Baroness Sophie von Essenbeck in bed. Meanwhile, Martin von Essenbeck is attempting to fondle his 8-year-old niece. Later, we see Martin, who leads an incredibly varied sex life, violating a little girl; making love to a grown woman; AND raping his mother. (This is NOT a stag film.)

Meanwhile, the German SA has a homosexual orgy, with lecherous old men chasing around young boys wearing women's undergarments. All of them are machine-gunned by the SS (the only good idea it ever had) and we get to see punctured bodies stacked up and blood all over the falls. At the end of the picture, us newsmen and diplomats went out into the party room, swilled champagne and talked about the movie's socially redeeming qualities.

The Washington Evening Star recently published a review by their Drama Critic, Harry MacArthur, of the "R" rated movie "The Honeymoon Killers." A single paragraph of this review is adequate to appreciate the social and artistic values of this film. He writes:

You will not find much in "The Honeymoon Killers" to arouse empathy. Martha and Ray are a couple of vicious, amoral goons and their victims are just plain stupid, or at best pitiable. It is doubtful that you'd want to spend two minutes with anyone involved, even on a movie screen. To make the whole thing even less palatable, Kastle has taken full advantage of the current permissiveness to pursue realism by resorting to the crude and vulgar whenever possible. He finds it possible frequently. When you have a movie in which a leading character doesn't even bother to close the door when he rushes into the bathroom, you have a revolting movie.

These are examples of the "R" and "X" rated films, which motion picture companies clearly intend in the future to offer for sale to television—perhaps with one or two minutes of film deleted. According to the president of the Motion Picture Association, the production of such films is "enhanced" by the rating system. These films are examples of the industry's concept of "self-restraint." They are also evidence of why I have previously announced that I plan to conduct hearings on the entire subject of film classification.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Ninth District, Arkansas Department, the American Legion, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NINTH DISTRICT, ARKANSAS DEPARTMENT, THE AMERICAN LEGION RESOLUTION COMMENDING HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN, SENATOR

Whereas; Many films are being produced by the motion picture industry which are banned to youngsters under 17 years of age owing to "sexy scenes" and other permissive matter; and

Whereas; The United States Supreme Court, in recent years, has consistently ruled that adults can see and read whatever they choose; and

Whereas; The motion picture industry relied on the sales of films to the television media to recover some of the expenses of producing the films; and

Whereas; The showing of sex and violence films on television could be available to children to see without parental supervision; and

Whereas; The news media reports that Senator John O. Pastore (Dem. R.I.) last year began hammering away at "sex and violence" on television, leading the networks to pay closer attention to their regular programs; further that now Senator John L. McClellan, (Dem. Ark) is preparing to hold hearings later this year that will define the issues even more sharply and McClellan points out that those X-rated films are going to be ripe for television sales and that if they weren't fit to be seen by youngsters in motion picture theatres they won't be fit to be seen by youngsters on television screens;

Be it therefore resolved by; The Ninth District, Arkansas Department, The American Legion, assembled in regular session, in Pine Bluff, Arkansas, on this 1st day of March, 1970, go on record as highly commending the Hon. John L. McClellan for his proposed plans to question the whole theory and practice of motion picture ratings and his intention of meeting with Dean Burch, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, to discuss possible course of action.

Copies of this resolution to be sent to the Hon. John L. McClellan; the Hon. J. Wm. Fulbright; the Hon. David Pryor and to Chairman Dean Burch of FCC.

HOMER B. WEATHERFORD,
Ninth District Commander.

ABA RESOLUTION REGARDING S. 2022—THE ILLEGAL GAMBLING BUSINESS CONTROL ACT OF 1969

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues here in the Senate and in the other body a resolution recently adopted by the American Bar Association which supports S. 2022, the Illegal Gambling Business Control Act of 1969. S. 2022 has, of course, now been incorporated into S. 30, the Organized Crime Control Act of 1969, as title VIII of that measure, which overwhelmingly passed the Senate by a vote of 73 to 1 on January 23 of this year and is now pending in the House Judiciary Committee.

I certainly welcome the formal support of the American Bar Association on this aspect of the legislation, which is, of course, representative of the major thrust of S. 30. I am hopeful that our colleagues in the House now will expeditiously act on this badly needed legislation and that their action will reflect the nearly unanimous thinking of the Senate when we passed this proposal after prolonged study, hearings, and debate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter containing the American Bar Association resolution supporting S. 2022—title VIII of S. 30—be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., March 13, 1970.

Hon. JOHN MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: At the meeting of the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association held Februrary 23–24, 1970, the following resolution was adopted upon recomemndation of the Section of Criminal Law:

Resolved, that the American Bar Association approves and supports in principle legislation represented by S. 2022, 91st Congress, 1st Session, cited as the "Illegal Gambling Business Control Act of 1969," a Bill "To permit the Federal Government to further assist the States in the control of illegal gambling, and for other purposes"; and

Be It Further Resolved, that the Section of Criminal Law is authorized to indicate support of the Association for such legislation by appearances before Committees of the Congress or in such other ways as may be appropriate.

This resolution is being transmitted for your information and whatever action you may deem appropriate. We would appreciate your advising Donald E. Channell, Director of the American Bar Association Washington Office, 1705 De Sales Street, N.W., if hearings are scheduled on the subject of the resolution.

Sincerely yours,

WM. REECE SMITH, Jr.,
Secretary.

THE INVASION OF LEGITIMATE BUSINESS, THE ORGANIZED CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1969, AND FALSE CLAIMS OF CIVIL LIBERTIES VIOLATIONS

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, the Wednesday, February 25, 1970—page 41, column 1—New York Times contained an article by Nancy Moran concerning the "big-time" criminal residents of Yonkers, N.Y. Toward the end of the article the following appears:

Former United States Attorney Robert M. Morgenthau once described John Jr.'s father (John Mariello) as "a prime example of a Mafia figure operating illegitimately in legitimate channels."

The article describes many instances of illegitimate operation of legitimate organizations by mob members. I commend it to each Senator for careful reading.

Mr. President, title IX of S. 30, the Organized Crime Control Act of 1969, which the Senate passed on January 23, by a vote of 73 to 1, is expressly aimed at removing the baneful influence of organized crime from our legitimate commercial endeavors that are all too often today conducted in an illegitimate manner by the forces of organized crime. Title IX, patterned on the antitrust laws, allows both civil and criminal actions to effect this removal. An action may be brought by the Government where a pattern of criminal activity is proven in connection with the conduct of the organization's affairs. The remedies available include divestiture, dissolution, criminal forfeiture, and prevention of return to the industry by the violators. As might be expected, there were attempts made to categorize our efforts as unconstitutional and to suggest that they somehow involved a violation of civil liberties.

During the debate on S. 30 on January 22, on pages 851–855 of the RECORD, a "detailed analysis of the manner in which the provisions of the proposed bill run counter to the law and spirit of the Constitution" was offered for the consideration of the Senate. In that analysis the following statement was made:

Although Title IX clearly contemplates that the records obtained in this dragnet fashion may be used in subsequent criminal as well as civil proceedings, no provision in the statute safeguards the individual's Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination in a later proceeding. If material acquired in connection with a civil investigation can be used in a subsequent criminal case, any Fifth Amendment privilege would thereby be destroyed. Unless this privilege covers all prosecutions which result from the gathering of this information, broad civil investigative powers in an area involving criminal activity would clearly be unconstitutional. The question of availability of the privilege in such a case is currently pending in the Supreme Court, United States v. Kordel, 407 F. 2d 570 (6th Cir. 1968), cert. granted, 395 U.S. 932 (1969) (O.T. 1969, No. 87). (p. S425)

At hearings on S. 30, before the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, the following testimony was given by the same civil liberties organization that prepared the insert:

In addition, it is apparently contemplated that the material may ultimately be used in both criminal and civil cases. Subsection 4 of section 1968 provides that when any attorney has been designated to appear on behalf of the United States before any court or grand jury in any case or proceeding involving any alleged violation of this chapter, the custodian may deliver to such attorney such documentary material in possession of the custodian as such attorney determines to be required for use in the presentation of such case or proceeding on behalf of the United States. This utterly destroys the Fifth Amendment privilege with regard to this material in a subsequent criminal proceeding, and we believe is clearly unconstitutional. Just this week, the Supreme Court agreed to hear United States v. Kordel (No. 2191) in which this very issue is raised. It would, therefore, appear to be most foolhardy for Congress to rush to pass this legislation while a kingpin in its theory is being considered by the Court. (Hearings, p. 447) (italics added)

The Supreme Court on February 24, 1970—Kordel v. United States, 87 U.S. Sup. Ct. 2–24–70—has now determined that we were not as "foolhardy" when we placed our seal of approval on S. 30 as this civil liberties organization attempted to suggest. The Supreme Court confirmed by its decision in Kordel that the Senate was fully justified in giving short shrift to these fanciful "constitutional" objections when it stated:

It would stultify enforcement of federal law to require a governmental agency such as the FDA invariably to choose either to forgo recommendation of a criminal prosecution once it seeks civil relief, or to defer civil proceedings pending the ultimate outcome of a criminal trial. (p. 10)

In this decision, which was pending when the civil liberties organization wanted us to delay action, the Court responded, in effect, to the allegation of the organization that "this utterly destroys the fifth amendment privilege."—hearings, page 477—when it observed:

Without question he could have invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination. Surely Feldton was not barred from asserting his privilege simply because the corporation had no privilege of its own, nor because the proceeding in which the Government sought information was civil rather than criminal in character.

Mr. President, the records of our hearings clearly demonstrate that each member of the Criminal Laws and Procedures Subcommittee is fully concerned that its work-product be in accord with our Constitution. I will take second seat to no man in the concern for the civil liberties of all of our citizens. But I also recognize that the Constitution does not prevent prosecution for crime, that it does allow for protection of society, and that not every cry that a proposed item of legislation should be rejected because it is a violation of civil liberties must be blindly accepted at face value. There are among us today some who have gone far toward, in the words of Mr. Justice Jackson in Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1, 15 (1949):

> accepting the doctrine that civil liberty means the removal of all restraints . . . and that all . . . attempts to maintain order are impairments of the liberty of the citizen. The choice is not between order and liberty. It is between liberty and order and anarchy without either. There is danger that, if . . . [we do] not temper . . . [our] doctrinaire logic with a little practical wisdom, it will convert the constitutional Bill of Rights into a suicide pact.

Mr. President, the Kordel case makes it all too clear that although an organization with the name of "Civil Liberties" may claim an invasion of those liberties it is not necessarily true. All too often, unfortunately, these so-called invasions are, as here, simply and patently ill-reasoned and wrong-minded.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the New York Times article be printed in the RECORD at this point in order that the extent of infiltration of our legitimate organizations will be more apparent. I also ask unanimous consent that the Kordel opinion be printed at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YONKERS IS BEDROOM AND OFFICE FOR MAFIA CHIEFS

(By Nancy Moran)

YONKERS.—"So many big-time Mafia members live in Yonkers," a law-enforcement officer familiar with organized crime said recently, "that we think of the city as a little Newark."

Last week Yonkers police broke up what was described as a $30-million-a-year numbers operation and arrested six men. Among those arrested was Sabato Milo, a nephew of Bo and Tommy Milo, who have been identified by the Justice Department as members of the Mafia family of the late Vito Genovese.

On March 4 John (Gentleman Johnny) Masiello and his 28-year-old son, John Jr., both Yonkers residents who have been identified as members of the Genovese Mafia family, are scheduled to be sentenced on a charge of bribing post office officials who supervised mail trucking contracts in New York.

A special Westchester County grand jury is now looking into racketeering, organized crime and official corruption in this city of 220,000 people. The grand jury was impaneled last month after the State Commission of Investigation charged that pressure from Mafia leaders and politicans had produced "intimidation, servility, favoritism, mismanagement, inefficiency and waste" in the Yonkers city government.

BOOKMAKING INQUIRY

A special Federal grand jury is hearing evidence on a national Mafia-controlled bookmaking operation frequently making its headquarters in Yonkers that is alleged to gross $70-million a year.

Sources close to the investigations say they could result in a scandal comparable to the one in Newark, where Mayor Hugh J. Addonizio and 14 other men, including a reputed Mafioso, Anthony (Tony Boy) Boiardo, and a number of city officials, were indicted last December on charges of sharing kickbacks totaling $248,000 from an engineering firm that had been awarded municipal contracts.

"Before last November's elections it was widely felt that no one could get a city contract in Yonkers without kicking back some of it," a Federal investigator said in a recent interview.

The investigator added that he believed that the new administration of Mayor Alfred D. DelBello, a former Democratic Councilman, was "scrupulously honest."

The most powerful of the reputed Mafiosi here is Nicholas (Cockeyed Nick) Rattenni, alleged to be a captain in the Mafia family formerly controlled by Genovese. According to Joseph Fisch, chief counsel for the S.I.C., Rattenni has moved up in the last few years from a "button man," or common soldier, to the captain's position formerly held by James Angeina, who died in 1967.

RATTENNI FREE ON BAIL

The 63-year-old Rattenni, who has a lengthy arrest record, but was convicted only once, in 1927, and sentenced to two and a half to five years for robbery, for which he served three years in Sing Sing. Arrested along with several other reputed Mafiosi last month and charged with conspiring to bribe Internal Revenue Service agents, he is now free on $20,000 bail.

Rattenni's name has long been linked with those of well-known gangsters. Federal investigators say that in the nineteen-thirties and nineteen-forties he was an associate of the late Frank Erickson, the New York bookmaker. In 1953 Herbert Brownell, Jr., who was then United States Attorney General, described him as a chief lieutenant of Frank Costello, the gambler.

When Rattenni moved to Yonkers from the Bronx 25 years ago and entered the private carting business, he rented garbage trucks from Joseph (Joey Surprise) Feola, who vanished in 1962 and is believed to have been murdered in a war between the Carlo Gambino and Genovese Mafia families over the refuse-removal contract at the Ford Motor Company assembly plant in Mahwah, N.J.

Over the years Rattenni's business prospered, and today 90 per cent of the private garbage collection here is done by his two firms, the Westchester Carting Company and the Fleetwood Haulage Company.

SON ENTERS BUSINESS

His 25-year-old adopted son, Nick Jr., entered the family business last year when he became president of A-1 Compaction, Inc., a new firm listed at the same address as Westchester Carting Company.

The Rattennis' business practices were a major subject of the recent S.I.C. investigation. The commission charged that Westchester Carting Company trucks had been allowed to use the city incinerator while the city's own trucks were forced to go elsewhere. The practice was said to cost Yonkers $1 million a year. The matter is currently under investigation by the Westchester District Attorney's office.

The S.I.C. was particularly disturbed by Rattenni's friendships with past and present city officials.

For example, during the Commission's investigation Councilman Frank Adamo, who was recently elected to a third term, testified that he had visited Rattenni at home, had frequently driven him to his office and had used the office telephone to call City Hall to inquire about zoning changes. The commission described the relationship as "unhealthy."

A $250,000 HOME

Despite his alleged Mafia connections, Rattenni leads many successful Westchester businessmen. He lives with his second wife, Evelyn, and their 12-year-old son, Robert, in a secluded $250,000 home at 107 Rockledge Avenue, in the exclusive western residential section of Yonkers.

The dark-red shingled house sits on 12 acres of land that includes a three-bedroom playhouse, a 200-yard driving range and a putting green. The Rattennis belong to the Willow Ridge Country Club in Harrison, where Nick Jr. is golfing champion.

The elder Rattenni is a far poorer golfer than his son, but, according to one story, he was good enough to beat Frank Erickson in a match where $100,000 was at stake. Erickson, law officers say, paid his debt by giving Rattenni 6,400 shares of Roosevelt Raceway stock. That was in the early nineteen-fifties.

Last year Rattenni sold the stock for $1,322,676. The sale came to light in a recent lawsuit involving the raceway's stock. Rattenni is in no way involved in the lawsuit.

One indication of Rattenni's power is the dozen "button men" who served as bodyguards or merely came to listen when he testified before the S.I.C. last December.

Among the reputed Mafiosi noted among the spectators by state investigators were Frank Sacco, another reputed member of the Genovese family, who has been arrested numerous times on loan-sharking charges in Yonkers, and 28-year-old John A. Masiello Jr.

Former United States Attorney Robert M. Morgenthau once described John Jr.'s father as "a prime example of a Mafia figure operating illegitimately in legitimate channels."

The Masiellos control ANR Leasing Corporation, of 332 East 149th Street, the Bronx, which has mail hauling contracts until the Post Office Department canceled them in June, 1968. Last month both father and son were convicted of bribing post office officials who supervised mail trucking contracts in New York.

In 1965, the Small Business Administration awarded ANR a loan of $400,000, but official investigators believe the money was used to finance the elder Masiello's loan-sharking activities. Investigators say that Masiello has substantial interests in other metropolitan area trucking firms and "virtually controls trucking out of Kennedy International Airport."

The 50-year-old Masiello lives in a $100,000 home on Durst Place, a quiet residential street in the western part of the city. Just around the corner, at 192 Dunwoodie Street, is the spacious home of Vincent John Rao, the 72-year-old consiglieri (counselor) of the Mafia family of the late Thomas (Three Finger Brown) Luchese.

Like Vito Corleone, the Mafia leader in the novel "The Godfather," Rao has housed his two married daughters in homes next door. The three-house compound with swimming pool and playhouse is reportedly valued at $500,000.

After Luchese died in 1967, the short, Sicilian-born Rao could have had the leadership of the family if he'd wanted it, according to law officials. However, with his fortune and a craving for respectability, he apparently preferred to fade into the background.

The exact amount of Rao's fortune is uncertain, but he is said by Federal officials to have made millions of dollars through real estate holdings and businesses that include a Yonkers restaurant, a construction company and a New Jersey oceanfront hotel.

Rao is now in jail, serving a five-year perjury sentence but the police say his business affairs are being handled by his associates.

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. LELORD KORDEL AND ALFRED FELDTEN, ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SIXTH CIRCUIT

FEBRUARY 24, 1970

MR. JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

The respondents are the president and vice president, respectively, of Detroit Vital Foods,

Inc. They were convicted in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, along with the corporation, for violations of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act.[1] The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed the respondents' convictions on the ground that the Government's use of interrogatories to obtain evidence from the respondents in a nearly contemporaneous civil condemnation proceeding operated to violate their Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination.[2] We granted certiorari to consider the questions raised by the Government's invocation of simultaneous civil and criminal proceedings in the enforcement of federal law.[3]

In March 1960 the Division of Regulatory Management of the Food and Drug Administration (hereafter "FDA") instructed the agency's Detroit office to investigate the respondents' possible violations of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. Within a month the Detroit office recommended to the Division a civil seizure of two of the respondents' products, "Korleen" and "Frutex"; within another month the Division similarly recommended seizure to the FDA's General Counsel. On June 6, 1960, the General Counsel requested the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Michigan to commence an in rem action against these products of the corporation, and the United States Attorney filed a libel three days later. The corporation, appearing as the claimant, answered the libel on September 12, 1960. An FDA official in the Division of Regulatory Management then prepared extensive interrogatories to be served on the corporation in this civil action. The United States Attorney filed the agency's interrogatories on January 6, 1961, pursuant to Rule 33 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.[4]

After the Division official had drafted the interrogatories, he recommended that pursuant to § 305 of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act the FDA serve upon the corporation and the respondents a notice that the agency contemplated a criminal proceeding against them with respect to the transactions that were the subject of the civil action.[5] On January 9, 1961, three days after the filing of the interrogatories in the civil action, the Detroit office received an instruction from the Division to serve the statutory notice. The Detroit office complied 10 days later, and on March 8, 1961, the agency held a hearing on the notice.

On April 10, the corporation, having received the FDA's interrogatories but not yet having answered them, moved to stay further proceedings in the civil action or, in the alternative, to extend the time to answer the interrogatories until after disposition of the criminal proceeding signaled by the § 305 notice. The motion was accompanied by the affidavit of counsel. The moving papers urged the District Court to act under Rule 33 "in the interest of substantial justice" and as a "balancing of hardship and equities of the respective parties. . . ." Permitting the Government to obtain proof of violations of the Act by resort to civil discovery procedures, the movant urged, would be "improper" and would "work a grave injustice against the claimant"; it would also enable the Government to have pretrial discovery of the respondents' defenses to future criminal charges. Counsel expressly disavowed any "issue of a self-incrimination privilege in favor of the claimant corporation." And nowhere in the moving papers did counsel raise a claim of the Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination with respect to the respondents.

On June 21, 1961, the District Court denied the motion upon finding that the corporation had failed to demonstrate that substantial prejudice and harm would result from being required to respond to the interrogatories. The court reasoned that the § 305 notice did not conclusively indicate the Government would institute a criminal proceeding, that six to 12 months could elapse from the service of the statutory notice to initiation of a criminal prosecution, and that the Government could obtain data for a prosecution from the testimony in the civil action or by subpoenaing the books and records of the corporation. Accordingly, the court concluded, the interests of justice did not require that the Government be denied the information it wanted simply because it had sought it by way of civil-discovery procedures. On September 5, 1961, in compliance with the court's directive, the corporation, through the respondent Feldten, answered the Government's interrogatories.

On July 28, 1961, five weeks after the District Court's order but more than a month before receipt of the answers to the interrogatories, the Director of the FDA's Detroit office recommended a criminal prosecution to the Division. The Division forwarded the recommendation to the General Counsel on August 31, 1961, still prior to receipt of Feldten's answers. While the matter was pending in the General Counsel's office, the Division officer who had originally drafted the proposed interrogatories recommended that additional violations of the statute be alleged in the indictment. On June 13, 1962, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare requested the Department of Justice to institute a criminal proceeding, and about two months after that the latter department instructed the United States Attorney in Detroit to seek an indictment. The civil case, still pending in the District Court, proceeded to settlement by way of a consent decree in November 1962, and eight months later the Government obtained the indictment underlying the present judgments of conviction.

I

At the outset, we assume that the information Feldten supplied the Government in his answers to the interrogatories, if not necessary to the proof of the Government's case in the criminal prosecution, as the Court of Appeals thought, at least provided evidence or leads useful to the Government.[6] However, the record amply supports the express finding of the District Judge who presided at the criminal trial, and who held an extensive evidentiary hearing on the respondents' pretrial motion to suppress evidence, that the Government did not act in bad faith in filing the interrogatories. Rather, the testimony before the trial court demonstrated that the Division of Regulatory Management regularly prepares such interrogatories upon the receipt of claimants' answers to civil libels, and files them in over three-fourths of such cases, to hasten their disposition by securing admissions and laying the foundation for summary judgments.

The Court of Appeals thought the answers to the interrogatories were involuntarily given. The District Judge's order denying the corporation's motion to defer the answers to the interrogatories, reasoned the court, left the respondents with three choices: they could have refused to answer, thereby forfeiting the corporation's property that was the subject of the libel; they could have given false answers to the interrogatories, thereby subjecting themselves to the risk of a prosecution for perjury; or they could have done just what they did—disclose the requested information, thereby supplying the Government with evidence and leads helpful in securing their indictment and conviction.[7]

In this analysis we think the Court of Appeals erred. For Feldten need not have answered the interrogatories. Without question he could have invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination.[8] Surely Feldten was not barred from asserting his privilege simply because the corporation had no privilege of its own,[9] nor because the proceeding in which the Government sought information was civil rather than criminal in character.[10]

To be sure, service of the interrogatories obliged the corporation to "appoint an agent who could, without fear of self-incrimination, furnish such requested information as was available to the corporation."[11] The corporation could not satisfy its obligation under Rule 33 simply by pointing to an agent about to invoke his constitutional privilege. "It would indeed be incongruous to permit a corporation to select an individual to verify the corporation's answers, who because he fears self-incrimination may thus secure for the corporation the benefits of a privilege it does not have."[12] Such a result would effectively permit the corporation to assert on its own behalf the personal privilege of its individual agents.[13]

The respondents press upon us the situation where no one can answer the interrogatories addressed to the corporation without subjecting himself to a "real and appreciable" risk of self-incrimination.[14] For present purposes we may assume that in such a case the appropriate remedy would be a protective order under Rule 30(b), postponing civil discovery until termination of the criminal action.[15] But we need not decide this troublesome question. For the record before us makes clear that even though the respondents had the burden of showing that the Government's interrogatories were improper,[16] they never even asserted, let alone demonstrated, that there was no authorized person who could answer the interrogatories without the possibility of compulsory self-incrimination.[17] To the contrary, the record shows that nobody associated with the corporation asserted his privilege at all. The respondents do not suggest that Feldten, who answered the interrogatories on behalf of the corporation, did so while unrepresented by counsel or without appreciation of the possible consequences. His failure at any time to assert the constitutional privilege leaves him in no position to complain now that he was compelled to give testimony against himself.[18]

Kordel's claim of compulsory self-incrimination is even more tenuous than Feldten's. Not only did Kordel never assert the privilege; he never even answered any interrogatories. The Court of Appeals nevertheless reversed his conviction because it thought it "clear from the record that Detroit Vital Foods, Inc., was merely the corporate device through which Kordel sold his products. The Government naturally wanted to cut through the facade and get to Kordel who was the president and dominant personality in the corporation."[19] We disagree. The Government brought its libel against the goods; the corporation, not Kordel, appeared as claimant. The Government subsequently prosecuted Kordel as an officer of the company. If anyone has sought to cut through the corporate facade so far as the Fifth Amendment privilege is concerned, it is Kordel: he has, in effect, attempted to fashion a self-incrimination claim by combining testimony that he never gave and an assertion of the privilege that he never made with another assertion of the privilege that his company never had.

The Court of Appeals thought that Kordel must go free in any event because the Government had used Feldten's admissions in proving its criminal case against both respondents, in violation of the rule in Bruton v. United States.[20] This too was error. Feldten's admissions were never introduced in evidence at the trial, and thus Kordel cannot maintain that the reception in evidence of a codefendant's inculpatory statements violated his Sixth Amendment right to confrontation.[21]

II

The respondents urge that even if the Government's conduct did not violate their Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination, it nonetheless reflected such unfairness and want of consideration for justice as independently to require the reversal of their convictions. On the record before us, we cannot agree that the respondents have made out either a violation of due process or a departure from proper standards in the administration of justice requiring the exercise of our supervisory power. The public interest in protecting consumers throughout the Nation from misbranded drugs requires prompt action by the agency charged with responsibility for administration of the federal food and drug laws. But a rational decision whether to proceed criminally against those responsible for the misbranding may have to await consideration of a fuller record than that before the agency at the time of the civil seizure of the offending products. It would stultify enforcement of federal law to require a governmental agency such as the FDA invariably to choose either to forgo recommendation of a criminal prosecution once it seeks civil relief, or to defer civil proceedings pending the ultimate outcome of a criminal trial.[22]

We do not deal here with a case where the Government has brought a civil action solely to obtain evidence for its criminal prosecution [23] or has failed to advise the defendant in its civil proceeding that it contemplates his criminal prosecution; [24] nor with a case where the defendant is without counsel [25] or reasonably fears prejudice from adverse pretrial publicity or other unfair injury; [26] nor with any other special circumstances that might suggest the unconstitutionality or even the impropriety of this criminal prosecution.[27]

Overturning these convictions would be tantamount to the adoption of a rule that the Government's use of interrogatories directed against a corporate defendant in the ordinary course of a civil proceeding would always immunize the corporation's officers from subsequent criminal prosecution. The Court of Appeals was correct in stating that "the Government may not use evidence against a defendant in a criminal case which has been coerced from him under penalty of either giving the evidence or suffering a forfeiture of his property." [28] But on this record there was no such violation of the Constitution, and no such departure from the proper administration of criminal justice.

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK did not take part in the decision of this case.

[5] Section 305 of the Act, 21 U.S.C. § 335, provides,

"Before any violation of [the Act] . . . is reported by the Secretary [of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare] to any United States attorney for institution of a criminal proceeding, the person against whom such proceeding is contemplated shall be given appropriate notice and an opportunity to present his views, either orally or in writing, with regard to such contemplated proceeding." Service of the statutory notice did not necessarily mean that a criminal prosecution would follow; the testimony before the District Court on the respondents' pretrial motion to suppress evidence indicated that fewer than 10% of the matters involving a § 305 notice reach the stage of either indictment or information.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Leonard, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. EAGLETON) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations received today, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

COMMUNICATION FROM AN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. EAGLETON) laid before the Senate the following letter, which was referred as indicated:

REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMISSION ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

A letter from the Chairman, Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that Commission, dated January 31, 1970 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

PETITION

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. EAGLETON) laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the City Council of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that the President of the United States use his good offices to protest the mounting rage of indiscriminate terrorism against innocent travelers to Israel, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. YARBOROUGH, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, with amendments:

H.R. 13448. An act to authorize the exchange, upon terms fully protecting the public interest, of the lands and buildings now constituting the U.S. Public Health Service Hospital at New Orleans, La., for lands upon which a new United States Public Health Hospital at New Orleans, La., may be located (Rept. No. 91–746).

By Mr. GOODELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with amendments:

S. 2999. A bill to authorize, in the District of Columbia, the gift of all or part of a human body after death for specified purposes (Rept. No. 91–747).

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DODD:

S. 3621. A bill for the relief of Ana Maria Conceicao; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BENNETT:

S. 3622. A bill for the relief of Robert T. Barnes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and Mr. FANNIN):

S. 3623. A bill to amend title 39 of the United States Code in order to prevent the insulting and profane use of the U.S. mails as a means to distribute unsolicited and unwanted sexually-offensive advertisements; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

(The remarks of Mr. GOLDWATER when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD.)

By Mr. HARRIS (for Mr. HOLLINGS):

S. 3624. A bill to amend title V of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide assistance in the purchase of mobile homes in rural areas; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(The remarks of Mr. HARRIS when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

S. 3623—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL CLAMPING DOWN ON THE SMUT SCOUNDRELS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, it was my hope to appear last Friday before the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service in support of stronger laws against pornography. However, I recognize that all eyes of the Nation were then, and are now, on the mail halt and that members of the committee might well wish to concentrate their attention on this sudden and unfortunate situation whose bounds are not yet known.

Therefore, while I was disappointed that Friday's hearing was canceled, I can appreciate the reasons for the interruption. I will only say that I hope my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Wyoming (Mr. MCGEE) will find it possible to reschedule the postal obscenity hearing in the very near future.

Mr. President, the movement to clean up the mails of the unbelievable filth which is pouring through it is one in which I have joined since first resuming my service in this Chamber last year. I addressed the Senate seven times in the past year on this subject, and during last November and December I was privileged to appear before both the House Subcommittee on Postal Operations and the House Judiciary Committee to urge the adoption of new laws which will crack down on the smut scoundrels who are polluting the Nation's mails.

Mr. President, in connection with the forthcoming hearing by the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I have discovered that the positive, comprehensive proposal drawn up by President Nixon to deal with sexually offensive advertisements has not yet been introduced in bill form on this side of the Hill.

In order to be certain that the administration request will get before the committee once it meets to handle legislation in this field, I have decided to join with my distinguished colleague from Arizona (Mr. FANNIN) in introducing a bill which incorporates the departmental measure.

Since the senior Senator from Arizona (Mr. FANNIN) is a member of that committee, our action will assure that the administration request will be fully discussed and considered within the committee.

Mr. President, the appropriate moment to discuss our measure will be during the upcoming hearing. For now, I would only like to mention that our bill is designed to completely bar the doors to any further use of the U.S. mails as a means to distribute unsolicited and unwanted sexually offensive advertisements.

It will achieve this by permitting any person to place his name, as well as the names of his minor children, on a list of people who desire not to receive sexually oriented advertisements. That list will be maintained by the Postmaster General, but the costs of defraying such list will be borne by the smut peddlers themselves through payment of a service charge.

Every smut dealer will be prohibited from sending his dirty material to any person whose name is on the list.

If he fails to purge his own mailing list of the names of unwilling recipients, our bill provides machinery for both the civil and criminal enforcement of its proscription.

One significant feature of the measure is the authority which it grants the Attorney General to seek temporary restraining orders and preliminary injunctions either before or during the course of judicial enforcement proceedings.

This device could prove to be the means Americans have long been seeking in order to put a halt to the improper operations of smut peddlers immediately, rather than waiting around for them to exhaust a time-consuming flood of legal motions and other technical maneuvers.

Mr. President, the bill which my distinguished colleague from Arizona (Mr. FANNIN) and I have drafted rests on solid constitutional grounds. Since it is founded upon the twin powers of Congress to protect the fundamental personal right to privacy of the American people and their inherent right to raise their children in a wholesome, healthy environment, we have no doubt that the legislation will be upheld when it goes before our judicial brethren.

Finally, I will add that our bill is intended to close up the strange gap which exists in the present postal obscenity laws under which the original source of pornography is left untouched. Oddly enough, under current laws it is only the person who deposits obscene matter in the mails who is caught by the Federal postal regulations.

It is high time that the postal obscenity laws were extended to reach the smut mills that actually produce this garbage as well as the distributor who merely mails it. Our bill will do exactly that.

In short, I believe the bill which we are offering will provide a major and effective new approach to stopping the profane intrusions which now threaten the last preserve of American freedom—the sanctity of American households.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill which is coauthored by the senior Senator from Arizona (Mr. FANNIN) and myself shall be printed in the RECORD at this point, which is the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLE). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3623) to amend title 39 of the United States Code in order to prevent the insulting and profane use of the U.S. mails as a means to distribute unsolicited and unwanted sexually offensive advertisements, introduced by Mr. GOLDWATER, for himself and Mr. FANNIN, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3623

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I—INVASION OF PRIVACY BY MAILING OF SEXUALLY ORIENTED ADVERTISEMENTS

FINDINGS

SEC. 101. (a) The Congress finds—

(1) that the United States mails are being used for the indiscriminate dissemination of advertising matter so designed and so presented as to exploit sexual sensationalism for commercial gain;

(2) that such matter is profoundly shocking and offensive to many persons who receive it, unsolicited, through the mails;

(3) that such use of the mails constitutes a serious threat to the dignity and sanctity of the American home and subjects many persons to an unconscionable and unwarranted intrusion upon their fundamental personal right to privacy;

(4) that such use of the mail reduces the ability of responsible parents to protect their minor children from exposure to material which they as parents believe to be harmful to the normal and healthy ethical, mental, and social development of their children; and

(5) that the traffic in such offensive advertisements is so large that individual citizens will be helpless to protect their privacy or their families without stronger and more effective Federal controls over the mailing of such matter.

(b) On the basis of such findings, the Congress determines that it is contrary to the public policy of the United States for the facilities and services of the United States Post Office Department to be used for the distribution of such materials to persons who do not want their privacy invaded in this manner or to persons who wish to protect their minor children from exposure to such material.

SEXUALLY ORIENTED ADVERTISEMENTS

SEC. 102. (a) Chapter 51 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 4011. Mailing of sexually oriented advertisements

"(a) Any person who mails or causes to be mailed any sexually oriented advertisement shall place on the envelope or cover thereof his name and address as the sender thereof and such mark or notice as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

"(b) Any person, on his own behalf or on the behalf of any of his children who has not attained the age of nineteen years and who resides with him or is under his care, custody or supervision, may file with the Postmaster General a statement, in such form and manner as the Postmaster General may prescribe, that he desires to receive no sexually oriented advertisements through the mails. The Postmaster General shall maintain and keep current, insofar as practicable, a list of the names and addresses of such persons and shall make the list (including portions thereof or changes therein) available to any person, upon such reasonable terms and conditions as he may prescribe, including the payment of such service charge as he determines to be necessary to defray the costs of compiling and maintaining the list and making it available as provided in this sentence. No person shall mail or cause to be mailed any sexually oriented advertisement to any individual whose name and address has been on the list for more than thirty days.

"(c) No person shall sell, lease, lend, exchange, or license the use of, or, except for the purpose expressly authorized by this section, use any mailing list compiled in whole or in part from the list maintained by the Postmaster General pursuant to this section.

"(d) 'Sexually oriented advertisement' means any advertisement that depicts, in actual or simulated form, or explicitly describes, in a predominantly sexual context, human genitalia, any act of natural or unnatural sexual intercourse, any act of sadism or masochism, or any other erotic subject directly related to the foregoing. Material otherwise within the definition of this subsection shall be deemed not to constitute a sexually oriented advertisement if it constitutes only a small and insignificant part of the whole of a single catalogue, book, periodical, or other work the remainder of which is not primarily devoted to sexual matters.

"§ 4012. Judicial enforcement

"(a) Whenever the Postmaster General believes that any person is mailing or causing to be mailed any sexually oriented advertisement in violation of section 4011 of this title, he may request the Attorney General to commence a civil action against such person in a district court of the United States. Upon a finding by the court of a violation of that section, it may issue an order including one or more of the following provisions as the court deems just under the circumstances:

"(1) a direction to the defendant to refrain from mailing any sexually oriented advertisement to a specific addressee, to any group of addressees, or to all persons;

"(2) a direction to any postmaster to whom sexually oriented advertisements originating with such defendant are tendered for transmission through the mails to refuse to accept such advertisements for mailing; and

"(3) a direction to any postmaster at the office at which registered or certified letters or other letters or mail arrive, addressed to the defendant or his representative, to return the registered or certified letters or other letters or mail to the sender appropriately marked as being in response to mail in violation of section 4011 of this title, after the defendant, or his representative, has been notified and given reasonable opportunity to examine such letters or mail and to obtain delivery of mail which is clearly not connected with activity alleged to be in violation of section 4011 of this title.

"(b) The statement that remittances may be made to a person named in a sexually oriented advertisement is prima facie evidence that such named person is the principal, agent, or representative of the mailer for the receipt of remittances on his behalf. The court is not precluded from ascertaining the existence of the agency on the basis of any other evidence.

"(c) In preparation for, or during the pendency of, a civil action under subsection (a) of this section, a district court of the United States, upon application therefor by the Attorney General and upon a showing of probable cause to believe the statute is being violated, may enter a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction containing such terms as the court deems just, including, but not limited to, provisions enjoining the defendant from mailing any sexually oriented advertisement to any person or class of persons, directing any postmaster to refuse to accept such defendant's sexually oriented advertisements for mailing, and directing the detention of the defendant's incoming mail by any postmaster pending the conclusion of the judicial proceedings. Any action taken by a court under this subsection does not affect or determine any fact at issue in any other proceeding under this section.

"(d) A civil action under this section may be brought in the judicial district in which the defendant resides, or has his principal place of business, or in any judicial district in which any sexually oriented advertisement mailed in violation of section 4011 has been delivered by mail according to the direction thereon.

"(e) Nothing in this section or in section 4011 shall be construed as amending, preempting, limiting, modifying, or otherwise in any way affecting section 1461 or 1463 of title 18 or section 4006, 4007, or 4009 of this title."

(b) The table of contents of chapter 51 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new items:

"4011. Mailing of sexually oriented advertisements.
"4012. Judicial enforcement."

CRIMINAL PENALTIES

SEC. 103. (a) Chapter 83 of title 18, United States Code, relating to offenses against the postal service, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 1735. Sexually oriented advertisements

"(a) Whoever—

"(1) willfully uses the mails for the mailing, carriage in the mails, or delivery of any sexually oriented advertisement in violation of section 4011 of title 39, or willfully violates any regulation of the Postmaster General issued under such section; or

"(2) sells, leases, rents, lends, exchanges, or licenses the use of, or, except for the purpose expressly authorized by section 4011 of title 39, uses a mailing list maintained by the Postmaster General pursuant to such section; shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, for the first offense, and shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both, for any second or subsequent offense.

"(b) For the purposes of this section, the term 'sexually oriented advertisement' shall have the same meaning as given it in section 4011(d) of title 39.

"§ 1736. Restrictive use of information

"(a) No information or evidence obtained by reason of compliance by a natural person with any provision of section 4011 of title 39, or regulations issued thereunder, shall, except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, be used, directly or indirectly, as evidence against that person in a criminal proceeding.

"(b) The fact of the performance of any act by an individual in compliance with any provision of section 4011 of title 39, or regulations issued thereunder, shall not be deemed the admission of any fact, or otherwise be used, directly or indirectly, as evidence against that person in a criminal proceeding, except as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

"(c) Subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall not preclude the use of any such information or evidence in a prosecution or other action under any applicable provision of law with respect to the furnishing of false information."

(b) The table of contents of chapter 83 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new items:

"1735. Sexually oriented advertisements.
"1736. Restrictive use of information."

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 104. If any provision of this title, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of this title and the application of such provision to other persons not similarly situated or to other circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 105. The provisions of this title shall become effective on the first day of the sixth month which begins after the date of enactment.

TITLE II—EXTENDING POSTAL OBSCENITY LAWS TO MAKER OF SEXUALLY RELATED MAIL MATTER

Sec. 201. (a) Chapter 83 of title 18, United States Code, relating to offenses against the postal service, is amended by further adding at the end thereof the following new section:

§ 1737. Manufacturer of sexually related mail matter

"(a) Whoever shall print, reproduce, or manufacture any sexually related mail matter, intending or knowing that such matter will be deposited for mailing or delivery by mail in violation of section 4009 or 4011 of title 39, United States Code, or in violation of any regulation of the Postmaster General issued under such section, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, for the first offense, and shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years or both, for any second or subsequent offense.

"(b) As used in this section, the term 'sexually related mail matter' means any matter which is within the scope of section 4009(a) or 4011(d) of title 39, United States Code."

(b) The table of contents of such chapter 83 is amended by adding at the end thereof—

"1737. Manufacturer of sexually related mail matter."

S. 3624—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO PROVIDE ASSISTANCE IN THE PURCHASE OF MOBILE HOMES IN RURAL AREAS

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, for the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), I introduce a bill to amend title V of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide assistance in the purchase of mobile homes in rural areas, and ask unanimous consent that the bill and statement by the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLE). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3624) to amend title V of the Housing Act of 1949 to provide assistance in the purchase of mobile homes in rural areas, introduced by Mr. HARRIS, for Mr. HOLLINGS, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3624

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Title V of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding a new section as follows:

MOBILE HOMES

"SEC. 524. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other section of this title, the term "housing" as used in this title shall, to the extent deemed practicable by the Secretary, include mobile homes; Provided, That the Secretary is hereby authorized and directed, with respect to mobile homes financed under this title to (1) prescribe minimum property standards to assure the livability and durability of the mobile home and the suitability of the site on which the mobile home is to be located, and (2) obtain assurance from the borrower that the mobile home will be placed on a site which complies with the standards prescribed by the Secretary and other applicable local requirements.

"(b) Loans for the purchase of mobile homes shall be on such terms and conditions and in such amounts as the Secretary deems necessary, subject to the following limitations:

"(1) there is reasonable assurance of repayment of the loan;

"(2) the amount of the loan may not exceed $10,000;

"(3) the loan bears interest at a rate determined by the Secretary, not to exceed the maximum rate provided in Title I of the National Housing Act: Provided, That with respect to low and moderate income families otherwise eligible for assistance under section 521 of this title, the rate shall not exceed the rate for housing required pursuant to section 521; and

"(4) the loan is repayable within not more than twelve years and thirty-two days."

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HOLLINGS

Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill which will provide a change in Title 5 of the Housing Act of 1949 to permit the term "housing" to include a definition of mobile homes which will provide assistance in the purchase of mobile homes in rural areas. Presently, FHA programs regarding mobile homes are basically urban oriented. On July 31, 1969 I introduced a bill which would permit the Federal Housing Administration to insure loans financing the purchase of mobile homes to be used by the purchaser as his principal residence. During the debate on the floor of S. 2864, the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1969, I offered my bill as an amendment which was accepted by the Senate and is presently part of P.L. 91–152. The proposal I offer today would revise existing law to permit the Farmers Home Administration to finance mobile homes comparable to the conditions set forth in my previous bill, but with the major difference that they would be available for housing in rural non-farm areas and farm areas. This would include areas of up to 5500 persons or less.

In my judgment, Mr. President, the mobile home offers a low-cost form of housing desperately needed by our population. James Smith, Administrator of the Farmers Home Administration, stated on February 7 before the House Banking and Currency Committee that there were approximately five million homes in rural non-farm areas which were deteriorating, substandard or in need of major repairs. Because the impact of inflation has particularly hurt the residents in rural America, I feel this bill will provide a manner in which they can obtain adequate and standard housing within their financial means.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILLS

S. 1290

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the names of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) and the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. McINTYRE) be added as cosponsors of S. 1290, a bill to incorporate the College Benefit System of America.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. EAGLETON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 3425

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON) be added as a cosponsor of S. 3425, to amend the Wagner-O'Day Act to extend the provisions thereof to severely handicapped individuals who are not blind, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 3466 THROUGH S. 3472

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT), I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HRUSKA) be added as a cosponsor of S. 3466 through S. 3472, the environmental control bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, Mr. BAYH). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS OF SENATORS AS IN LEGISLATIVE SESSION

REMARKS OF SENATOR McCLELLAN BEFORE NATIONAL RIVERS AND HARBORS CONGRESS

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the National Rivers and Harbors Congress held its 57th annual convention banquet at the Mayflower Hotel last Thursday night.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN, of Arkansas, was the principal speaker for this occasion. Senator MCCLELLAN, president of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress for 10 years, now serves as chairman emeritus of the organization. He also is a past president of the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Association.

Senator MCCLELLAN's address to the congress was most timely in view of today's concern over our environmental conditions. His message was most informative, and I commend it to every Member of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM REMARKS OF SENATOR JOHN L. MCCLELLAN

Mr. Chairman, water is one of the four major and indispensable elements of man's environment. From the time God decreed that the water under the heaven should be gathered together and called the Seas, man has shown an exceptional ambivalence towards this most precious life-sustaining natural resource.

He has blessed the rain when it drenched the parched earth and quenched nature's thirst; and he has cursed it when its raging torrents and catastrophic floods have cleaved paths of destruction and devastation.

Man has stored and hoarded water to generate hydroelectric power, to irrigate the soil, to preserve wildlife and to provide recreation. He has wasted it in arid areas by not retaining and conserving it for use in times of draught and need—and has often squandered it by not profitably re-using it.

Man has consecrated and sanctified water in the ordinance of baptism, but too often he neglects and rejects the use and consumption of the proper quantity that is necessary for his own good health and physical well being.

He has abused and polluted many lakes, rivers, and harbors by allowing them to become contaminated repositories for every conceivable kind of waste and decay.

Indeed, with respect to the abundant water resources with which our nation is so richly endowed, we find that, as a people, we have in some areas exercised the highest and best in vision and wisdom; and in other areas, we have exhibited the worst in practice and habit.

The "best" is demonstrated by the marvelous multiple-purpose improvements we have made on many of our major streams for flood control, hydroelectric power, recreation, irrigation, and navigation. The "worst" is evidenced by the reckless neglect and abuses that have contaminated and polluted our rivers and lakes, particularly in metropolitan areas, with waste, filth, and sewage which now stigmatizes so many of our congested industrial and crowded centers of population.

* * * * *

Today, when we are engaged in an unpopular war—incidentally, a war we have not tried to win—a war which is requiring expenditures of more than $25 billion annually and which has already cost us in excess of $100 billion, our Government is spending only a fraction of that amount to preserve and develop for the accommodation of our rapidly increasing population the vital water resources of our land. (The Vietnam War from 1966 to 1970 has cost $106.2 billion. Whereas, construction funds appropriated for rivers, harbors, and flood control in that same period of time was only $4.4 billion or 4 percent of the cost of the Vietnam War. For a whole decade of the sixties, our Federal Government spent only $8.5 billion for construction of river and harbor projects.) Thus, it is apparent that man's ambivalent attitude has contributed mightily towards the contamination and deterioration of this basic and indispensable natural resource.

With clean water so vital to man's sheer survival and with the great bulk of both international and domestic commerce dependent upon water transportation, one would think that the development and preservation of our national water resources would be assured; that its quality would be guaranteed and that its value would now in this enlightened age be enshrined in the hearts of mankind.

Our water transportation carries more than 25 percent of the goods moving in domestic commerce. This is second only to the railroads which carry 36.5 percent of our domestic commerce. And while the exact figures are not available, we know that probably ¾'s or more of our international commerce is carried on ships that traverse the seas.

It seems, therefore, incongruous that our Federal water projects are generally heavily saddled with stringent, precise—and often unrealistic—mathematical formulas and requirements to assay and justify the benefits of our river and harbor development programs before they can be authorized and before even usually inadequate appropriations are begrudgingly and stingily made for their construction.

Indeed, water improvement projects are unique among Federal programs in that regard. We have spent nearly $150 billion in foreign aid—in the past quarter of a century—and billions more on domestic programs that were hastily conceived, ill prepared and poorly implemented in pursuit of vague and illusionary objectives. However laudatory the goals in these programs may have been, many have completely failed of achievement; others at best have been greatly disappointing. Ironically, none of these were subjected to the preliminary surveys and appraisals nor to the rigorous standards that are imposed on our river and harbor projects.

So varied and abundant are the benefits derived from investments in river and harbor projects, however, that we have been able to meet the test and live with those standards, and still see our mighty waterways developed. These developments have resulted in lands being reclaimed and irrigated, in hydroelectric power being generated and in bringing flood control protection to our major valleys. The bountiful harvests reaped from these improvements have greatly surpassed all original estimates and expectations.

One of the most rewarding aspects of my three decades of service in the National Congress has been my labors in the vineyard of water resource development. I share with your organization, and with you, a real sense of pride and accomplishment with the construction of each new project. And, especially, am I proud of the tremendous, although belated, progress that we have made in Arkansas.

I have a personal interest in the Arkansas River Development Program which I co-authored and which is now nearing completion. Indeed, that one project alone, in my state, stands as a monumental re-affirmation of the great progress that can be made with the pursuit and implementation of these programs.

Construction did not begin on the Arkansas River Program until 1958. The first section of river navigation—to Little Rock—opened a decade later in December of 1968—and the second section—navigation on to Fort Smith—opened a year later in December, 1969. The third and final section of this 450-mile inland navigation project is scheduled for completion to Tulsa, Oklahoma, in early 1970.

This magnificent mulple-purpose project which was frequently condemned and ridiculed by many in the early stages of its conception and development has converted 450 miles of a flood-plagued river into a controlled navigable, inland waterway system that will connect Tulsa, Fort Smith, Little Rock, and Pine Bluff and give that area an outlet to all inland ports of the United States and to the ocean ports of the world.

This Arkansas project to me is symbolic of the cooperation and dedication of yours and of similar organizations working closely with the Congress, the Executive Branch, and especially with the Corps of Engineers. By reason of this vast development, the Arkansas River Valley is already experiencing tremendous industrial growth and expansion and the amount of cargo that has been generated on this system to date has equalled three times the original estimate.

It is now predicted that during the last thirty years of this century, an additional 100 million Americans will inhabit the United States. To accommodate this additional number of people in so short a time will require intensive planning and action on a massive scale. Hundreds of new towns will be needed, and water problems, already verging on the critical stage—in many areas—will become more and more acute unless we do what is necessary to conserve our abundant water resources and to restore to good quality, where possible, the polluted waters of the major streams in our nation.

The path leading to our present day economic affluence and over crowded metropolitan cities has been strewn with litter and beclouded by pollution. So much so that many scientists are today prophesying doom unless we launch an immediate and massive campaign to clear our air, clean our streams, and intelligently handle the gigantic waste created by our industrial economy and affluent society.

Certainly, when our main cities, those shining citadels of yester-year, are shrouded in suffocating smog, when life-giving streams are choked with raw sewage, chemicals and debris, and the truck gardens that used to surround our towns are today's garbage dumps, it is time to act to save and protect our environment. It somehow seems ironic for us to reach to the stars and ignore the deteriorating life-supporting elements of our planet.

For years, many have labored under a false illusion that there is an over abundance of water in our country. But we know that is not true. Your organization is well aware of the old adage that "the waste of plenty is the resource of scarcity". Unless we conserve and keep clean our fresh water supply, we may find before the end of the century that we have a "resource of scarcity".

* * * * *

The Congress and the President are becoming committed to a number of programs to improve our environment. I wholeheartedly support the general objective of all such programs. But, at the same time, I have urged the Administration to launch an immediate campaign aimed at preventing further crowding and congestion in our major cities which are today the prime centers of pollution. This can be done by reversing present trends and stopping the massive influx of people into the already overly-populated metropolitan areas.

We should take all practical steps possible to halt the sprawling, haphazard, and often unmanageable growth of urban areas and give them—and especially our decaying inner cities—time to restructure and clean up. At the same time, we should be making every effort to develop the potential of our rural areas. A national policy to achieve these objectives should be adopted and properly promoted and supported, would:

1. Ease the proliferating population growth in the main centers of congestion and pollution;

2. Relieve the major metropolitan areas of their growing pains and pressures; and

3. Afford an opportunity for sustained, orderly, growth in rural areas for present and future generations.

We stand on the threshold of the seventies. We must look beyond this decade and the next and adopt policies and inaugurate programs that will exalt our water resources and not exploit them. We know that a population crisis is coming. Let us prepare to meet it by decentralizing industry and by creating job opportunities for our people in environments that are not already overcrowded, congested and polluted. Let us be prudent and make adequate provisions to orderly accommodate the additional 100 million Americans who are expected by the end of this century. We can, if we will, insure them an environment in and near the smaller cities of our nation that will be conducive to good health and pleasant living. Thus, they will not have to become numberless, faceless members of a collective group in the environs of an air and water polluted, transportation congested metropolitan conglomerate.

THE HARD WORK OF ENVIRONMENT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR MUSKIE

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE) is the leading Senate expert on pollution problems as chairman of the Air and Water Pollution Subcommittee.

In his remarks at the University of Michigan Environmental Teach-In March 13, the Senator outlined the philosophical and political background of today's earth crisis. And he again suggested a National Survival Corps for youthful activities to do the "hard work of environment."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. MUSKIE's Michigan speech be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEALING WITH THE ROOTS OF THE CRISIS

(Remarks by U.S. Senator EDMUND S. MUSKIE)

"Every individual carries a set of about a hundred thousand genes—an inheritance

he has received from all the living beings who preceded him and concentrated their qualities in him. That is the heritage he will pass on. If all the genes from the world's three and a half billion people were baked together, they would form a small ball with a diameter of about one millimeter. The contents of this small ball is what holds us together as a species, and is, essentially, all we own as human beings."

We do not own very much, and we are spread quite thin. All of what we own—our total environment of human and natural resources—is stretched around the earth no thicker than the skin around an apple. Any scar, any scratch, any nick can be fatal.

This is all we have. There are no replacements, no surplus stocks with which to replenish our supplies. We hang together by tenuous bonds that are now strained as they have never been strained before—and as they never must be strained again. We live in a world of limited natural resources and fragile human resources, and we cannot survive an undeclared war on our future. We must lay down all of our weapons of self-annihilation.

THE ROOTS OF THE CRISIS

The Teach-In this evening has focused on the roots of the environmental crisis. This is important, because unless we understand what has brought us to this confrontation with our future, we will continue to make the same mistakes we have made in the past. We can no longer afford the luxury of environmental error.

The roots of the environmental crisis stretch as far back as the nation itself. Life in America was cheap in the beginning. Natural resources were plentiful, and the idea that there had to be limits on our material growth never entered our minds.

Thus, early farming paid scant attention to conserving the land that produced the crops. We took trees from the forests without thinking of the possibility that our timber supply was not endless. Soon after industry first came to America, some of our rivers were seriously polluted and the air in some of our cities and towns was foul.

Even while our cities grew and became more crowded, enough Americans could escape from the confines of soot and clutter so that the voices of those who were trapped were never really heard.

As long as there was enough affluence in city, the squalor of the tenements was obscured. As long as people left the slums, they forgot their misery.

And when people left the urban-industrial center, what did they leave behind? True, they escaped from foul air, dirty water, and littered and noisy streets. But they also escaped from the tenements, the disease, the ugliness, and the poverty of the city.

So pollution was isolated by the very size and openness of America. A river here, a forest there, a few of our larger, more industrialized cities—these early examples of environmental destruction seemed a small price to pay for our prosperity. Most people could escape, and those who could not were never really heard. This was the frontier ethic: America pushing ahead and getting ahead, with an unlimited future—with a manifest destiny ahead of us.

Now we find that we have overreached our destiny. The frontier ethic helped us build the strongest nation in the world. But it also led us to believe that our natural and human resources were endless, that our rivers could absorb as much sewage as we could pour in them, that there was automatic equal opportunity for everyone, that our air would always be clean, and that hunger and poverty didn't really exist in America.

Our problems are not really new. Rather, they have multiplied. They have spread to all our rivers and all our cities. Everyone is affected by them.

The frontier ethic that we never really abandoned has caught up with us. There is nowhere left for escape.

We have reached a point where man, his environment, and his industrial technology intersect. We confront our deteriorated environment, our devouring technology and our fellow men. Relative harmony has become a three-cornered war—a war where everyone loses.

No society has ever reached this point before, no society has ever solved this problem. We have no past experience to guide us.

So we will need all the enthusiasm, all the concern, and all the dedication we can muster. At the same time there are some dangers involved in this surge of concern.

THE TOTAL HUMAN ENVIRONMENT

I hope that the issue of environmental protection does not become a smokescreen that will obscure the overall crisis of life in America.

I am concerned that the environment will obscure the unmet challenge of equal opportunity, and there appears to be good cause for concern.

The great danger of the environmental issue is that we may not recognize that the total environment is at stake in America.

Whatever form your efforts take after Earth Day, the focus of your efforts must be man—man today, man tomorrow, and man in relation to all the other forms of life which share our biosphere. And in addition to the air, the water, and the land, man's environment includes the shape of the communities in which he lives, his home, his schools, his places of work, and his society.

The environmental conscience that has gripped the nation should hold great promise—not only for our air, our water and our land, but also for the future of people searching for ways out of poverty, hunger and neglect. The environmental conscience may be the way to turn the nation around.

The study of ecology—man's relationship with his environment—should finally teach us that our relationships with each other are just as intricate and just as delicate as those with our natural environment. We cannot afford to correct our history of abusing nature and neglect the continuing abuse of our fellow man.

We should have learned by this time in our development as a nation that we must find ways to live together in peace. And we should have learned that the only way to achieve peace among ourselves is to insure that all Americans have equal access to a healthy environment—to a healthy total environment.

That can mean nothing less than equal access to good schools for our children, to meaningful job opportunities, to adequate medical care, and to decent housing.

For the last ten years we have been groping toward the realization that the total environment is at stake.

We have seen the destruction of poverty, and declared a war on it.

We have seen the ravages of hunger, and declared a war on it.

We have seen the costs of crime, and declared a war on it.

And now we have awakened to the pollution of our environment, and we have declared another war.

We have fought too many losing battles in those wars to continue this piece-meal approach to self-preservation.

The only strategy that makes sense is a total strategy to protect the total environment.

We must do it now—not when inflation eases, not in a few years, not sometime soon, but now. For the sake of the environment if nothing else, we ought to find it possible to put-off grand tours of space, faster planes, and greater overkill.

This will not be merely a summertime war. The protection of our environment will be a long, hard pull. The action you take as students, will be important, but the greatest challenges will come when you assume your roles in the communities of the future.

We must forge a wholesale change in our priorities and our values. We must redefine our standard of living, reflecting the knowledge that both our human and natural resources are at stake.

This will not be easy. Walter Lippmann stated the problem very well when he said that "The supreme question before mankind . . . is how men will be able to make themselves willing and able to save themselves."

We must turn away from uncontrolled economic and technological growth that ignores the increasing strain on the environment. As we seek to control this growth, the kinds of difficult decisions you will have to make will be surprising. As community leaders—and as students—you must see that the right decisions are made.

Our technology has reached a point in its development where it is producing more than we want, more than we need, and more than we can live with.

We have to learn to choose, to say no, and to give up some luxuries. These kinds of decisions are the acid test of our commitment to a healthy environment. Right now we are failing that test.

Look at the budget for 1971. That "balanced budget" represents shamefully unbalanced priorities. That budget "balances" $275 million for the SST against $106 million for air pollution control. It "balances" $3.4 billion for the space program against $1.4 billion for housing. And it "balances" $7.3 billion for arms research and development against $1.4 billion for higher education.

It is a sham to say that we cannot afford the protection of our environment—just yet; or the fight against hunger and poverty—at this time; or homes and medical care for our people—for a few years. We can afford these programs now, if we admit that there are less important programs that we cannot afford.

These are the kinds of choices that have to be reversed. If they are not reversed, our concern and rhetoric will mean nothing.

There are other decisions that must be made, and they are ones in which students should take a hand.

POLITICAL ACTION

First, concerned students should take advantage of the laws that are now on the books. While we have accumulated and inherited most of our environmental problems, we have also accumulated some legislation.

The laws are not now as strong as we would like, but they provide an important start. The Air and Water Quality Acts were passed before the environmental crisis was universally recognized. In the hope that the public would become concerned, we sought to guarantee the right of the public to effective participation in the standards-setting process.

Water and Air Quality standards are being set in the States now. These standards and the implementation and enforcement plans must comply with criteria issued by the Federal Government. But they are set at the State level so that the public can participate. The public can decide what kind of air and water they want and how they want to achieve it.

If the opportunity for influencing these decisions is abdicated on a "let George-do-it-basis," then this procedure will fail. On the other hand, if students and other concerned citizens seize these opportunities, we can have tough, effective Air and Water Quality standards.

These provisions for public participation are the greatest promise for clean air and water we have, and we intend to build on them.

Once Air and Water Quality standards are set, they must be enforced. I have suggested amending both the Air and Water Quality Acts so that citizens can bring class suits to enforce these standards, extending the concept of public participation to the enforcement process. But the primary responsibility for enforcement will rest with the State agencies. These agencies should be reminded—over and over again—that standards must be enforced.

You must take your campaign where most of the important battles are fought—to the State and local levels.

Too many people, for too long, have assumed that participating in a democracy begins and ends at the ballot box. State and local agences charged with the protection of the environment have functioned in the abyss of public neglect. Those who have been able to afford constant representation in legislative lobbies and in City Halls have dominated the decision-making process—often only because of their constant presence.

The public has abdicated civil responsibility, and the result has been devastating. It could worsen. If we destroy our environment through public neglect of the political process, we will have only ourselves to blame. The public must combine the power of voices, votes and pocketbooks to make its presence felt.

CITIZEN'S LOBBY

I hope that all of you who have participated in the Teach-In will move beyond these demonstrations of concern to continuing political involvement.

A Citizen's Lobby for Environmental Protection would be an excellent way to do it.

A Citizen's Lobby could voice effective demands for tough legislation. It could support candidates for public office who have shown a continuing commitment to strong environmental legislation. And it could bring pressure to bear to spend the money that must be spent.

At the same time, a Citizen's Lobby could keep a watchful eye on industry. Selective purchasing policies may be a means to discourage the use of non-degradable packaging, non-return bottles, or phosphate-heavy detergents. These policies would also encourage industries to install the best possible pollution control equipment.

Student members of Lobby could use employment interviews as an opportunity to question the interviewer about his industry's commitment to environmental quality.

The creation of a successful Citizen's Lobby will not be easy, but Earth Day could be an important first step. Government and industry will respond to the concern expressed here this week and all across the nation next month only if your voices and your power are directed at the political process.

EDUCATION

Everyone must be brought into the act to protect the environment. The educational task will be enormous.

We must create new values for life in a kind of world that man has never known—a world of increasingly delicate balances between man and his environment.

The University of Michigan and a few other colleges and universities have developed comprehensive programs of environmental and ecological studies, but there is much more that we can and should do.

First, we should broaden the mission of our land-grant Universities. We must move from a production-oriented educational system to a system designed to preserve a balanced and healthy environment. Our universities must reach out to the people of their States with programs of environmental extension services.

Second, we should develop a system of National Environmental Laboratories to explore the effects of technology and growth on the human and natural environments.

Finally, Teach-Ins must become Teach-Outs. The urgent message you are developing this week at the University of Michigan must be taken to the people of the whole State of Michigan in the coming months and years.

NATIONAL SURVIVAL CORPS

While we educate, we must also act. The energies and commitment of young people who want to do something should not be lost because there is nothing to do but talk.

Pollution emission sources must be monitored; waste treatment plants must be built and operated; debris must be cleared from our cities, our parks, and our waterways. This is the hard work of environmental protection.

If young people are willing to do this work, then there should be a way to do it. I would suggest the creation of a National Survival Corps for this purpose, and plan to introduce legislation in the Senate to establish it. The Corps could work on Federal projects and lands, reclaiming mines and forests and performing emergency tasks such as oil-spill clean up. At the same time, members of the Corps would be available to States and cities for similar purposes.

This suggestion is an example of the flood of ideas engendered by this sense of urgency. I thought the National Survival Corps was a good idea. Then Secretary Hickel voiced a similar thought. I still think I have a good idea!

However we fight this battle for survival, man must learn to live with his environment and with himself. This is a very small world, and it is crowded. We have little time to learn what we should have been learning for thousands of years.

The Santa Barbara Declaration of Environmental Rights put this thought very well. "Today is the first day of the rest of our life on this planet. We will begin anew."

We cannot really begin anew because we cannot recreate the earth. But we can protect and enhance what we have left. It is about time man learn to appreciate what he has been given.

THE "CARVEYOR" SYSTEM OF MOVING SIDEWALKS AND RAMPS

Mr. SAXBE. Mr. President, an Ohio-based firm recently introduced a pollution-free urban transportation system which utilizes moving sidewalks and ramps plus small passenger cars riding on a series of conveyor belts. Because of the moving ramps and sidewalks, it can be used by 100 percent of the traveling public, including those who are handicapped and unable to use escalators.

The "Carveyor" system, developed by the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., of Akron, Ohio, without the aid of tax moneys or grants, was featured in Washington last month during National Engineers' Week. A working model was on display at George Washington University.

Because it represents one answer to our problem in downtown traffic congestion, automobile pollution, and pedestrian travel in cities and at airports, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD newspaper articles about this transportation system published in the Wall Street Journal, the Washington Daily News, and the Dayton, Ohio, Journal Herald.

There being no objection the items were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 24, 1970]

GOODYEAR UNVEILS PLAN FOR "WAITLESS" URBAN TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM; SAN JOSE, CALIF., TO BE SITE FOR "CARVEYOR," WHICH CAN HANDLE UP TO 22,000 PEOPLE AN HOUR

AKRON.—Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. unveiled plans for a "waitless" urban transportation system it said could solve traffic problems in urban and congested areas, and later announced that the City of San Jose, Calif., plans to install one of the new systems.

Called "Carveyor," Goodyear's system consists of small, wheel-less cars propelled by a continuously moving network of conveyor belts. Goodyear said the system can handle up to 22,000 people an hour at speeds of up to 15 m.p.h.

In San Jose, Olney G. Smith, executive director of the city's redevelopment agency, said construction would begin in 1972 on a six-mile Carveyor system. Cost of the San Jose system wasn't disclosed, but Goodyear said the system's basic cost runs from $5 million to $7 million a mile, indicating a cost of from $30 million to $42 million for the San Jose system.

Mr. Smith said the first phase of San Jose's system will link a perimeter area with the city's San Antonio Plaza and Park Center redevelopment project in the downtown area. Goodyear said its system is primarily designed for such locations and for use between airport terminals, boarding areas and parking lots, but also can be employed at such other sites as suburban shopping centers and athletic stadiums.

Robert E. Mercer, general manager of Goodyear's Industrial Products division, said the company also is negotiating with one other city and "hopes to make an announcement about that city shortly." The executive added that Goodyear is prepared to begin production immediately.

The Carveyor system, which Goodyear says is unique among the urban "people-movers" currently being developed by industry, eliminates stop-and-start aspects of mass transit. In stations, the passenger cars move at 1.5 miles per hour, with passengers entering from a "moving sidewalk" conveyor belt running alongside the cars at the same speed. After leaving the station, faster-moving belts accelerate the cars to a speed of 15 miles per hour.

THE IVORY TOWER

(By Charles T. Alexander)

Just after the "Ivory Tower" on mass transit appeared the other day, I spotted a story in the Wall Street Journal about a "Carveyor" system, developed by Goodyear, which essentially carries out a principle I was suggesting.

Wheelless cars about the size of limousines operate on a continuous network of conveyor belts. They can handle up to 22,000 passengers an hour at speeds up to 15 or 20 miles per hour.

I was intrigued by the story, so I got on the phone to R. E. Pauley, assistant to the general manager, Industrial Products Division of Goodyear. Now Mr. Pauley is a dynamo who's really got the bug.

I posed a question about the system, and he grabbed the ball. "We're ready to go. We're not fooling," he quickly assured me.

He went on to talk of studies of transit and studies of studies and said they weren't for Goodyear. "It won't take us millions of dollars and years of research and development. We've got something here that's ready to go right now."

The "Carveyor" system is not of the magnitude I was discussing last week. It is not, in its present form, practicable for a system that runs more than three or four miles, and it must be a closed system—that is, it must have no end. It can be a square, a figure eight, or whatever, but the end and the beginning must be joined. Goodyear sees it as ideal for linking parking facilities with stores and hotels several blocks distant, or for moving passengers within a central shopping district.

It is an elevated system 10 or 11 feet above the ground which carries completely enclosed small cars. They run continuously and whenever you want to get on one, it's there. As Mr. Pauley says, "If you miss the 5:18 you take the 5:18" because it's a continuous chain.

The cars are individually heated and air-conditioned, have molded seats—"so that vandals can't carve them up"—and the entire system costs $3 million to $5 million per lineal mile to construct. The network could be designed to move cargo in off-hours if that were desired, he said.

The City of San Jose, Calif., has plans to install a six-mile system, beginning in 1972. Closer to home, Mr. Pauley says that Goodyear made a presentation just last week "to the people who are tearing down the old Deshler-Wallick hotel to run a system from the hotel site across from the Statehouse at Broad and High two miles across the river to a parking facility.

It would take about two minutes from the parking site back to the square. "You can't walk, run, or drive and make that trip in less time," Mr. Pauley said, noting that an auto could go faster, but not likely in that downtown Columbus traffic.

Goodyear doesn't think the "Carveyor" is practical for runs under 1,000 feet. "We've got moving sidewalks for that distance," Mr. Pauley said.

I gave Mr. Pauley an opening to project that in the future such a system might be expanded so that it would operate over longer distances. I was thinking of from one end of the town to the other. But he put me down on that one. He has a specific system to sell, he's sold on its use in the here and now with the capacity it currently offers, and he's not going to go beyond that.

It set me to thinking, however. The center city concept puts a transportation center somewhere down Main Street near Sixth, on which Union Station now is. All forms of transportation—intercity rail, rapid transit (some perhaps over present tracks from the suburbs), buses would all converge in one multilevel terminal. There would also be parking for autos, as I recall. Now suppose you got off your train and walked across the terminal and stepped directly onto a "Carveyor,"—no waiting, Mr. Pauley would remind us—and within less than five minutes you would be at your place of business or the store where you want to shop or the restaurant where you want to eat. Or at a theater. And you get there out of the weather in heated or air-conditioned comfort.

I repeat what I said last week: Dayton's limping transportation system may be its greatest asset for the moment because it offers the opportunity to turn away from conventional methods if something better comes along.

Whether or not the "Carveyor" is a partial answer, it proves that there are minds and dollars at work looking for better, more convenient methods of moving people and things about. And a city on the move has to keep people on the move or they'll move elsewhere.

[From the Washington Daily News, Mar. 2, 1970]

CARVEYOR COULD BE USED HERE

(By Donald Saltz)

If the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co. can do enough of a selling job, a number of cities—perhaps even Washington—will have a unique system for moving people short distances—quickly and easily. Goodyear recently announced—displaying a model at George Washington University last week during National Engineers Week—a Carveyor, or large conveyor belt with cars for people which eliminates a need for auto or bus traffic in places where mass movement is necessary.

The Carveyor system, which stemmed from Goodyear's 57 years of experience in conveyor belt manufacturing, starts off with a moving sidewalk—but one moving only 1½ miles an hour or half normal walking speed—and goes from there to glass-enclosed cabs seating from two to 10 persons each or more, moving along over the belt to the next station, usually half a mile or so away.

BUSINESS DISTRICT

Paul Freitag, Goodyear's chief salesman for the concept, said it can be used with success in central business districts, at major activity centers such as around auditoriums, and for airport terminals. It may also find use near large shopping centers.

Already, officials of San Jose, Calif., and Columbus, Ohio, are seriously investigating the plan which, Mr. Freitag noted, would cost only $3.46 an hour for power to move 3,500 persons in four-seat cars in Columbus, or less than the usual hourly wage for a bus driver.

"The real advantage to the Carveyor," Mr. Freitag said, "is the immediate service—there's no waiting."

Persons walk onto the moving sidewalk and simply enter a car which is moving alongside at comparable speed. Within 20 or 30 seconds, the cars leave the station and within 72 feet accelerate from 1½ to 15 miles an hour.

Mr. Freitag thinks the system can be successfully utilized at parking areas on the fringe of cities' downtown. He said the most practical systems would probably be two to four miles long, but they can be under, on, or above ground. Cost is $5 million to $7 million per mile.

SUBWAY AIDE

"It can also serve as a distribution system for a subway," he said, bringing people quickly from parking or living areas to nearby subway stations.

When the wheelless cars reach their top speed of 15 miles an hour, they are 90 feet apart. A bank of accelerator wheels increases their speed as they leave a station; similarly, a bank of decelerator wheels slows them down as they enter bumper-to-bumper.

Maintenance is an advantage, Mr. Freitag said. He said a system can be operated by two or three employes per shift with the cost of maintenance only 1½ to 2 per cent of the total cost. Weather doesn't affect operations as the conveyor belt is self-cleaning.

The systems, he said, would be monitored by close-circuit television during the length of the ride.

Operating at peak efficiency, the Carveyor plan could move 22,000 persons thru a given point in an hour, Mr. Freitag stated.

THE ODER-NEISSE QUESTION: THE IMPORTANCE OF REMOVING UNNECESSARY IRRITANTS

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, according to an article in last week's issue of Newsweek, the recognition of Poland's claim to the Oder-Neisse territories, which it acquired from Germany after World War II, is the one issue on which Communist and Catholics in Poland are passionately united.

From numerous conversations with Poles in this country, I believe this estimate to be correct.

The Newsweek article further makes the point that it would enormously strengthen the position of Communist Party Boss Wlasdyslaw Gomulka if he can claim personal credit for obtaining Western recognition of the Oder-Neisse frontier, for this would enable him to usurp the mantle of protector of the Polish people.

I believe that this article points to the need for a frank reassessment of the Western position on the tortured question of the Oder-Neisse frontier.

As Senators know, I have never suffered from any illusions about Communist intentions. Indeed, I have more than once taken the floor to urge that Communist protestations of their desire for a detente be examined in the light of their overall record.

But in denying the actual existence of the so-called detente, I have made it clear that I was not opposed to a detente in principle. If peace is to be preserved, then we are going to have to do our utmost, despite all the difficulties and all the frustrations, to bring about a genuine relaxation of tensions between East and West.

In line with this approach, I believe that it is proper for the Western nations to seek to remove meaningless irritants to East-West relations, where such irritants exist.

The so-called Oder-Neisse problem is one such irritant.

I think a tribute is due to Chancellor Willy Brandt for the effort he has been making over the past 2 years to put to rest the uneasiness and suspicions engendered by the Oder-Neisse problem.

The Oder-Neisse problem had its genesis in the negotiations between the allies which preceded the end of World War II. At the Potsdam Conference, an agreement was reached that the future frontiers between Germany and Poland should follow the line of the Oder and Neisse Rivers.

The Poles have been blamed for the mass expulsions of the German population from the territory east of the Oder-Neisse line.

I do not like mass expulsions, nor would I attempt to condone them.

But before blame is cast it would be well to remember the terrible suffering which the Polish people endured at the hands of the Germans during World War II, and all the reasons they had for resentment.

Against this background of suffering, it would have been difficult to expect the Poles to behave with tenderness toward their former conquerors.

Before blame is cast, too, it would be well to remember that at Potsdam the Western Allies joined the Soviet Union in recommending to the Polish Government that the German population east of the Oder-Neisse line be transferred to the occupation zones of Germany. If there is blame, therefore, Britain and the United States must share it equally with the Governments of the Soviet Union and Poland.

The formal position of the Western Allies and of the Federal German Republic today is that the Oder-Neisse line cannot legally be recognized as the final frontier between Poland and Germany until the conclusion of a peace treaty terminating World War II.

But after 25 years, there is general agreement that the wheels of history cannot be turned back; and there is also a growing disposition in Germany, as well as in Britain, France, and the United States, to accept the finality of the Oder-Neisse line in order to remove this completely pointless irritant from the relations between East and West.

Until recently, it would have been exceedingly difficult for any German politician, even the most courageous, to take a stand in favor of recognizing the Oder-Neisse line as the permanent frontier between Germany and Poland.

The memory of World War II was too fresh, and the political pressure from the millions of Germans expelled from the eastern territories was too great.

But virtually all of the expellees have now been absorbed into the Western German economy, and it is highly questionable whether many of them would now want to return to the eastern territories, even if this became politically possible.

The internal pressures in Germany against the acceptance of the Oder-Neisse line have, therefore, been fading with each passing year.

That German public opinion would today be prepared to accept the recognition of the Oder-Neisse line is further indicated by the fact that the Catholic bishops of Germany and the Protestant bishops, in separate statements, have both urged the recognition of the present Polish frontier in the interests of peace.

Nevertheless, it was an act of great courage on the part of Willy Brandt, who was then Foreign Minister of the Federal German Republic, when he wrote in Foreign Affairs for April 1968:

> The drawing of borderlines should not impede the establishment of a peaceful order in Europe. If forces in Europe are strong enough to create a system of security and ultimately a stable and equitable order, they will not be held up by border questions of the past. Perhaps the declarations we have offered regarding the renunciation of force can be formulated and safeguarded in such a way that the present borders of Poland can be recognized for the period for which the Federal Republic can commit itself, i.e., until a peace settlement.

In repeated statements since that time, both as Foreign Minister and as Chancellor of the German Federal Republic, Brandt has called for an agreement on the renunciation of force and has underscored the need to establish conditions which would enable the peoples of Europe to live within secure borders.

Despite the lack of certainty that the practical acceptance of the Oder-Neisse line will persuade the Communists to conduct their foreign policy in a more civilized manner, I believe that it is clearly to our advantage to make explicit something that has for all practical purposes been implicit for some time now.

Regrettably the language that has thus far been used in dealing with the Oder-Neisse question, both in our own country and in Germany, is something less than definitive. It still has about it an element of ambiguity which is bound to feed the fears and suspicions of the Poles.

And based on recent history, no one can deny that the Poles have some justification for their fears and suspicions.

I do not believe that there is any real ambiguity about our own intentions or about the intentions of Chancellor Brandt and his government. But a Pole reading his article in Foreign Affairs might conclude from the wording employed that the Chancellor was willing to recognize the Oder-Neisse frontier until a peace treaty was negotiated, but that he was reserving the right to reopen this question when the negotiations for a peace treaty actually got underway.

If the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and our own Government are agreed that frontiers cannot be changed by force; if they implicitly accept the permanence of the Oder-Neisse line; then it seems to me that it would be advantageous to remove all ambiguity from their statements and make it clear, without equivocation and without reservation, that they do accept the Oder-Neisse line as the frontier between Poland and Germany.

It is my fervent hope that the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, with the support and encouragement of our own Government and of the other Western allies, will take this simple and clearcut and historically inevitable course.

I am afraid that we bog down in legalisms when we take the stand that we cannot accept the Oder-Neisse line as final until there is a peace treaty which formally terminates World War II.

World War II has been over for 25 years now, and there is still no peace treaty. And, looking at things realistically, I think the chances are better than even that 25 years hence we will still be without a formal treaty terminating World War II.

It seems to me, therefore, that the Western nations hurt only themselves when they put off dealing with this question in a formal legal manner until the never-never day when a peace treaty is signed.

There are some who may cry that such a concession at this time would constitute appeasement. I disagree with them.

Indeed, I believe that the acceptance of the Oder-Neisse line, because it constitutes an acceptance of what is an accomplished and irreversible fact, in no way constitutes appeasement and would in no way weaken the West. It would, if anything, strengthen the West and strengthen the cause of freedom and make the peace of Europe more secure.

It would remove a completely pointless and outdated irritant from the relations between Poland and the Warsaw Pact states on the one hand, and the NATO nations on the other hand.

It would make all Poles feel less dependent on Moscow, and to that extent would serve to encourage the pro-Western and pro-democratic elements in the Polish nation.

That such recognition would also serve to weaken the hold of the infamous Ulbricht government in East Germany is apparent from the almost openly negative attitude of the East German Government to the prospect of even a limited rapprochement between the Polish Government and the Government of West Germany.

Since recognition of the Oder-Neisse frontier is bound to come in any case, surely it makes sense for the Western nations to grant such recognition of their own accord, and without delay. Surely this would be better than acceding to it after protracted negotiations, thus permitting the Polish Communist Government to claim credit for it.

While the immediate impact of the acceptance of the Oder-Neisse line would be justification enough, a larger justification can be found in the effect that such acceptance may have on the future peace of Europe.

The peace of Europe has been plagued over the centuries by a series of national antagonisms. The ancient Franco-German antagonism was foremost among these. But not very far behind it in rank has been the traditional hostility between Poles and Germans.

The Franco-German antagonism has now been laid to rest, even though many people not so long ago would have considered such a development impossible. There is, therefore, reason for hoping that the Polish-German antagonism, similarly, can be buried in the darker pages of past history, opening the way to a new era of collaboration and friendship between these two strong and remarkably virile people.

The coming period will be one of testing at many points, and there will be many issues on which we cannot yield to Communist demands without sacrificing principle or our basic interests.

We must stand fast on the issue of allied rights in Berlin, for example, because the fate of all Europe may very well hinge on our continued ability to guarantee the freedom of West Berlin and to compel Soviet compliance with the series of agreements relating to Berlin.

We must also make it clear to the Soviets that we will refuse to recognize the validity of the so-called Brezhnev doctrine, under which Moscow claims the right to intervene militarily in all socialist countries. As Senators will recall, shortly after the doctrine was promulgated, I introduced a resolution calling for a public repudiation of the doctrine by the United States. I regret that this resolution has not been acted on to date.

But, having said all this, I still believe that we should seek to remove irritants and sources of tension wherever they can be removed, in the hope that somehow, somewhere along the line, a larger understanding between East and West can be evolved.

The final recognition of the Oder-Neisse boundary might be a good place to start.

PRESIDENT NIXON'S ROLE IN CURBING TEXTILE IMPORTS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on Sunday, March 22, an editorial entitled "Nixon Can't Abdicate Role in Curbing Textile Imports" was published in the Charlotte Observer.

President Nixon has on several occasions indicated his support for the protection of the domestic textile industry. In August of 1968 Mr. Nixon, then a candidate for the Presidency, in a telegram committed himself to the protection of this vital industry.

Since that time the administration has been engaged in efforts to secure voluntary agreements with importing countries through the office of Secretary Stans.

In his statement of position on America's world trade policy issued in November 1968, the President advocated free trade but he took special cognizance of the textile import problem, referring to it as "a special circumstance that requires special measures."

The editorial to which I refer states that the administration reportedly is about to abdicate its leadership on the textile import question and says in effect that President Nixon is not going to make good his promises concerning textile imports.

The article indicates that if President Nixon should not go forward with strong proposals and strong leadership, it will be unlikely that textile legislation can be secured.

Mr. President, I hope that the editorial is unduly pessimistic; however, it is important that the administration continue to take a firm stand on the import question and promote and sponsor protective legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Charlotte Observer, Mar. 22, 1970]

NIXON CANNOT ABDICATE ROLE IN CURBING TEXTILE IMPORTS

The Nixon administration is reportedly about to take a line on textile imports that is an abdication of leadership and a "copout" on the President's own campaign pledges.

Indications are that the administration will go along with the textile industry's request to call off further negotiations for voluntary quotas with the Japanese. But the White House seems unwilling, at the moment, to propose other remedies.

This is a prescription for deep and, perhaps, dangerous confusion. In effect, it proclaims that there is no alternative except for industry spokesmen in Congress to produce legislative limits on imports.

Legislative action would be tricky even with a strong proposal and strong leadership from the administration. A score of other industries with friends in Congress want protection as much as the textile industry and its friends in the South. So it is unlikely that legislators concerned with textiles can line up a voting majority for textile protection without including protection for other industries which would seriously threaten to upset the uneasy balance of trade.

The difficulty of getting import controls for a single industry from Congress is one reason the Nixon administration shied away from that remedy. It has helped put the President in a tight spot.

But he cannot escape this dilemma by simply bucking the textile import issue along to Congress. When he campaigned through the South for the presidency, he declared that he could handle the textile import question.

In the overall context of Nixon's campaign—in which he identified himself as a champion of free trade—he also implied that he could handle the textile import question without upsetting trade and bringing on retaliation that would close vital markets to American exporters.

The job isn't as easy as it looked during the campaign. But easy or not, the President himself is on the hook to provide the leadership he promised on the textile import question.

To duck that responsibility now would be to discredit himself and risk a serious setback for free trade principles.

THE JOURNALISM AWARD TO TOM BROWN, ANCHORAGE, ALASKA, DAILY NEWS

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, last September, I had the pleasure of placing in the RECORD what I considered an outstanding piece of journalism. It was a series of articles on the 1969 Alaska oil rush, written by Tom Brown, staff writer of the Anchorage Daily News. The Scripps-Howard Foundation was impressed enough with the series to name Mr. Brown the winner of first place in its 1969 Edward J. Meeman Awards.

The late Mr. Meeman was conservation editor from the Scripps-Howard newspapers. Awards in his name, totaling $5,000, go to newspapermen and women for superior work in promoting conservation.

As Senator from Alaska, I share with thousands of other Alaskans pride in Mr. Brown's work. Environmental problems are uppermost in the minds of many Americans. I am certain that I speak for millions of American citizens, Mr. President, when I publicly congratulate Mr. Brown for bringing the many facets of this issue into public view, and the Scripps-Howard Foundation for placing high emphasis on environmental studies.

I ask unanimous consent that an article on the subject be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROMOTING CONSERVATION—PIPELINE STORY WINS TOP MEEMAN AWARD

NEW YORK, March 9.—A series setting out the dangers posed by Alaska's oil boom and a planned 800-mile pipeline to rivers, forests and wildlife, today won for Tom Brown of the Anchorage (Alaska) Daily News the $1,000 first place in the Scripps-Howard Foundation's 1969 Edward J. Meeman Awards.

The awards—totaling $5,000—go to newspapermen and women for superior work in promoting conservation thru reporting, editorials, cartoons and photography.

They were established by the late Edward J. Meeman, a pioneer conservationist, while he was editor of the Memphis Press-Scimitar, a Scripps-Howard newspaper. He later became Scripps-Howard Conservation Editor.

Mr. Brown, 28, was a United Press International correspondent before joining the Anchorage paper.

William Steif, whose major series on environmental pollution, titled "American Despoiled", was published in the Washington Daily News and other Scripps-Howard newspapers, received a $750 second prize.

Second prizes of $750 each also went to Herc Ficklen, Dallas Morning News cartoonist; William Logan of the Rocky Mountain News, Denver; and a three-man team, Mike Albertson, Paul Jasper and Bill Prime of the Pensacola (Fla.) News-Journal.

Five third prizes of $200 each were awarded to Mark A. Stuart, editorial writer for The Record, Hackensack, N.J.; Franz Scholz of the Lowell (Mass.) Sun; Paul G. Hayes, Milwaukee Journal; Don Bliss of the Louisville Times; and Chester S. Davis of the Winston-Salem Journal Sentinel.

Pollution of the natural environment received the major emphasis in this year's competition, the judges noted. They were Don E. Weaver, Scripps-Howard Conservation Editor, and Alfred C. Andersson of the Memphis Press-Scimitar, a longtime associate of Mr. Meeman's.

Mr. Brown's first-place entry, reported in detail in a series of articles, warned of the fragile ecology of Alaska and what hasty exploitation could mean to the future of the area.

ARMS SALES TO ISRAEL

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, it is ironic that only days after the Soviets announced that SAM–3 missiles—which reportedly may have Russian crews, are in the United Arab Republic, that the Department of State decided not to sell additional aircraft to Israel.

The administration is playing a very dangerous game in the Middle East. The Soviets send in the SAM's while we continue to hold back on the planes. The only conclusion the Soviets and their Arab allies possibly could reach is that we are not prepared to stand firmly behind Israel during this period of heightened tension.

If the SAM's become operational, the balance in the area will have shifted, and Israel for very real reasons of national survival cannot be expected to allow this to happen. In short, this is a time when we should be reassuring our Israeli friends, not shaking their confidence in us.

Yet the Nixon administration continues its shortsighted policy of seemingly rewarding our enemies and punishing our friends. The administration continues to pour billions of American dollars and hundreds of American lives into Southeast Asia to prop up corrupt, repressive dictatorships but will not even allow our Israeli friends the right to purchase arms to defend themselves against Soviet-equipped and Soviet-trained Arab armies in the Middle East.

All Israel has asked for are the tools to defend herself with. We have the moral responsibility to provide these tools. The consequences of our failure to do so could be disastrous not only for Israel and for the Middle East but for world peace.

We must show the Arab nations and the Soviet Union that Israel does not stand alone now before it is too late—too late for Israel and too late for us.

OUR SITUATION IN VIETNAM

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the Washington Post of Sunday, March 22, contains an exceptionally perceptive article, written by Mr. Arthur M. Cox, concerning our situation in Vietnam. I believe it is worthy of the closest attention by all Senators. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACTUAL DEFEAT A VIETNAM PERIL

(By Arthur M. Cox)

(NOTE.—Cox, a former senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, is a consultant, writer and lecturer on foreign affairs and a former government specialist on communism.)

President Nixon last November announced a Vietnam policy which cannot possibly achieve its stated objectives. Even so, the President has won the support of much of the nation with "Vietnamization," a strategy built on the quicksand of unwarranted optimism which has characterized U.S. policy in Vietnam especially since 1965. Unless the Nixon program is soon revised, it will lead to chaos and create the possibility of outright U.S. military defeat.

Given the political realities, the only way this war can end in the near future is through negotiation. President Nixon has stated in all of his recent speches that "there has been no progress whatever on the negotiating front." Of course there has been no progress; the U.S. has manifested absolutely no willingness to negotiate about the only subject with which a compromise settlement would deal—a new government in Saigon.

The issue of who runs Saigon is the reason for the war. The Commission believes it should be theirs and we have blocked them. Negotiations leading successfully to settlement could result only if both sides compromised. The Communists would have to give up their objective of takeover and we would have to give up the Thieu-Ky regime. The result could be a neutralist regime. Quite clearly, the Nixon administration has not been moving in this direction.

In his November speech, President Nixon said, "I recognized that we might not succeed in bringing an end to the war through negotiation. I, therefore, put into effect another plan to bring peace." That plan, which Secretary of Defense Laird named "Vietnamization," calls for the United States to withdraw gradually most of its troops while transferring progressively more of the fighting to the South Vietnamese. The United States will continue to provide air support and certain noncombat military services while increasing its supply of military hardware to the South Vietnamese army, leading in time to a situation in which the Saigon regime and its military hopefully can defend themselves.

President Nixon says "we were proceeding in our pursuit for peace on two fronts—a peace settlement through negotiations or, if that fails, ending the war through Vietnamization." That assertion won't stand examination. The United States has never moved for serious negotiation because it has refused to discuss the central question of a new Saigon regime. Instead, the United States has launched its Vietnamization policy, and Vietnamization and negotiation are absolute incompatibles. To have any chance of success, the Vietnamization policy must rely on the continuity of the Thieu-Ky regime and its military establishment. The Vietnamization policy, in other words, locks the United States into a position of unwavering commitment to Thieu and Ky. A policy of negotiation, on the other hand, would require the United States to persuade Thieu and Ky to step aside in favor of other politicians who would accept a compromise government, including some Communist participation.

FLIMSY OPTIMISM

The President says Vietnamization is a plan "which will bring the war to an end regardless of what happens on the negotiating front." That is an impossibility which has been allowed to go unchallenged. The war will end only when one side wins a military victory or when a settlement has been negotiated. Since Vietnamization rules out serious negotiation, the only conceivable other assumption must be that the President is counting on the South Vietnamese to win their own war. Surely that is optimism of an even more flimsy sort than that of President Johnson and his advisers during the 1965–68 period. President Johnson thought that 540,000 Americans plus the South Vietnamese and the other allies could win the war. He was very wrong. How can President Nixon contemplate that the South Vietnamese can win when most Americans have gone? President Johnson discovered that limited wars must have limited objectives, and military victory is not one of them.

It must be hoped that President Nixon has not succumbed to the siren's song of those mystics among U.S. policy advisers who have crooned that the Communists would sooner or later fade away. After more than 25 years of fighting, with more than a million dead, it would appear most unlikely that the Communists have any intention of fading away, especially since they continue to be supported by both Russia and Communist China.

All of this might be accepted as part of the game of American politics if it were not so potentially threatening to the very roots of our nation and our society. Each month that the Vietnamization policy proceeds, the more dangerous our predicament becomes. For every 100,000 troops we withdraw, our bargaining position with both Thieu and the Communists is that much diminished.

It is impossible to state the exact point when we will rely on Thieu more than he relies on us, but it will come. When it comes, we will be so dependent that we will have no alternative but to stay with Thieu at least until the end of his present term in September, 1971. At that time, the United States undoubtedly would support Thieu's re-election, because the process of Vietnamization would collapse if an opponent of the war should win.

It is also impossible to state at what level our military presence ceases to be a bargaining counter with the Communists. Certainly for the next several months we will still have enough troops present to bargain for a genuinely neutral government in Saigon; to bargain for an international peace-keeping force to observe a cease-fire, and to obtain guarantees that anti-Communists will not be liquidated after a settlement. But each time our troops are cut back, our bargaining position decreases.

BY 1971 IT MAY BE TOO LATE

If we want to end the war, the time to negotiate had better be 1970; next year probably will be too late. When the point is reached where the Communists are confident they can obtain on the battlefield what they can't obtain at the conference table, we will be in deep trouble. As long as they are persuaded that victory is doubtful and that another 100,000 to 200,000 Communists may die in battle, they may be interested in a political compromise; but when that point is passed, there will be no turning.

One of the most ominous aspects of the Vietnamization policy is that even after most of the U.S. combat forces are withdrawn, it is contemplated that a small U.S. force be left in Vietnam. Secretary of Defense Laird has even referred to a "residual force" to remain in South Vietnam after hostilities end, just as we continue a farce of 55,000 troops in South Korea. The sad thing about such observations by Secretary Laird and other administration spokesmen is that they assume the hostilities are going to end. How? They might end by a negotiated settlement which creates a neutral government. Most assuredly such a government would not be supported by our military defeat after we have reduced our troops to the point of no return. In either case, there will be no "residual force" in South Vietnam.

One of the great self-deceptions of recent times has been the frequent comparison of South Vietnam with Korea. Many Americans were deluded by Secretary Rusk and others into thinking that the 38th parallel in Korea and the 17th parallel in Vietnam are similar issues. They are not.

The Korean war was a clear case of military aggression across a recognized international boundary line. It was settled after many months at Panmunjom when the Communists agreed to stay on their side of the 38th parallel. In Vietnam, the 17th parallel was accepted in the Geneva Accords of 1954 as a temporary line behind which troops would regroup pending a free election to be held in 1956. The election was not held because South Vietnam's President Diem, supported by the United States, blocked it. Ever since, the Communists have been fighting to gain by force that which was denied in an election which former President Eisenhower in his memoirs acknowledged they would have won. No, there is no similarity in the two parallels. In South Korea, American troops live in relative safety; in South Vietnam, they always will be subject to attack until the war is over.

If this analysis is valid, the question must be raised as to why the President has not been more effectively challenged? There seem to be two major reasons. The first is that the Democratic Party is still in a shambles as a result of the disastrous Vietnam policy of the Johnson administration. The other is that very few of the opposition leaders have been willing to face the hard realities involved in pressing for a negotiated political settlement. Instead, the opposition leaders have been grasping for easy solutions—solutions either totally unacceptable to the Communists or unacceptable to most of the American people.

THE CHICAGO DEBATE

The closest the nation has come to a great debate on the issue of ending the Vietnam war was at the 1968 Democratic Convention at Chicago. The Kennedy and McCarthy supporters were narrowly defeated by backers of the Johnson policy. They advanced the case for starting negotiations by stopping the bombing and moving ahead to a political settlement based on the establishment of a provisional government in Saigon. President Johnson finally did stop the bombing and the talks did start. But there has been no negotiation about the formation of a new government—because both Presidents Johnson and Nixon have been committed to the continuity of Thieu and Ky.

The principal challenge to President Nixon's Vietnamization policy has been a call for complete withdrawal of U.S. forces, either at once or within a year or 18 months. This is a policy of abandonment, of leaving the anti-Communists to their fate. We would be welshing on the promises of four American Presidents that the government of South Vietnam not be established by military conquest. We would be unilaterally departing, in abject defeat, from a war which we have been running since 1965. If we followed such a course, how many of our allies would continue to trust our agreements? No matter how mistaken our original commitments may have been, no matter how tragically wrong our decision to take over command of the war, it is not surprising that a majority of the American people do not support immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces.

But most Americans do want the war to end, and they believe that gradual withdrawal will result ultimately in an end of U.S. involvement. They believe it because President Nixon has told them so. Most Democratic "doves" have been so eager for troop withdrawal, any troop withdrawal, that they have not looked into the chasm which lies ahead. They are just as responsible for the looming disaster as is the president.

President Nixon is gambling everything on the success of Vietnamization. Certainly the South Vietnamese have a much more experienced, better led, better trained and better equipped army than in 1965, when they faced certain defeat. They have been assuming a much larger share of the fighting. They also have a stronger, more effective police force. The Thieu government has been in power long enough to learn from experience and is unquestionably better than the government of 1965. But is that good enough? Is it as disciplined, tenacious, tough and loyal as the Communist opposition? What will happen when the crunch comes—when the people of South Vietnam know that U.S. troops are down to 100,000 and will never return again?

The Communists will step up the tactics of terror, threatening those who remain loyal to Thieu with slit throats. At the same time, those who support the Communists will be promised land and better living conditions for their families. As in the past, Communist political action will probably be more effective in the mandarin village structure of South Vietnam than the methods employed by the U.S.-trained forces commanded by the Saigon generals. If this proves to be so, what will happen to the U.S. commitment for self-determination when the Communists begin to turn the tide?

What might happen is that the prediction of the Communist Chinese would come to pass. The Chinese have urged the Vietnamese Communists to fight a long war of attrition, forecasting that in time the combination of economic drain, military casualties and political dissension within the United States would bleed us to death—would result in our military defeat. If the South Vietnamese political and military structure began to collapse, it seems most unlikely that the American people would stand for another rescue operation involving increased American troops.

The more likely alternative would be for the remaining 100,000 U.S. troops to join with the South Vietnamese forces in enclaves surrounding the major cities. This might hold off the Communists awhile in a stalemated situation. However, in time, the Communists would control the entire countryside while the United States financed the survival of the cities. Gradually, as the people became aware of their encircled existence, progressive rot and corruption would set in with an inevitable atrophy of the whole structure of such government as remained.

Admittedly, this gloomy prognosis might not come to pass for four or five years. Something better might eventuate from Vietnamization, but it does seem prudent to examine the gamble the President is taking. Based on the record of overoptimism up to now, it seems wiser to anticipate the problems rather than to rest the future of our country on fragile hopes.

The better course would seem to be to start serious negotiations with the Communists about a new government in Saigon which would be based on political compromise. This would mean slowing the withdrawal of troops and moving for genuine settlement now. Of course, if we are not going to negotiate, there is no point in checking the troop withdrawal. But there shouldn't be any more playing with the question of negotiation: Either we mean to talk seriously, or we should get out of Paris.

It is still not too late. There are strong, tough South Vietnamese who are not Communists, such as Big Minh, Gen. Don and others less well known who believe that the war can be brought to settlement through negotiated compromise. It will only happen, though, if the U.S. decides to pursue a policy of negotiation instead of Vietnamization. Rather than perpetuating Thieu and Ky in power, we will have to persuade them to step aside in favor of others who can successfully form a neutral government.

The situation probably will be irreversible by 1971, but the point of no return has not yet been reached. The Communists have long claimed a willingness to negotiate a compromise settlement based on a neutral regime in Saigon. The time to test that position is now.

INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE FOR MINORITY ENTERPRISE

Mr. SAXBE. Mr. President, in March 1969, in response to a request from Secretary of Commerce Stans, an Interagency Committee for Minority Enterprise was created by the Nixon administration. Mobilization of the resources and skills of the Federal Government is vital and a major charge of the committee. The project was discussed recently by Hon. Rocco C. Siciliano, Under Secretary of Commerce, in a speech in Cleveland.

I ask unanimous consent the remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE ROCCO C. SICILIANO, UNDER SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

This conference is of special significance to the Department of Commerce. You are engaged in a pilot project which affects an area of vital interest to the Department—small business.

Unfortunately, the Department of Commerce in the past was associated by some with big business and big industry. Such is not the case at all. Our constituency is all of private enterprise, big and small. All big industries had their genesis in small business. It is the hallmark of our economic system that the opportunity for growth be available to every beginning enterprise. All that really matters, of course, is that a business be viable.

While the basis for our present industrial structure is in the small beginnings of individual entrepreneurs, it is self-evident that if our economy is to maintain its unparalled growth and prosperity we must continue to provide opportunities for the ambitious, the persistent and the confident and to assist them in making their start.

In essence, this is the philosophy to which we in the Department of Commerce subscribe and it is the purpose of the program which we are implementing—a program of expanded opportunity to participants in the private enterprise system. We are convinced it will have a tremendous influence, both socially and economically on our national future. For private enterprise—capitalism if you will, is not a naughty word. It is the cornerstone of our economic system.

To achieve this purpose, President Nixon, on March 5—two months after taking office—signed an Executive Order and created the Office of Minority Business Enterprise in the Department of Commerce.

At that time, he set the goal of fostering the economic status of members of our minority groups by seeking to involve them more fully in our private enterprise system. Blacks, Mexican-Americans, Puerto Ricans, Indians, and others were to be encouraged to enter the field of business, both in the areas where they now live and in the larger commercial community—and not only as workers, important as that is, but also as managers and owners.

The Nixon Administration is unequivocally committed to a policy which assures all Americans an equal opportunity at the starting line:

By creating—in cooperation with corporate America—new business opportunities;

By finding—in cooperation with financial America—sources of venture capital; and

By identifying—in cooperation with the minority communities of America—the individual who has the ambition and the potential to become a businessman.

This obviously is not a simple task. It demands an acceleration of the evolutionary process through massive assistance by an understanding America—because while a history of entrepreneurship, with its successes and failures, is the heritage of the majority—it is a novel experience for the millions whose forebears were deprived of the opportunity to develop specialized skills.

The philosophy which guides us in defining the mission of OMBE is clear and evident. Our task is to provide an opportunity for every American who wants the chance to start his own business—who is willing to pit his ambitions and skills against the challenge of the market place—who is not afraid to risk failure—who wants only to participate in the American experience.

Identification of the basic needs and the search for their pragmatic solutions is OMBE's immediate task.

Two are paramount—one, opportunities which contain sources of continuing assistance and guidance in basic business management, and two, assurance of venture capital to enable start-up and follow-on.

Detailed study of the American business community indicates that the former can be obtained through participation in the fast expanding franchise industry or by association with corporations which grow through either independently owned or managed sales branches.

Your conference and exposition here is another important vehicle toward achieving our national objective. Here are assembled exhibits of the products and materials which major business firms seek to obtain from small businesses as subcontractors.

Importantly, you also have provided counseling to small businessmen on how to become prime contractors for the hundreds of items of supply and the specialized products which the Federal Government purchases.

Creation of opportunity for the small manufacturer and supplier is a vital factor in our over-all program.

We are convinced that one method is to create access for the minority contractor to the multi-billion dollar market created by Federal procurement. This policy makes it possible to provide marketing opportunities for the minority manufacturer and supplier, and to assist him, both technically and in management, to assure contract performance.

The mechanics for its implementation have been achieved through the organization of the Inter-Agency Committee for Minority Business Enterprise, with a special Task Force on Federal Procurement. As a result minority contract opportunities totaling $17,650,000 in the current fiscal year have been committed to date, and a $100 million goal has been set for Fiscal Year 1971.

The procurement program revolves around Section 8(a) of The Small Business Act which is regarded as the best vehicle for minority participation in government procurement since there is no competitive bidding and a cost differential is allowed.

This is how the 8(a) program operates:

The minority businessman contacts his local SBA office. He advises the SBA procurement specialist what products he is able to produce. SBA's recently expanded Business Development Office in Washington then visits the businessman's plant and makes an on-site field survey and evaluation of capacity to perform.

If the man has the capabilities to produce specific items, SBA then locates and identifies appropriate products and seeks out a federal agency buyer who wishes to buy them. SBA conducts the necessary negotiations between the manufacturer and the buying government agency before the contract is consummated.

Mr. Robert Kunzig, the Administrator of the General Services Administration, has already committed $10 million in procurement monies to minority manufacturers. This will involve purchases of such diverse items as furniture, textile goods, toiletry products and garden tools. This represents only an initial commitment by GSA, and we are assured that more procurement money will be available when the initial amount is exhausted.

In similar efforts, the Post Office Department has committed $2.4 million to the minority procurement program and the Department of Transportation has earmarked $4.25 million. Other agencies will be following suit in the very near future. The SBA, as prime contractor for all government agencies, has set a goal of $100 million worth of commitments by July 1971.

Although our program in a measure is experimental, it is designed to develop procedures with cooperating procurement agencies and to determine the approach and techniques involved in the complex process of establishing small manufacturing concerns which, it is hoped, eventually will become independent and self-sustaining in our normal competitive environment. For the most part, these contracts represent the initial productive input for newly organized business concerns.

In many instances, the Small Business Administration (SBA) has found it necessary to furnish direct management and technical assistance to assure performance of the contract by the fledgling company, since their lack of experience makes it necessary that SBA maintain a continuous review.

Thus, we assure an opportunity for the company to obtain that vital management and technical capability which too often is lacking among minority groups and other disadvantaged persons.

We are aware that this availability of Federal business is unknown to hundreds of producers of products which the Government buys. To acquaint those unfamiliar with the scope of the Federal procurement program, the items sought and the techniques involved in getting the business, OMBE is scheduling a series of procurement conferences over the nation.

Two already have been scheduled—the first will be held on February 20 in Philadelphia and the second on March 20 in Washington, with other area centers under consideration. Representatives of the various Federal Agencies involved will explain to the thousands invited what their departments are seeking; will provide counseling; and will designate the minimum requirements for qualification. Those attending will also be fully briefed on the proper bidding procedures.

By bringing the information directly to the supplier, we hope to encourage the widest possible participation. Specifically, what we are doing is creating an opportunity through Federal contracting for a company owned and operated by members of the minority community to obtain the management experience mandatory for its continuance as a business.

The Administration is determined to open the doors of business opportunity to all Americans. To explain our purpose, to present our programs, and to search out and identify qualified individuals, the Secretary of Commerce, Maurice H. Stans, is currently engaged in visits to various cities over the nation.

During each of those visits, the program which I merely have highlighted today will be explained in detail to industrial and business leaders and representatives of the minority community so that all will be informed and all desiring to become involved in the opportunities for entrepreneurship developed by OMBE will have a chance to participate.

The term "jawboning" has become a popular phrase for describing a lot of talk without any action. This is not our purpose.

We know—as must all of you—that this nation cannot grow, cannot flourish, cannot achieve its destiny if the doors of opportunity remain closed to any of our fellow citizens.

There is no room within our democracy—no place within our system—for denying the capable and qualified from meeting the challenge of the marketplace. No one should, or shall, be frustrated in his ambition to become a full partner in our economy.

And we are confident that what we seek is no "impossible dream," but the attainable—the inevitable.

We want it to happen. It shall happen.

AFL–CIO ON THE WORLD AROUND US

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the AFL–CIO, in recent deliberations at Bal Harbour, Fla., showed its concern over nagging crises afflicting us at home and abroad. This great American trade union organization, always cognizant of the national interest, made its views known in a series of pointed declarations.

Some received publicity at the time of presentation; others did not. Those covering the foreign field merit more consideration and reflection. I refer particularly to statements by the AFL–CIO Executive Council on the Middle East, AID, NATO, and Nigeria.

I ask unanimous consent that four statements issued by the AFL–CIO Executive Council be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

URGENT ALTERNATIVES IN MIDDLE EAST

For months, the "Big Four"—U.S., Britain, France and USSR—have been conferring on the problem of securing peace in the Middle East. The deliberations were doomed to failure the very moment they began. Two of the participants were not qualified to play the role of peacemakers.

For fourteen months, the Soviet Government has been providing the most aggressive Arab regimes with huge supplies of modern weapons for the destruction of Israel. More recently, the USSR has become the chief provider and trainer of the Arab terrorist commandos which are seeking not only to bleed Israel but also to subvert and replace the more moderate Arab governments (Jordan and Lebanon) with Nasser-type dictatorships. For years, Paris has refused to deliver to Israel planes she paid for, planes vital to the defense of her existence. More recently, the French government agreed to provide the Libyan military junta with more than a hundred of the most up to date warplanes. This armada is obviously destined for bolstering Nasser's faltering airpower.

There has been much talk about the Big Four seeking a political rather than a military solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. The Soviets have joined such talks only to mask their unceasing efforts to feed the flames of military struggle. They have been actively encouraging the defeated Arab regimes to believe that, with the backing of the Warsaw Pact countries, they would regain through diplomatic pressures all the territory they lost in the war of June 1967. The Kremlin rulers are also interested in dragging out these deliberations in order to gain time for training more effectively the aggressive Arab forces and the terrorist commandos. In this situation, the Big Four could not possibly join hands in rallying their influence and prestige for getting the Arab and Israeli representatives to a conference table for negotiating a peaceful settlement. The bitter fruit of their labors to date has been to further Arab-Israeli armed confrontation instead of negotiation.

So far, only the U.S. government has clearly declared that peace in the Middle East "can be based only on agreement between the parties and that agreement can be achieved only through negotiations between them" (President Nixon) and that "an agreement among the powers cannot be a substitute for agreement among the parties themselves." (Secretary of State Rogers).

It actually hurts the cause of peace for our Government to persist in its futile quest for joint efforts with the USSR to achieve an equitable and durable settlement in the Middle East, since Moscow seeks only to corrode our basic position by securing piecemeal concessions at the expense of Israel—thus strengthening Nasser and his associates in their determination to prevent all direct negotiations with Israel.

In view of its experience with the Big Four negotiations to date, our government, would be well advised to seek alternative measures for promoting peace in the Middle East. Our country should now rally world opinion for having both Arabs and Israeli honor fully the cease-fire arrangements they accepted in June 1967.

Despite the courage and capacities of the Israeli fighting forces, they are at a tremendous disadvantage because of the heavy military imbalance in the Middle East. Israeli armaments lag far behind those of the Arabs. The latest count is a ratio of four to one. Only a correction of this imbalance could convince the aggressive Arab rulers that it is better to negotiate an honorable peace with Israel than risk another confrontation with her. Only the correction of this imbalance can prevent another war in the Middle East which might lead to a nuclear world conflagration. Our country's vital national interests and the best hopes for world peace demand that our government should provide Israel with planes and the other military supplies she urgently needs for self-defense and survival—especially in view of the escalation of Soviet and French arms shipments to Egypt and other belligerent Arab regimes.

The Israeli people are now spending over three million dollars a day in fighting for their self-preservation. Eighty percent of Israel's tax revenue is consumed by national defense needs. Our country should help Israel to shoulder this terrible burden imposed on her by the harsh military realities she faces. The United States has a vital political as well as moral interest in helping Israel preserve her nationhood. We must never forget that the very forces which preach and seek the destruction of Israel are the ones who are actively engaged in seeking to drive U.S. influence and all American interests out of the Middle East and subjecting this entire pivotal area to Soviet Domination. We dare not shut our eyes to the gravity of this mounting threat. Were these forces to succeed in attaining their two-fold objective, it would be an irreparable disaster for all the peoples in the Middle East—Arabs and Israeli alike—and a catastrophe for world peace, human and social progress.

NO DISMEMBERMENT OF AID

Within the last two years there has been developing in our country a determined opposition to our nation's overseas assistance program. The latest foreign assistance appropriation by Congress amounts to $1.8 billion which is $800 million below the far from adequate request by President Nixon and only 0.33 percent of our gross national product. While other countries have been increasing their contributions, the U.S. share has been declining and has dropped to eighth place among the donor countries. Scarcely a place of honor for the wealthiest nation with the most powerful economy!

This development is a distressing manifestation of the growing neo-isolationist tendency in our country, towards running away from world responsibilities. If continued, this emerging shift in foreign policy is bound to curtail further the already inadequate assistance to the developing nations and harm the prospects for world peace.

The AFL–CIO warns against this trend as harmful to the best interests of the American people. We view with deep concern the desperate needs of the two-thirds of humanity who are poor. Our nation's prosperity cannot have a lasting foundation in a world plagued by massive poverty.

President Nixon's correct insistence "that other nations must play a role" must never serve as an excuse for our own country disengaging and retreating from world responsibility. Similarly, the talk about channelling more American aid through international institutions should never serve as a screen for hiding the efforts of those who would dismantle our country's increasingly effective foreign aid machinery. Whether an assistance program is to be bi-lateral or multi-lateral should be decided in each instance solely on comparative merits.

The Executive Council reaffirms its vigorous opposition to all moves, under whatever guise, to weaken or eliminate the Agency for International Development by "re-structuring" it in any manner which would tend to deprive it of its vital functions. Every agency of our government should be under constant scrutiny. There is, however, a vast difference between scrutinizing for improvement and scuttling an agency which has made so many valuable contributions to the development of self-help and economic growth among the poorer nations.

We hope that the Presidential Task Force, headed by Rudolph Peterson, former president of the Bank of America, will not yield to the various isolationist pressures and will come forward with recommendations commensurate with our country's world responsibilities. The two-year authorization period, granted the Agency for International Development for the first time, should be utilized for strengthening rather than strangling it.

It is high time to realize that the mere transfer of capital, whether it be public or private, no matter how much the latter is governmentally protected against risks, and an increase in the GNP will not by themselves overcome the standard of living gap among the nations of the world. A cardinal need of all developing nations is the fostering of education, self-help and self-reliance through responsible voluntary agencies. Unless this need is met, the technical know-how made available to them cannot serve adequately for their achievement of viable economies with decent conditions of work and equitable standards of living. More consideration should, therefore, be given to individual human beings, social institutions, and a fair distribution of wealth than to raising the GNP as such.

Whether in Latin America, Africa, or Asia, there is among the developing nations an overriding need for a literate, skilled, and healthy work force—in addition to capable technicians, able managers, and sound intellectuals. Recognition of this need must be paramount if there is to be any sound investment in the development of human resources. Hence, the great importance of responsible effective free trade unions in nation-building.

In this connection, the positive contributions made to date, despite rather limited resources, by the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the African-American Labor Center, and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, show the way to solid progress in developing the human resources without which there can be no elimination of the perilous economic and social gap among the nations of the world.

There can be no truly "rational division of labor in the Hemisphere" (Western or Eastern) when such division undermines the living standards in the poorer countries. Combining false and harmful policies with preferential tariffs and similar incentives will serve to expand the profits of the few rather than eliminate the poverty of the many, though it might stimulate the spread of multi-national conglomerates.

It is important to note that there is also a gap within the developing countries—between the privileged few and the impoverished great mass of the people. The development of International fair labor standards is, therefore, the indispensable first requirement for overcoming the poverty gap. Low purchasing power for the great mass of people does not spell sound economic progress anywhere. American interests establishing runaway plants in lower wage countries are not helping to overcome the poverty gap but only perpetuating unacceptable living standards in the poorer countries.

The living standards of the lower-paid workers in any country will never be raised by lowering the wage scale of the higher paid workers in other countries. The prosperity of our nation's economy can be helped by the higher and not by the lower purchasing power of other lands.

The Executive Council reaffirms the position taken by the Eighth Constitutional Convention of the AFL–CIO declaring that "continuous progress towards narrowing this gap is essential to mankind's peaceful achievement of social progress and maintenance of world peace. To help the realization of this goal is not only our responsibility but also our great opportunity."

NATO—Shield of Peace and Freedom

Twenty years ago, the United States took the initiative in establishing NATO in order to block the Soviet Union from extending its control over the entire European continent. Our nation did this because two world wars had taught us that American national security is dependent upon a Europe free from the hegemony of a single power.

NATO has succeeded in keeping the peace in Europe and preserving the freedom of our European allies. It has served as an effective obstacle to a third world war and has thus assured the Western nations two decades of unparalleled progress and prosperity.

Throughout these years, the United States has been the backbone of the Atlantic Alliance. America's commitment to defend Europe has given our allies security and enabled them to withstand Moscow's threats, attempts at intimidation and ultimatums. The U.S. has backed its commitment fully. The most visible and convincing proof of our determination to honor our pledge has been the stationing of U.S. troops on European soil, mainly in West Germany. Friend and foe realize that any aggression against West Europe would at once bring American forces into battle—with all the consequences this would have for the aggressor. The presence of a substantial number of American troops has, therefore, served as a reassurance to our allies and a warning to our enemies.

This cornerstone of the Atlantic Alliance is now in danger of being undermined by the demand for a speedy and major withdrawal of American forces from Europe—a demand expressed in the resolution submitted by Senator Mansfield.

The AFL–CIO Executive Council views this proposal with great concern. It regards a drastic cut in American troop strength in Europe at the present time as a grave threat to the security of the United States, the freedom of Europe and the peace of the world. We consider the assumptions underlying the Mansfield resolution as unrealistic and fallacious. Its main assumption is that the Soviet Union no longer harbors expansionist designs in Europe. Unfortunately, all available evidence points to the contrary.

As witnessed by the international conference of Communist parties held last June in Moscow, and by the WFTU Congress held last October in Budapest, the Kremlin has stepped up its subversive campaign against the West European countries; it lends increased support to the efforts of the French and other Communist parties to gain power; it seeks to penetrate—and not without success—mass organizations in West Germany such as trade unions, student movements and church groups.

On the diplomatic field, it attempts to exploit the new Ostpolitik of the Brandt government, not only for winning recognition of its World War II conquests, but also to weaken the freedom of West Berlin and loosen the ties binding the Federal Republic to the West and especially NATO. Likewise, the main purpose of the so-called conference on European security, ardently sought by the Soviet government, is the consolidation of Moscow's East European conquests and the dismantlement of NATO. This continues to be the over-riding preoccupation of the Soviets.

Moscow has ordered a worldwide mobilization of all its front organizations to promote this objective. At the October 1969 WFTU Congress, Shelepin, former political police chief and now head of the Soviet "trade unions", proposed that this world body wage a carefully prepared, step by step, campaign to lure the free trade unions of Western Europe to join with the Communist-controlled labor organizations in a conference to consider the "security of the continent."

This political drive has been accompanied by the continuous buildup of Soviet military power. To the disadvantage of NATO, Moscow's strategic position has considerably improved in recent years. With the occupation of Czechoslovakia, Russian troops are now stationed at the Czech-German border. The presence of strong Soviet naval forces in the Mediterranean threatens the Southern flank of NATO and endangers oil supplies for West European countries. And the integration of Moscow Pact troops under Soviet control has been further advanced.

A second fallacy in the Mansfield resolution is the belief that a U.S. troop cutback would bring about a lessening of tension in the heart of Europe. Actually, such a unilateral move would have the opposite effect. The NATO member states have repeatedly called upon the Soviet Union to negotiate with them a mutual and balanced reduction in the armed forces confronting each other. The Soviet government has ignored this appeal. Moscow expects large numbers of U.S. troops to leave Europe without the Soviets having to reciprocate. It is clear that our unilateral action will dim the chances for an agreement with the Soviet Union on a similar cutback in Warsaw pact forces.

A third fallacy is the assumption that U.S. troops could be easily replaced by European forces and that, therefore, an American withdrawal would have no dangerous consequences. It is true that our European allies have not kept fully their promises regarding conventional arms. While we should press for the fulfillment of their commitments, we must realize that this situation cannot be remedied overnight. Even if it were possible to replace, reasonably soon, U.S. troops by European forces, this would not repair the damage caused by a major American cutback. Such a cutback would be widely interpreted as a sign of disinterest in a disengagement from Europe—as a return to isolationism. The Mansfield resolution has already caused dismay and apprehension among our European allies. Its adoption and implementation would, in all probability, encourage and facilitate the Soviet Union to step up its pressure and blackmail tactics in the hope of frightening the countries of West Europe into submission.

Confronted with a much smaller number of American troops, the Soviets might even be emboldened to commit aggressive acts. In such a case, the United States would be left with a choice only between accepting capitulation or risking nuclear war in order to assure Europe's and, finally, our own survival as a free nation.

A fourth fallacy is the assumption that improved transport facilities would enable American combat units to return speedily to Europe in the event of an emergency. However, this argument does not take into account the danger of planes being intercepted; it underrates the time factor and ignores the possibility that a Soviet massive blitz attack might destroy all landing places in allied hands.

Senator Mansfield and other sponsors of his resolution have mainly adduced financial grounds in arguing for a reduced U.S. military establishment in Europe. They maintain that our European allies can well afford to make a greater contribution to their defense needs. For years, the AFL–CIO has been calling for a more fair sharing of NATO expenditures. We now urge our government to step up its efforts to secure more equitable arrangements. Our government should seek an agreement under which NATO costs would be financed through a joint budget. This would facilitate a just solution of this crucial problem and serve the best interests of all concerned.

Finally, we should not forget that we have commitments to our European allies not only under NATO. When we urged them to sign the Non-Proliferation Treaty we assumed an additional moral responsibility for their defense. Any substantial reduction in our armed forces now might be regarded as a betrayal of their trust in us. Compared with 1962, there are today almost 100,000 fewer U.S. soldiers in Europe. Any further major reduction would weaken our military presence to such an extent that the credibility of our commitment might be seriously questioned.

For these reasons, the Executive Council of the AFL–CIO calls upon the Administration to maintain an adequate level of U.S. troop strength in Europe as long as the Soviet threat persists and an agreement on a reciprocal and balanced troop withdrawal has not been concluded with the U.S.S.R.

NIGERIA

Now that the tragic war in Nigeria is over, maximum speedy aid to the victims of the war is most urgent. At the same time, it is vital to reinforce Nigerian national unity through massive programs of rehabilitation and reconstruction of the war-torn country.

These objectives merit the full support of our government and every sector of our nation. We, of American labor, pledge to assist these efforts in cooperation with the free trade union movement in Nigeria—the United Labour Congress of Nigeria.

The AFL–CIO Executive Council calls upon our government and the American people to channel all assistance to the Nigerian people through the legitimate recognized national institutions of the country.

It is, therefore, most important that our country help counteract and overcome the costly consequences of the war by providing all-out economic and social assistance to the people of Nigeria to be distributed equitably and speedily. In this way, we will not only bring effective aid to needy people but also strengthen the forces of Nigerian national unity and democracy.

NEW AIRPORT PROGRAM MUST INCLUDE TERMINALS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, several of our colleagues are participating in a conference concerning H.R. 14465, the Aviation Facilities Expansion Act. I recognize that the conferees have before them a number of difficult issues to resolve. I believe it is incumbent on me to speak to one of those issues.

The purpose of my comment today is to be assured that the conferees on that important legislation bear in mind the very firm position of the Senate with respect to assistance for public facilities in airport terminals. The strength of this body's approbation of such assistance was underscored by a vote of 69 to 20, rejecting elimination of the terminal aid provision.

The Congress took a wise step in 1961 when it eliminated from the Federal aid-airport program the eligibility of funds for terminal areas. At that time, available funds were severely limited and were urgently needed to improve safety through airfield construction. In addition, the appropriations were made from the general funds of the Treasury. The situation today, however, is altogether different. Now all the money for airport needs will be coming from a user-supported trust fund and not from the general taxpayer.

All of us know how serious is the problem of congestion at many of our airports. With the increasing use of air transportation the congestion will become ever more severe. We will be misleading the public—yes, defrauding them—if we let them believe that the new airport program will be a solution to congestion while at the same time we withhold funds from critical terminal construction projects.

Under the terms of H.R. 14465, some of the funds are earmarked for each airport location. There exist today situations in which there is no need for more runway or other airfield construction, but an immediate need for terminal funds. It would be a shameful waste of money not to provide such locations the money to which they are entitled, simply because their need is for terminals and not for runways.

PARAMEDICAL COURSE A CARDOZO SUCCESS

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the Health Training Improvement Act of 1970, which I introduced last week, extends and improves the Allied Health Professions Personnel Training Act of 1966, as amended. I am convinced that passage of the bill will greatly enhance the existing program. One amendment in particular holds a great deal of promise for our economically disadvantaged. This amendment would provide grants to help identify individuals of financial, educational, or cultural need with a potential for education or training in the allied health fields. These funds could also be used to encourage such individuals where appropriate to complete secondary school, undertake postsecondary training in the allied health professions or publicize existing sources of financial aid to undertake training or education in the allied health professions.

The need for this section of the bill became very evident when I came across an item in the Washington Evening Star of March 9, 1970, which indicated very vividly that when given an opportunity the economically disadvantaged will respond. The article discusses how 29 hard-core unemployed, underemployed, or welfare recipients received training in an 11-month paramedical course given by the Community Group Health Foundation, Inc., with financial assistance from the Office of Economic Opportunity and ended up with $4,900-a-year GS–3 positions.

Mr. President, I was much impressed with the article in question and would commend it to the Senate. For the benefit of those who missed it, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article entitled "Paramedical Course a Cardozo Success," published in the Evening Star of March 9, 1970.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PARAMEDICAL COURSE A CARDOZA SUCCESS—29 ARE GRADUATED

The graduates passed no written exams, there were no grade sheets and there was no valedictorian. And instead of white gowns and mortar boards, the graduates wore blue hospital uniforms.

But then, it's not every day that hard-core unemployed, underemployed or welfare recipients get a degree. But that's what happened yesterday afternoon when commencement exercises were held for 29 Upper Cardozo residents who graduated from an 11-month paramedical training course.

The training program was given by Community Group Health Foundation, Inc., at 14th Street and Park Road NW, a community medical and dental center.

A $1.5 MILLION GRANT

The clinic started more than a year ago with five people, a $1.5 million grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity, and an idea—to give useful jobs to the hard-core unemployed. In April the clinic advertised for community residents who were interested in being trained as medical aides and technicians. The only qualification required was that the trainee present evidence that he or she was disadvantaged—underemployed, unemployed or on welfare.

The office was inundated with 250 responses. "I guess that's evidence of the size of the need for a program like this in this neighborhood," Dr. James D. Shepperd Jr. commented. Shepperd, the director of the project, said 42 applicants were selected.

The average age of the trainees was 29, and their average schooling was Grade 10—although one was a qualified nurse and one man partially qualified as a physician.

During the course, the students were paid $2 an hour for training as health workers, laboratory technicians, dental assistants or clerks.

"It was an idea whose time had come. It resulted from a community's desire to do something for itself—to give something to the community and do for itself," one enthusiastic community resident said.

Freedmens Hospital and the College of Medicine at Howard University were among area participants in the training project, along with Change, Inc., and Group Health Association.

Dr. Shepperd admitted that relations with

OEO were not always cordial: "We caught a little hell now and then," he said. But in spite of critics, mistakes and program changes, the project managed to continue, dropping 13 trainees along the way for a variety of reasons ranging from personal problems to better job offers.

"It took dedication for them to carry through," Shepperd said of the 29 graduates. "And commitment and will to make a success."

GET GS-3 JOBS

The project's first graduating class walked down the aisle to receive their certificates to the strains of Mendelssohn's "War March of the Priests." Their graduation was based on approval by clinic personnel, and they were not required to pass written exams, nor were they given grade sheets.

As they proudly accepted their diplomas yesterday in the basement of the Shrine of the Sacred Heart Church, 16th Street and Park Road NW., the paramedical graduates walked off the welfare rolls and into $4,900-a-year GS-3 positions.

The medical clinic's project—which now handles 80 patients a day—has recently been refunded with $1.8 million OEO grant, Shepperd said.

"It's been one of the more successful of OEO projects, and it's been a big success," he reflected. "We've just had an increase in money and we'll continue for at least another two years."

THE BUSINESS OF A UNIVERSITY

Mr. SAXBE. Mr. President, one of the more lucid articles I have read in a long time appeared in Sunday's New York Times Magazine. Its title is "What Business Is a University In?" and it was written by Mr. Irving Kristol, coeditor of the Public Interest and Henry Luce, Professor of Urban Values at New York University. Because the article is about a timely topic, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT BUSINESS IS A UNIVERSITY IN?

(By Irving Kristol)

The American nation today—especially the most educated part of it—seems to be even more confused than usual. On practically every campus of this country, learned professors are vociferously demanding the prohibition of cyclamates or DDT or whatever—while in the same breath arguing for the legalization of marijuana or hashish or whatever. Similarly, most professors and college administrators have concluded that they have neither the obligation nor the capacity to supervise the sexual habits or elevate the moral characters of their students—but they appear to have concluded simultaneously that they do have the obligation and capacity to solve our urban problems, conduct American foreign policy, reshape the American economy and perfect the American national character. They will abolish violence from American life—but they will stoically tolerate it on the campus rather than take "repressive" action. They will protect their students from air pollution—but not from veneral disease, drug addiction, pregnancy or psychedelic psychosis. Never has one had better cause to appreciate the cogency of William F. Buckley's observation that he would rather be governed by the first 2,000 names in the Boston telephone directory than by the Harvard faculty.

It is a familiar sociological phenomenon that, when an institution no longer knows what it is doing, it starts trying to do everything. The loss of genuine purpose is invariably accompanied by the lust for a dozen pseudo purposes. It would be a truly revolutionary event if the administration and faculty of one of our major universities were to meet in solemn conclave and then announce to the world: "Look, let's face it. We don't know what in hell to do with the money you give us or the young people you send us. Our traditional procedures and practices are obviously no longer relevant to the present situation. The reforms we have introduced in recent years seem not to have made much difference—except, perhaps, for the worse. We're not even sure whose fault it is: ours, the students' or the world's. But we are, at this moment in time, a losing proposition. We are therefore disbanding for a year and are going home to think things over."

One need not be a prophet to know that this scenario is a highly improbable one. What is more likely is that such a conclave would abolish all surviving parletal rules, all required courses and all grades—while declaring its intention of using its collective intelligence in order to save our cities. Should anyone chance to wonder aloud whether the university indeed possessed a "collective intelligence" suitable for this purpose, he would be dismissed as a frivolous heckler.

And yet, this very question, as to whether a university possesses something that can be called a "collective intelligence," and if it does what the range of such intelligence is, is really at the heart of the matter. For the idea of "corporate responsibility"—the idea that "the university" must act so as to solve our social problems—makes no sense without it.

Now, if I may somewhat simplify a complicated matter, an institution can be said to have a corporate responsibility to the extent that (a) its actions reflect the consent, active or passive, of the majority of its members; (b) it is organized in such a way as to make collective decisions and take collective actions, and (c) its decisions are, in some way and to some degree, a constraint upon its members. It follows that an individual, when he elect to join such an institution, accepts responsibility for its actions and decisions—accepts responsibility for them as a whole, and regardless of his disagreement with particular ones. Particular disagreements are inevitable, of course, but they are irrelevant to the question of general responsibility.

Is a university this kind of institution? I think one has to reply—yes, it is: but only to a trifling degree and only in a limited area. The degree has to do with the extent to which the university is something more than—or, if you prefer, less than—a community of scholars (more precisely, a community of teaching scholars).

The ideal of "a community of scholars" is still very much alive—at least the phrase is still used. No doubt the reality frequently falls far short of the ideal. But I believe that it is an authentic ideal, sincerely celebrated for the most part, and actually in existence here and there. What is puzzling, however, is that the very same people who say the university is a community of scholars will also assert that the university has a collective and corporate responsibility for rebuilding our cities, ending the war in Vietnam and solving our racial crisis. These two notions would appear to be—I should say they are—totally incompatible.

In a community of scholars, there may be individual scholars who wish—some because they sense that their expert knowledge would be useful, some others because their conception of the good citizen prescribes it, and still others because they are simply bored with their work—to get involved in public affairs. Such an action, by an individual scholar, poses no intellectual problem. It has always been assumed, since the birth of the university in the Middle Ages, that a scholar had a right not to get involved with worldly matters, if that was his choice. In the past century, the struggle for what was called "academic freedom"—a struggle that has been largely, if not entirely, successful—has given the scholar the positive right to get involved, if he does wish to. The number of scholars who have exercised this right, during this past decade, is larger than ever before in our history. I need only mention the names of Daniel Patrick Moynihan, John Kenneth Galbraith, Henry Kissinger, Arthur Burns, W. W. Rostow and Arthur Schlesinger.

But I do not see how a "community of scholars" can collectively and institutionally decide either to abstain from politics or to participate in politics in a particular fashion. That kind of decision-making is precisely what a "community of scholars" is incapable of, if it is to remain true to its self-definition. For, in order to make such decisions, it would have to become a political community—which is to say that power would be the focus of organization. A leadership would have to be instituted; modes of selecting this leadership would have to be established; formal channels of communication between leaders and members would have to be defined; a system of judicial restraint, constraints and punishments would have to be erected; an administrative hierarchy would be needed to carry out the decisions—and so on and so on.

We all know what such collectivities—whether they be in the public sector or the private, whether their intentions be philanthropic or mercenary—are like. They are organizations. And whatever the difficulties inherent in giving substance to the idea of a "community of scholars," I know of no one who ever argued that these difficulties could be overcome by transforming the academic community into an academic organization, and by converting scholars into organization men.

To be sure, there are many people these days—mainly younger people, both students and faculty—who criticize the very ideal of a "community of scholars" as being antiquated and, in the light of our present condition, even reactionary. These younger people are moved by an urgent sense of crisis—and this is to their credit, because the crisis we are living through is real enough and urgent enough. And it seems to them an act of flagrant irresponsibility for the intelligent and learned men in our universities not to be contributing to the solution of this crisis. An understandable sentiment—but, I fear, an invalid one, in that it is based on profound misconceptions of the nature of the social sciences and of the relationship between theory and practice in the realm of human affairs.

My meaning, stated bluntly, is this: There is no reason to think—there is not the slightest shred of evidence—that the organized, collective intelligence of professors has anything whatsoever to contribute to the solving of our social, economic, political or moral problems.

In this respect, the social sciences differ radically from the physical sciences. In the latter, the whole is very often greater than the sum of its parts—a team of scientists, organized for joint endeavor, is capable of achieving things that no single scientist, however brilliant, can hope to accomplish. (For instance, it can build an atom bomb.) I suspect that this analogy is in the minds of those who would have sociologists, economists, philosophers, historians, even professors of English unite for benign social purposes. But the analogy, for better or worse, is false. I know of no organized enterprise in the social sciences—no research project, no experiment—that has been notably creative. On the contrary: it is the work of individual scholars that represents the major contributions, while the organized teams usually contend themselves with exploring the significance and implications of his work.

Governments and other political authorities, to be sure, when they consult social scientists, always try to consult with a group rather than with an individual. But this is for reasons political, not scientific; it is an effort to diffuse responsibility rather than achieve truth. There is no reason whatsoever to think that the Council of Economic Advisers, for instance, is more likely to be right, in its analysis and predictions, than any individual economist. And it is very easy to find many instances where it has been wrong. Similarly, there is no reason to think that 10 criminologists, or demographers, or housing experts, working together, are more likely to achieve a correct understanding of a social problem than would one of them, working alone. Indeed, anyone who has ever participated in a meeting of such experts has soon realized that original creative thinking does not easily survive the press of conflicting opinions.

Why the social sciences should differ from the physical sciences in this way, I leave it to the philosophers of knowledge to explain. That they do differ is, I submit, a fact. Yet, oddly enough, this is a fact that many social scientists themselves find incredible. In college after college, in this country today, members of departments of sociology, anthropology, economics, etc., are insisting that it is incumbent upon them—not only as a possible moral obligation for the individual but as a necessary political obligation for the group—to "get involved in solving our social problems."

Perhaps the explanation has something to do with the fact that the population explosion in our universities has brought on to campus a great many professors who have little interest in, or talent for, scholarship, but who simultaneously feel that the mere possession of a Ph.D. gives them a title to political and moral authority that society insufficiently respects. Perhaps there are other and truer explanations. One wouldn't mind seeing this problem studied—though I wouldn't recommend that anyone hold his breath until it is.

A second misconception involves the relation of social theory to political practice. It is not merely that conflicting interests make it difficult to act according to a persuasive piece of social or economic analysis—though this is true enough, and certainly not unimportant. What is even more serious is that social problems usually reflect conflicts of values—between different sections of the populations, of course, but also within the hearts and minds of the majority of individuals who compose the entire community.

The reason politics is such a difficult art is less that people are insufficiently enlightened and more that it is in the nature of human beings to want incompatible things at the same time. We want to diminish air pollution, but we are not willing to stop driving automobiles. We want less noise in the skies, even as we fly on faster jets. We want low-cost housing for poor people but, once we have seen it, we decide that what we really need is expensive low-cost housing for poor people—with no increase in taxes, naturally. And so on, and on, and on—the catalogue is endless.

It is because our social problems are of this nature that the prime political virtue is, not theoretical rectitude, but practical sagacity (what the ancients used to call "prudence"). This is not an academic virtue; indeed, where it exists it can be an academic weakness. We want our social theorists to be bold and keen and unconstrained in the use they make of their imaginative and analytical powers. And it is precisely because we want this that we must look askance at the proposition that academic men ought, as a species, to get involved in the management of our society.

I have mentioned that there is a sense in which the university, as an institution, does have a corporate responsibility—but that this is so only to a trifling degree and in a limited area. No university is merely a "community of scholars." In order for such a community to exist and survive, it needs to be buttressed by an organizational component, by an administration which manages money and real estate and employes and relations with the world outside. Such organization and administration do indeed imply responsibilities. More precisely, they imply a responsibility—the responsibility to be reasonable with regard to the interests and sensibilities of other organizations and other people. And I don't think they imply anything more than that.

For example, a university that has a building program has the same responsibility as a business corporation or a government agency to see to it that injurious consequences to residents of the neighborhood are minimized if they cannot be entirely avoided. I do not think its responsibility is more than this. I certainly do not think that the university has the responsibility to create a "model" neighborhood or a "model" environment around it. For one thing, such a "model" reflects a man's personal values, not his academic knowledge. Nor can academic knowledge itself tell us how to translate a model into a reality—otherwise, philosophers would indeed have the divine right to be kings! Moreover, no one has given the university the authority to impose its notions of a "good" neighborhood or a "healthy" environment upon its environs. To assume such authority, therefore, would be an illicit usurpation of power. One might even call it "impudent," were that word still in good standing.

Similarly, the university has the obligation to invest its money to achieve the highest return, yet in such a way as not to offend the sensibilities of the academic community that resides within the university's organizational shell. If the members of this community feel it improper for such funds to be invested in, say, South African securities, then a reasonable administration will respect these sensibilities and avoid such investments.

On the other hand, an administration should pay no attention to those who insist that it select its investments mainly for the beneficent social consequences they will have. No one knows which investments have such consequences. After all, an investment in today's low-cost housing may mean an investment in tomorrow's outrageous slum—and the benevolent university might find itself in the position of actually being a malevolent "slumlord."

In addition, of course, there are acts of pure philanthropy that a well-heeled institution ought to perform out of a sense of noblesse oblige. It would be both nice and proper if Harvard established and supported a free private school in the slums of Roxbury. On the other, I am appalled at suggestions that Harvard devote its resources to "solving the problems of ghetto education."

There are no grounds for thinking that Harvard's faculty members—even if they be in the School of Education—are any better at solving the problems of ghetto education than anyone else. (At the moment, indeed, the Harvard faculty would seem to have its hands full trying to solve the problems of Harvard education.) Yes, of course, there are individual scholars at Harvard who know a great deal about ghetto education. There are also scholars at Harvard who know a great deal about the sociology of the family, but that doesn't mean they'd necessarily make good marriage counselors. It only means their books ought to be read by marriage counselors.

Activities of the kind I have mentioned seem to me pretty much to exhaust the question of the university's corporate responsibilities to the community at large. There are, to be sure, a whole series of borderline cases. Should the university accept Government contracts for research? I see no way of giving an a priori answer to this question. If such contracts and such research fit into its educational program, I see no reason why a university shouldn't accept them—if it wants to. I don't see that it has any obligation to accept them. The Government can always get such research done outside the university, if it has to. And in this connection, I see no difference in principle in research for the Department of Agriculture and research for the Department of Defense. What counts is the way such research fits into the educational program of the university. It ought to go without saying that, if it has no relevance to education, then it has no place in the university.

The question—now agitating many minds—as to whether a university should take a position on the Vietnam war or some other controversial issue of the day strikes me as being simply beneath discussion. If critics of the Vietnam war can get an overwhelming majority of the faculty to sign an ad hoc statement in opposition to the war, why should they then insist that the university senate officially subscribe to such statement? Such official action only makes sense if it in some way binds the dissenting minority. Since it does nothing of the sort, its only meaning is the expectation that it might intimidate this minority into silence—through fear, through shame, through embarrassment. This is as neat a definition of McCarthyism as one can find. And, in truth, the present demand that the university, by a majority vote, take a stand on such political issues is nothing but an expression of McCarthyism from the Left. I repeat: it is nothing but that—no matter how many ingenious rationalizations are provided and no matter how self-righteous the proponents.

I do not wish to end on a negative note. I am aware that I have mainly been arguing what the responsibility of the university is not. Let me therefore propose a positive thought. The university does indeed have one major collective responsibility which it has been shamefully neglecting; this is its responsibility for education.

We are all of us aware that university education in the United States today is an utter shambles. We have all seen bright, young high-school graduates move on to our college campuses and, after only a relatively short period, display a feebler intellect, a less cultivated sensibility and a greater vulgarity of soul than either God or their parents bequeathed to them. I have a son who is now preparing to enter college and, frankly, I am heartsick at the thought that this young man—who may be a budding scholar—is going to have to live through four years at one of our institutions of higher learning. Other parents, I know, are similarly perplexed and distressed at the prospect of plunging their children into the psychedelic phantasmagoria of campus life, where the college chaplain is more likely to have faith in encounter therapy than in a mere deity.

Now, I know that this is a fearfully difficult situation. The university today must cope with a large, heterogeneous student body. It must confront a "counterculture" that often renders young minds impervious to the very idea of education. It must take into account the proliferation of scientific, social-scientific and quasi-scientific disciplines, and of the decay of the traditional conception of a curriculum. It must satisfy the demands of high-minded students, professionally minded students, vocationally-minded students and students who go to college with no ulterior—or even discernible—motive whatsoever.

All of this, and other things too, make for crisis and disarray. The faculty and administration of our universities cannot fairly be blamed for creating or provoking this crisis—though they often are so blamed, the human penchant for scapegoating being as powerful as it is. But they can be blamed for the pitiful inadequacy of their response. Why, one wonders, are practically all campus newspapers in the hands of the extreme left? Why are the student unions and student funds controlled by militant minorities? Why don't the administration and the faculty demand a student referendum on these matters—with compulsory voting, if that is needed to make student elections meaningful? The reason, I suspect, is that they fear the left would lose—and would then be even more troublesome than it is. So, fearful of democracy, they try bribery, with predictable results.

And where, one may ask, are the philosophies of education appropriate to our new condition? Where are even the intellectual controversies over the nature and function of higher education? Where are the bold definitions and redefinitions of the purpose of the curriculum? Where are the fine distinctions among the different kinds of education suitable for different kinds of students?

They are nowhere, so fas as I can see, though scholars are supposed to be good at precisely this sort of thing. Instead, we have endless committee meetings that result in a mindless shuffling and reshuffling of bits and pieces of the educational structure—together with an amiable willingness to label anything as education if that will only buy some temporary peace on the campus.

The collective responsibility of the university is education. That is its original mission, that is its original purpose, that is the only thing it can claim expertise or authority for. To return to this original purpose, with renewed seriousness, would be an action at once radical and constructive.

KEN KEATING, A GREAT AMBASSADOR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today's New York Times contains an article entitled "Indians Warm to Keating's Style," written by Sydney H. Schanberg, about our friend and former colleague Kenneth Keating, who is now Ambassador to India.

There are many from the school, who believe that the State Department and American embassies should be run on the model of an outdated British diplomacy, who deplore the appointment of noncareer ambassadors.

Ken Keating's stewardship in New Delhi is the complete rebuttal to that rather old fashioned and stuffy point of view. He exemplifies the very best in the tradition that noncareer appointees make the very best ambassadors. And no country has had a more distinguished list of such ambassadors than has India—John Sherman Cooper, John Kenneth Galbraith, Chester Bowles, and now Ken Keating.

Ken Keating is exactly what the job calls for. He is a genuine friend of the Indians. He represents the very best in American public life. And he is a warm, ebullient, outgoing Ambassador who gives the job the extra dimension which is needed; namely, not only a representative from Government to Government, but a representative from the people of the United States to the people of India.

His methods may not always endear themselves to the hidebound, traditional, career hands of the Department of State. But I can say without question that his friends and colleagues in the U.S. Senate believe that Ken Keating's methods exemplify everything that is best in the relationship both between countries and between peoples.

As a House Member for 12 years, as a U.S. Senator for 6 years, as a justice of the New York State Court of Appeals, as a warm human being, and as a man with a quick and responsive sense of humor, he embodies all those qualities which make a good Ambassador, a good citizen, and a good man.

We need more like him.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 23, 1970]

INDIANS WARM TO KEATING'S STYLE

(By Sydney H. Schanberg)

NEW DELHI, March 22.—Threeeeeep! Threeeeeep! Threeeeeep! Threeeeeep! a shrill call pierces the quiet of New Delhi's lengthening dusk. Is it the hoopoe bird calling to its mate or the white-cheeked bulbul practicing its song?

Not even close. It's Kenneth B. Keating, the United States Ambassador to India, calling his 50 guests to dinner—with a police whistle.

The whistle is only one of many unorthodox touches Mr. Keating has brought to diplomatic life here, and while traditionalists in his embassy wince, the 69-year-old former Republican Senator and judge from Rochester, N.Y., is charming the Indians and having a good time doing it.

Even his recent no-nonsense criticism of the Indian Government's decision to close down five American cultural centers has not dampened the warmth Indian officials feel for him.

"We consider him a friend, beyond question," an official at the External Affairs Ministry says in a typical comment, "a warm, congenial, open-minded, open-hearted man. They couldn't have made a better choice."

Which is a long way from the somewhat disappointed remarks the Indians were making when Mr. Keating replaced Chester Bowles nearly nine months ago and when they had the impression that he was a relatively unknown, relatively undistinguished politician who had no particular influence with the President.

Mr. Keating—who looks like central casting's idea of the perfect ambassador, with his elegant shock of white hair and his pipe and boutonniere—had spent those nine months barnstorming around the country in the embassy's two-engine Convair, shaking hands, waving at crowds, making speeches, holding news conferences.

He makes no apologies about being a political animal. On the contrary, he revels in it.

When he was planning a trip to volatile Calcutta some time ago, he heard that the Communists were preparing to greet him with a "black-flag" protest demonstration over the Vietnam war. The Ambassador stuffed a black silk handkerchief into his pocket to wave back at the black flags, but the demonstration never materialized, and he said later, only half-joking, that he was "a little disappointed."

There was one angry man in the Calcutta crowd, however, who kept screaming: "Yankee yellow dog—go home!" Though the Ambassador waved good-naturedly at him, the police hauled him in. Mr. Keating got him out the next day with a letter to the authorities arguing that "he incited no one" and that dissent was "the right of every man."

In similar style a month later, while introducing the Apollo 11 astronauts to a huge Bombay crowd, he decided to add the words "Jai America!" (Hail America!) to the "Jai Hind!" (Hail India!), which is the usual ending of patriotic speeches here. The crowd roared its approval.

"My staff didn't like the idea," Mr. Keating said, "but the crowd voted against the staff. So the old ham had to play up to the crowd."

SOME VOICE RESERVATIONS

Some career Foreign Service officers at the 550-man embassy frown at the Ambassador's flamboyant methods.

They contend he spends too much time "still running for office" and "seeing how many inches he got in the local papers" and too little time on important policy matters—such as how to put the diminishing aid money to the best use here and how to persuade Congress to stop diminishing it.

"He's not interested in Indian sociology or the dynamics of a developing agricultural society under stress," said a critic. "He's status quo conscious—unrest makes him uncomfortable. He sees everything as a political issue, and then only as it relates to his personal success or failure. This might be good short term for him, but it's bad long term for the United States."

Still other critics say his effectiveness as a listening post is hampered by the fact that he does not meet with any of the political opponents of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, seeking out only her friends.

Many of the complaints, endemic in the small-town atmosphere of all diplomatic communities, seem overdrawn.

Even the strongest critics of his style concede that in his primary function of explaining President Nixon's low-profile-in-Asia policy to India, and Indian policy to the White House, Mr. Keating has been successful.

They also agree that while he does more entertaining than information gathering in his meetings with Indian bigwigs, "he butters them up and makes it easier for other embassy officers to get things out of them later."

His fans insist flatly that a politician, not an intellectual, is what the Delhi post needs in the present supercharged Indian political atmosphere. And critics and fans alike applaud his straight-talking toward the Indian Government.

"It's great to be free of the old Bowlesian syndrome where we had to be soft on India and love the place all the time," said one embassy hand.

Soon after Mr. Keating arrived, he established his credentials as a friend of India—with an interview in The New York Times backing Mrs. Gandhi's socialist policies that got wide notice here—and he has since used this as a talking point when he has something critical to say.

"The interview did me more good than any single thing I've done," he says. "Now, if something comes up, like the closing of these cultural centers, where I think they're wrong, I go to them as a friend and they know that. I don't mince words. And I can really talk, I think, more forcefully as a friend."

The cultural center episode is only a facet of a larger issue—Washington's concern that India too often draws her foreign policy inspiration from the Soviet Union. "I think it's important," says Mr. Keating, "to keep this country nonaligned."

For a man of his years the Ambassador keeps a long working day—rising at 7:30 a.m. and going to bed around midnight still carrying office reading with him.

Asked if he had given any thoughts to slowing his pace or retiring, he blurts: "No. Hell, I'd die."

To keep fit—he is 5 feet 9½ and weighs 155 pounds—he jogs three or four hundred steps in his bathroom in the morning and makes a daily ritual of the sauna bath and outdoor pool in the spacious backyard of Roosevelt House, the ambassadorial residence.

When possible he takes an hour's nap in the early evening before going out to the inevitable dinner or reception. He himself gives a dinner about once a week at Roosevelt House; dessert often includes fudge, a Keating favorite.

At the office, he always dresses in a suit, no matter how intense the Delhi heat—a practice that brought to an end, to the chagrin of some of the staff, the more casual Bowlesian era of "bushshirt diplomacy."

STAFF DRIVEN HARD

Mr. Keating says that he drives his staff hard—in particular, his able 39-year-old special assistant, Richard N. Viets, who seems to thrive on it.

The Ambassador has no particular hobbies. His reading is confined almost entirely to office papers. "I don't read more than two books in a year at the present rate," he says, somewhat guiltily. The unread volumes at his bedside include a book of poetry the State Department sent him as part of its cultural program for ambassadors.

Being a widower, Mr. Keating sometimes drafts a standin hostess from the embassy community, such as Dr. Margaret Clapp, the cultural attaché who is a former president of Wellesley College, or Marina Viets, the wife of his special assistant.

His humor is gently bawdy and he likes to tease, especially women.

The other day he and Dr. Clapp were having lunch with his daughter and son-in-law, visiting from New Jersey, and the Ambassador mentioned that he had been photographed in his pajamas that morning for a newspaper story.

"Which pajamas?" Miss Clapp asked, kiddingly.

EXCHANGE BRINGS BLUSH

"My blue ones," he shot back, "you know the ones." Her blush set him chortling.

One of the Ambassador's favorite pastimes is reminiscing about his career—his first stay in India, 1943 to 1946, as an officer in the Allies' Southeast Asia Command in New Delhi, his subsequent days in Washington as a Representative (12 years) and Senator (six years), and finally his three and a half years as a justice on New York's highest tribunal, the Court of Appeals, which he forsook for the ambassadorship because "I found it too sedentary for my body chemistry."

Mr. Keating, a lawyer and a moderate Republican, frankly confesses that while he is enjoying himself here, he would rather be back in politics. (He was defeated in his bid for a second term in the Senate, which he terms "the greatest institution in the world," in 1964, by Robert F. Kennedy.)

"I'd like to be able to accomplish more," he says of his ambassadorship. "I don't feel fully fulfilled, because sometimes I would like to hit the rafters—when he is annoyed with Indian policy—like you would as a Senator. Well, you can't do that here. I've got to button up my mouth and pull in my horns."

PRESIDENT MOVES FIRMLY IN POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I commend President Nixon for his timely and courageous action in calling out the Army to handle the mail crisis in New York City.

Moving with strength into the biggest and most crucial crisis, he has let all striking postal workers everywhere know that he means business and that, if necessary, he will take the steps to meet any other mail strike crisis anywhere in the Nation.

At the same time, the President has repeated his offer to negotiate in good faith, so I hope the number of strikers returning to work will increase and before long include those in New York making actual use of the military unnecessary.

I should also point out that in this entire crisis the leaders of the postal unions have opposed the wildcat strikes throughout the country.

Once again, we have been privileged to witness a President at work who is determined to meet his constitutional responsibilities to the American people, a President who cannot and will not be intimidated, a President who is fully capable of dealing with crisis situations. I applaud the President's action and publicly express to him my support. It is clear now that the issue of postal reform and deteriorating mail service must be resolved. I call upon Congress to meet this crisis at the earliest possible time.

A DISTINGUISHED JURIST SPEAKS OUT ON FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, recently a considerable amount of debate has taken place on the floor of the Senate about the American involvement in the war in Laos. One would think that the Nation which similarly drifted into the tragic, immoral and costly war in Vietnam would be very careful about involvement in the conflicts in any other nation in Southeast Asia or in any other part of the globe.

Recently, I received a letter from Judge W. C. Boyd, district judge of the 16th judicial district of Texas at Denton, Tex. Although it is a brief letter, I think it gives an indication of the concern that many of our more thoughtful citizens feel about our continuing involvement in Southeast Asia. Judge Boyd is recognized in Texas as an able concerned jurist, who rates high with bench and bar.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter dated February 18, 1970, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

W. C. BOYD,
Denton, Tex., February 18, 1970.

Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR RALPH YARBOROUGH: Instead of disengaging and getting out of Viet Nam, as he promised, Nixon is now expanding the war openly into Laos and covertly into Cambodia and Thailand.

Every responsible voice in Congress must be raised in protest to expansion of this war, and raised in demanding that we disengage and get out of Viet Nam forthwith. We know that we can depend on you.

We feel so impotent and vulnerable, please let us know if there is anything we, as citizens, can do.

Yours truly,

W. C. BOYD,
District Judge, 16th Judicial District of Texas.

VIOLENCE ON THE CAMPUS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on relatively few of the 2,500 campuses in America has trouble been caused by students or faculty. In spite of this, one depending on the media for news gets the impression that every campus is beset with incomparable, uncontrollable problems.

We in Arizona are very proud of our three major universities because the strength of the leadership of these schools has prevented the type of violence generally but wrongly associated with students and faculty alike.

Recently, at the University of Arizona there was a disturbance at the gymnasium because the university was playing Brigham Young University, which is a Mormon school. The display went past decent and normal bounds protected by the right of petition and the right of assembly. The president of the university, Richard Harvill, in his usual strong and wise manner, rejected the unreasonable demands made by the perpetrators of the trouble. His statement, which was contained in the student newspaper, the Arizona Daily Wildcat, indicates the kind of strength that I think is needed on the relatively few campuses where the leadership has either not been able to or has refused to keep the small handful of demonstrators in line.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of his message be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FROM PRESIDENT RICHARD A. HARVILL: A LETTER TO THE UNIVERSITY COMMUNITY

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—The following is the complete text of University President Richard A. Harvill's message following his rejection of UFO demands.)

This statement is addressed to the university community. In it are comments concerning the nature of a university, relationships with Brigham Young University, and the matter of communications within this institution. There is also a brief comment on the incident at Bear Down Gymnasium.

DEMANDS

Traditionally the university has closely guarded the right of faculty and students to pursue knowledge without interference or intimidation. It has done this out of the long-established tradition that an open-minded approach to knowledge through fact and reason is the only basis upon which education can be built. The university has deliberately developed within its community a high regard for rational processes. It seeks to recognize intelligence and reason. It resists intimidation, demands, and compulsion.

Demands upon the university are not consistent with these traditions. A demand betrays a rigidity of thinking and a dogmatic assurance inimical to the intellectual processes that are the hallmark of a university. Those who present demands assume their own infallibility, virtue, and rationality.

BYU

Certain groups and individuals have called upon the University of Arizona to terminate relationships with Brigham Young University because of alleged racial discrimination.

The whole question of the correctness of this institution's relationships with Brigham Young University needs clarification. It is essential that the policies of Brigham Young University concerning minority students not be confused with the doctrines of the Mormon Church. The Mormon Church is not a member of the Western Athletic Conference. Brigham Young University must be judged on the way it admits and deals with students. This judgment has already been made by the Office of Civil Rights, March 27, 1969, when it found Brigham Young University to be in full compliance with civil rights legislation.

A number of outstanding programs have been developed at Provo for students from varying ethnic backgrounds. The institution enrolled, for example, 279 American Indian students the first semester of this academic year. More than 1000 students were enrolled from 70 countries other than the United States. Black students are actively being recruited. The relatively limited black enrollment at Brigham Young University is occasioned in part by the very small number of black families living in Provo and the comparatively small black population in the state of Utah. It is partly because of public misunderstanding regarding the policies and practices of Brigham Young University.

The regulations under which the Western Athletic Conference operates stipulate that even if a member institution withdraws from the Conference, it would be required to engage in scheduled athletic events with all members institutions through the term of its binding agreements. The University of Arizona has binding agreements to play football with Brigham Young University and other Conference teams through the 1974-75 school year. It has similar obligations to play Conference basketball games through the 1971–72 academic year.

The University of Arizona cannot commit itself to the special crusades of any group. It must remain a forum for the presentation and free discussion of ideas and principles. Part of its role is to permit and encourage the presentation of all sides of an issue. A university certainly cannot allow itself to be made an official instrument for evaluation of religious doctrines. If it does this in the case of one church, it could conceivably be called upon to do the same thing in other cases.

BEAR DOWN INCIDENT

There have been requests that the University of Arizona administration bring about the revision or elimination of charges filed as a result of the January 8th incident at the gymnasium. This is something the University administration cannot do. Furthermore, it cannot discuss the matter in detail for fear of prejudicing the positions of those involved as parties in the cases now before the courts.

COMMUNICATIONS

Much has been said lately about communication on this campus. Obviously, this is a topic which merits continued attention. This institution has changed radically from what it was fifteen or twenty years ago, when most members of the university community knew each other personally and communication was easy, informal and effective. As the University takes on a greater variety of responsibilities, communication becomes more complex and greater delegation of responsibility and authority becomes necessary.

These are reasons that the University has set up channels which provide for the expression and exchange of viewpoint by students, faculty, staff, and administrators and for the orderly conveyance of those viewpoints to the various groups comprising the university community. There are many channels: most faculty members consider it part of their professional responsibility to talk with and listen to students and to transmit their complaints or suggestion to department heads, deans or administrative officials; a number of administrative officers (such as those of the Dean of Men and the Dean of Women) exist solely to serve students; the Vice President for University relations has been delegated a large measure of responsibility in dealing with students; student representation on departmental, college, and universitywide committees has increased; the academic deans and their staffs offer a variety of counseling services. The list could be extended. The point is that the communication network within the University is not neatly hierarchial; there are crisscrossing lines of communication which allow for redress of grievances and discussion of issues.

What needs to be clearly understood, however, is that not all of those lines need be connected directly to the President's office. The president of a university cannot and should not be personally involved in every decision relating to the governance of the institution. He has neither the time nor the encyclopedic knowledge to act judiciously in every such case. Consequently, it is both necessary and desirable that many decisions and responsibilities be delegated to the faculty, the students, and other administrative officials.

Furthermore, it is naive to assume that the president has unlimited authority to act on suggestions and demands for changes in the governance or programs of the University. He clearly does not. Certain prerogatives, particularly those pertaining to academic matters, belong to the faculty and to committees made up of faculty, students and administrators; the Board of Regents exercises many legal controls; ASUA has been entrusted with many responsibilities; and the president of any university is reluctant to overturn regularly the decisions of responsible administrative officials.

For these and other reasons, certain types of inter-university communication which have been suggested are of dubious value. For example, a "town hall" meeting consisting of remarks by the president and questions and criticisms from the audience would likely prove disappointing. If a very large percentage of the university community turned out, the opportunities for a rational exchange of ideas appear slim.

Continuing attention needs to be given to the problem of communications. Some weeks ago the general faculty established an ad hoc committee to study ways of improving communication among students, faculty and administration. Several other groups have also come forward with suggestions and proposals. I am confident that out of these studies and recommendations will come a good, workable plan.

ACADEMIC FREEDOM

In conclusion I would like to add that the task of the president of a large institution is never a simple one. He cannot please all segments of the university at all times. It is not possible for him to attend to all matters personally. He must exercise his discretion about the most effective utilization of his time.

There are, however, certain responsibilities he must carry out, regardless of criticism, in order that the university continue to thrive. Among them, he must assure responsible freedom of speech in the classroom and on the campus. He must hold this position against all outside criticism and pressure. This he has always done and will continue to do.

At the same time he must protect the property of the state and insure that the activities of the university community are employed to resist those who would use force and violence to achieve their goals. Force and violence which disrupt the process of the university community will be resisted.

Presidents of a number of institutions across the nation have indicated that failure to act immediately to prevent disruptions on their campuses precipitated further disturbances. It is important that violence and disruption be avoided on this campus. Forceful interference with the right of others cannot be tolerated in any community.

WORLD ARMS BILL SINCE 1964: $1 TRILLION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency has just issued a disconcerting report. It shows that in the last 6 years more than $1 trillion has been spent by governments around the world for arms, armament, and military forces.

It shows that the rate of spending on arms is still increasing. While the rate of increase has slowed somewhat for the big, developed countries, the developing countries have been increasing their spending on arms and armanments at a rate which is twice the rate of increase of the world as a whole.

The study further shows that while the standard of living of individuals in the world has remained almost stable in real terms, the per capita burden of military spending has been increasing. Last year it averaged $56 for every man, woman, and child in the world.

The world spent as much for armaments as it did for all forms of public education and health.

The biggest spenders in actual amounts were the members of NATO and of the Warsaw Pact. What a peaceful dividend could come to the peoples of the world if these two great power blocs could end their differences and if mutual reduction of armaments could occur.

But the countries spending the largest proporation of their national income on arms and armaments—10 percent or more per year—were smaller nations in the eye of the hurricane and at the center of the world trouble spots.

Mr. President, it is time for mutual deescalation of terror. It is time for thoughtful men and for thoughtful countries to stop the mad rush to oblivion. The world must soon come to its senses. We need not only to reorder priorities at home, but it is obvious that the world and all mankind must reorder its priorities if food, health, and education, rather than the armament makers, are to eat up the treasure of the world.

I ask unanimous consent that an article reporting on the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency's report, and published in today's New York Times, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 22, 1970]

WORLD ARMS BILL: TRILLION SINCE 1964—REPORT SAYS SPENDING RISES SHARPLY IN SMALL NATIONS

(By Robert M. Smith)

WASHINGTON.—More than a trillion dollars has been spent for arms and armed forces around the world over the last six years, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency reports.

In a new study, the agency finds that the increase in arms expenditures of the big countries has slowed somewhat in the last two years while the amounts spent by the developing countries have increased sharply. The military budgets of the small countries seem to be growing at a rate twice as high as the world total.

The report also discloses that although the world's economic standard of living has improved little in real terms in the last six years, the per capita burden of military spending has increased.

The figures show that military spending last year averaged $56 for every person in the world. This breaks down to an average of $179 for every person in the developed countries and $10 for every person in the developing countries.

RATE OF INCREASE SLOWS

"The diversion of resources to military purposes had expanded in step with the world's capacity to produce" says the Arms Control Agency's fourth annual report on world military expenditure. The organization is an independent agency of the United States Government.

The one hopeful note in the 26-page report is that between 1965 and 1967, world military spending rose at the rate of 13 per cent a year; in 1968 and 1969, it rose only 5 per cent a year.

"If the pattern of the last two years continues," the report says, "it will mean some reduction in the ratio of military spending to world income."

"On the other hand," it continues, "it will take more than a diminished rate of increase to lessen significantly the heavy economic burden of world military expenditures. If recent spending patterns continue, the nations of the world by the end of the seventies will be devoting more than $300-billion a year to defense."

$200 BILLION SPENT IN '69

The six-year total of world military spending took as much public money, according to the report, "as was spent by all governments on all forms of public education and health care."

Some $200-billion was spent on the world's arms and armies last year. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization accounted for $108-billion of this total; the Warsaw Pact nations, $63-billion.

Each bloc spent some $3-billion more than in 1968. Given inflation, however, this represents no increase. In fact, the NATO outlays went down $2-billion if inflation is considered.

On the other hand, the military budgets of countries outside these blocs accounted for an increasing proportion of the money the world spent on arms.

"Military budgets of these countries appeared to be growing at a rate more than twice that of the world total," the report says. This reflects "an accelerated arms race among the developing countries," it says.

COUNTRIES LISTED

The study also points out that it took half of all the people in the world to produce a share of all the worlds' goods and services equal to that devoted to military outlays.

The study reports that the following countries spent more than 10 per cent of their total output of goods and services, or gross national product, on their armed forces: Laos, United Arab Republic, North Vietnam, South Vietnam, Taiwan, Iraq, Jordan, North Korea, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Israel.

The following spent between 5 and 10 per cent of their gross product: Burma, Somali Republic, Cambodia, Mainland China, Albania, Iran, Mongolia, Portugal, Cuba, Poland, Soviet Union, France, United Kingdom, Kuwait, and United States.

Spending less than 1 per cent of their gross product were Malawi, Nepal, Sierra Leone, Costa Rica, Peru, Jamaica, Mexico, Panama, Trinidad and Tobago, Japan and Iceland.

The data in the report came mostly from statistics prepared by the United States Agency for International Development and such international agencies as the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the World Health Organization.

BILINGUAL SCHOOL REACHING TRUANTS IN BOSTON

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the value of the bilingual education program established in 1968 is becoming evident wherever there are children in school whose language at home is other than English.

One such success story about Spanish-speaking children in Boston is told in the New York Times. The parents of these children have come from Puerto Rico. An estimated 5,000 of the 7,800 school-age children in this population group were not in school when this bilingual program was created.

I point out that the instigation for bilingual teaching in this instance came from the local education development center, one of the regional laboratories created in the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. Before the President calls for extensive new machinery for educational research and evaluation, I suggest that he review his own budget restrictions that resulted in the closing of five of the 20 regional laboratories, which are now doing much of the task the President thinks is needed.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the story entitled "A Bilingual School Reaching Truants in Boston," published in the New York Times of March 14, 1970.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BILINGUAL SCHOOL REACHING TRUANTS IN BOSTON

(By M. A. Farber)

BOSTON, March 13.—A bilingual school for Spanish-speaking children who are shunning regular classes or failing to progress in them has been started by the Boston School Committee at the urging of a federally funded education laboratory here.

The school board acted at the behest of the Education Development Center, one of 15 private, nonprofit regional education laboratories, authorized by the Government five years ago to aid in the discovery, testing and dissemination of new educational ideas and programs.

Activities of the regional laboratories account for nearly a fourth of the $100-million spent annually by the United States Office of Education for research and development. These activities receiving particular scrutiny in Washington now in connection with President Nixon's recent demand for a more productive and "coherent" approach to education spending.

MADE OUT OF SCHOOL

Last year the laboratory here began mounting pressure for the model bilingual "transitional" school when surveys led it to conclude that 5,000 of the city's 7,800 Puerto Ricans 6 to 18 years old were not going to school while hundreds of others were "vegetating" in classes that could not help them.

"Unless a concerted, extensive and extended effort is made to see that Spanish-speaking children can succeed in school and remain in school to enter the working force at the highest level of their ability, we will be the architects of a massive welfare subculture," the center said.

The laboratory says the failure of Puerto Rican youths to attend school can be attributed to an amalgam of factors: acute language difficulties; boredom and despair from sitting in classes with younger students; apathy of parents who may be illiterate; inadequate food and clothing, and fear of physical harm in a supposedly "hostile" environment.

RISE IN POPULATION

A center official, who asked not to be identified, said that the problem was compounded by the reluctance of some Puerto Ricans to have social contact with Negroes.

A study by the laboratory found that there were 1,200 Puerto Ricans in Boston in 1960, chiefly in the South End. Today the number is estimated to be at least 20,000, with increasingly large Spanish-speaking populations in Roxbury and North Dorchester, predominantly Negro neighborhoods. The future, the study said, "points to tremendous growth, especially in the school age segment."

In New York City, the latest figures available show 240,746 Puerto Rican pupils were enrolled in the public schools in 1968, or 21.5 per cent of the total enrollment. In 1957, the first ethnic census showed 128,980 Puerto Rican pupils, or 13.5 per cent.

PROGRAMS IN NEW YORK

Several New York City public schools have bilingual programs for Spanish-speaking pupils, and the Boston effort is concerned with developing a prototype for such programs.

The Boston laboratory, which has its headquarters in nearby Newton, chose to initiate the undertaking in its own metropolitan area, working closely with Sister Frances Georgia of the Boston Diocese Urban Planning Office.

Last month the school, using three rented buildings, opened with 150 Spanish-speaking students 5 to 15 years old, 12 bilingual teachers and eight teachers' aides. The center had spent $60,000 in the planning phase; the city recently allocated $200,000 for the first year of operation.

Denison House, in Roxbury, is one of the school sites. The three-story structure had been abandoned as a regular school, and the grime on its sullen, red brick exterior is further testament to age and disregard. Inside, however, Denison House is very much alive—too lively, in fact, for some discipline-minded Puerto Rican parents.

On the first floor, bright pink walls bear pictures of "Los Animales" next to the English alphabet and drawings by pupils, and the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. looks down from the calendar supplied by Arrington's Fruit and Vegetable Market.

"Que color es este?" repeats Rose Amodeo, a dark-haired, 25-year-old teacher who came to her present job after two years as a Peace Corps volunteer in Colombia. The pupil, Jose, she has found, does not know any colors except red. "Enséname un triángulo rojo," she continues.

GETTING USED TO SCHOOL

Few people associated with the new school talk much about academic advancement at this stage, but they note that the children are there. "The learning situation is frustrating for them at the start," Miss Amodeo observed, "but we're getting them used to coming to school now."

The center's promotion of the school, viewed as a waystation preparing pupils for regular classes, in part of the laboratory's plan for "total intervention" in educational affairs here, from curriculum revision to teacher training to community assistance.

Formed in 1967 by a merger of Education Services, Inc., and the Institute for Educational Innovation, the center is nationally known for its curriculum projects, particularly in science, mathematics and social studies.

"We still see curriculum as a key thing," said Mrs. Mary Lela Sherburne, director of the center's pilot communities program, including the transitional school.

DEALING WITH VARIABLES

"But the sum is greater than its parts," Mrs. Sherburne, a 40-year-old biologist, went on. "And if you're going to change schools, you have to deal with all the variables. Before we were taking a limited view, now we're fixing on a variety of leverage points."

Robert R. Hind, the laboratory's president, said, "If you want to renew the schools generally, you must go into that system as a friend. It's the only way."

Dr. Hind warned against severely limited programs of aid that, he said, often aroused "feelings of being used" in the community and among teachers and administrators. "Until you can work in the schools without being suspects," he remarked, "the most elegant curriculum you might install won't be worth a damn."

THE FEDERAL APPROACH

The Nixon's Administration's desire for a more comprehensive and coordinated Federal approach to educational research and development is not unlike the goal set by President Johnson in 1966, after the regional laboratories were approved in Title IV of the Elementray and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

The laboratories, numbering 20 until five were cut off from Federal funds in a budget squeeze last year, have focused on early childhood programs, instructional techniques for teachers, new curriculums and "individualized" learning, and a host of other educational matters—with mixed success.

NO EROSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the American Jewish Committee recently issued a statement warning that without the explicit commitment of Government leaders to equality and justice, progress toward those goals is slowed if not halted.

As we await the President's message on school desegregation scheduled to be delivered this week, the committee's statement, made by David Sher, chairman of the organization's board of governors, reminds us that each individual should be committed to building a united yet pluralistic society.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statement by the American Jewish Committee be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EQUALITY AND JUSTICE

The American struggle for equality and justice is the essence of what our nation is all about. It is therefore critical that our governmental institutions and leaders be unalterably committed to these goals. When they falter, the national resolve is weakened and progress is halted.

We commend the Administration for its leadership in the development of new and creative welfare legislation. We are heartened by the Administration's condemnation of the recent violence attendant to school integration in Lamar, South Carolina.

However, other recent events provide us with reason for great concern. Unless the direction indicated by these events is reversed, we face a dangerous erosion of a decade of slow but significant progress in achieving an improvement in the condition of minority groups in this nation.

We refer to the Administration and Congressional efforts to achieve a slowdown in school desegregation. We have always opposed de facto segregation as well as de jure segregation. But the most serious predictable consequence of the Stennis amendment will be that de facto segregation will not be affected while the slow process of reducing de jure segregation will be halted.

We refer to the Administration's attempt to weaken the Voting Rights Act.

We refer to the incident in which the Director of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Health, Welfare and Education was forced to resign because he fought too vigorously to enforce school desegregation.

We refer to the Civil Service Commission's Chairman's statement that the Administration would now ease pressure on government job opportunities for minority workers—a statement which caused great consternation despite the fact that he was soon forced to retract it.

The gains that America made in civil rights in the past 15 years came as a result of firm and committed leadership. That leadership is not furthered by recommendations for "benign neglect," which tend too accurately to reflect the pattern of recent deterioration in the field of human rights. To close the remaining gap—which is still tremendous—we need the same kind of firm resolute leadership, not only of government, but of the religious community, business, labor, and the minority groups themselves.

The American Jewish Committee maintains its faith that America can be a unified and yet pluralist society. It will support steps aimed at eliminating the remaining legal barriers to an integrated society while strengthening those programs for full and fair housing, welfare, education, and jobs, which could eliminate the basic conditions that bring about de facto segregation and inequality. We call upon our fellow Jews and Americans to stand firm against the growing tide which is eroding the significance of major Supreme Court decision, of vital civil rights legislation, and of the interreligous and interracial unity that forged a vibrant and effective civil rights movement.

PURIFICATION OF THE NATION'S WATERS

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the words "environment" and "pollution" have become national bywords. They are the subject of campus teach-ins, political speeches, great public indignation over oil spills, they receive the legislative attention of Congress, and less often the budgetary consideration of the Executive.

The earliest attack upon environmental pollution was in 1956, when the first Water Pollution Control Act was passed by Congress. But although cleaning up the national water supply has had the first priority, and the most money spent on it, we are hardly keeping water purity from getting worse.

The New York Times of March 17 outlines the extent of the problem remaining before us in controlling water pollution. It should be read by every interested person, because it sets forth the financial dimension of pollution abatement. The cost of cleaning up just the waterways will be staggering. The question of "national priorities" can no longer be simply a debating point, if we are to take seriously the necessity of a livable and civilized natural environment.

I ask unanimous consent that the Times article, entitled "Purification of Nation's Waters Expected To Be Long and Costly," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURIFICATION OF NATION'S WATERS EXPECTED TO BE LONG AND COSTLY

(By Gladwin Hill)

Federal experts are finding that restoration of the nation's waters to something approaching satisfactory cleanliness is many years—and many billions of dollars—in the future.

Into a computer at the Interior Department's Federal Pollution Control Administration's building, overlooking the dirty Potomac River, these experts have fed reams of figures that can instantly give a statistical profile of sewage-plant construction in Buffalo or recapitulate Federal grants to the state of Michigan.

Up to now, according to the officials who must translate the data into action, the computer has presented this picture:

The condition of the nation's waterways is disheartening, perhaps worse than a decade ago.

The over-all problem is being aggravated by new types of pollution.

Current plans to step up antipollution efforts are promising, but their realization hinges on forthcoming judgments of Congress on some highly controversial questions.

President Nixon, in his environmental message of Feb. 10, outlined a $10-billion, four-year plan for new sewage plants ($4-billion in Federal subsidies, $6-billion to come from states and localities); a system of new financing aid to localities, and greatly expanded Federal authority in combating water pollution.

No one familiar with the problem is suggesting that this will be a cure-all. Ten billion dollars is only a drop in the nation's bucket of dirty water. The cost of cleaning up Lake Michigan alone has been expertly estimated as high as $10-billion. The ultimate prospective cost of cleaning all the nation's waterways is out of sight, somewhere beyond $100-billion.

"But this new program is the springboard we need," says Carl L. Klein, the burly, aggressive Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Water Quality and Research.

The water section of President Nixon's message came right from Mr. Klein's desk, and the former Illinois lawyer-legislator comments buoyantly: "We went for broke in what we asked. And the White House bought it."

HEARING TO BEGIN SOON

Typical of a dozen major proposals in bills that Congressional Committees will soon begin hearings on is a potentially controversial provision extending Federal pollution abatement powers from interstate waters to virtually all waters of the country.

Another is a requirement that the states establish "effluent standards," or permissible discharge limits, for each and every pollution source—standards subject to Federal approval.

These are radical steps, measured against fast pollution-control measures, and they are expected to elicit opposition of many sorts from members of Congress, states, cities and industry. It has taken years of argument and maneuvering simply to shape a law covering the relatively uncontroversial problem of maritime oil spills.

A complicating element in the whole outlook is the fact that Mr. Nixon's party does not control Congress. Moreover, the chief Congressional shepherd of water pollution legislation for years has been Maine's Senator Edmund Muskie, who has criticized the Nixon program as inadequate and who is a putative electoral opponent of the President.

But the sweeping new proposals were conceived as vital to getting pollution abatement off what Assistant Secretary Klein calls "dead center."

REASON FOR CONCERN

Why all the attention to dirty water when, with modern drinking water systems, instances of death or sickness have become almost nonexistent?

Essentially the reason is that the nation needs clean water not only for drinking but also for industry, agriculture and recreation.

In the last two decades, waterways became so overburdened with fluid refuse as to point toward only one conclusion: a day not far off when rivers and lakes would be nothing but open sewers.

It was evident to all concerned that rehabilitating enough water for domestic and commercial uses would be problematical or prohibitively expensive and that the natural attributes serving recreation—fish and plant life and general beauty—might be destroyed forever.

Federal efforts against large-scale water pollution date to 1956, when a law set forth what has become known as the "conference procedure." Under this, Federal officials step into an interstate pollution situation, join with state officials in a public hearing on conditions and formulate a scheduled corrective program theoretically enforceable by Federal court action.

PROGRAM OF INCENTIVES

Using this procedure, 50 formal abatement actions have been instituted, involving most of the states, 2,000 communities and 2,000 industrial sources.

This policing action was coupled with an incentive program: Federal subsidies to localities to cover up to 55 per cent of construction costs of sewage treatment facilities. Some 9,000 projects have been so aided.

Secretary of the Interior Stewart L. Udall calculated in 1968 that this carrot-and-stick approach had brought improvement to upward of 50,000 miles of waterways.

But with population, industry and the volume of pollutants increasing by the day, these tactics began to appear glaringly insufficient.

There is general agreement that the subsidy program has been hamstrung by Federal budget-cutting. The conference procedure has proved cumbersome and slow. Abatement actions have dragged on for years while Federal officials tried to cajole, prod and cudgel state authorities—many of them plainly under the influence of polluters—into taking decisive action.

Progressive segments of industry have spent hundreds of millions of dollars on pollution abatement. Hundreds of municipalities have improved their sewerage systems. New York State alone mounted a billion-dollar water cleanup program, as the first phase of what Governor Rockefeller sees as a $3-billion task.

But such activities seemed neither extensive enough nor coherent enough. A factory's reduction of its discharges into a river might be offset by increased emissions from an overtaxed sewage plant.

ACCOUNTING OFFICE STUDY

A Federal General Accounting Office study last year concluded that despite the expenditure of $1.2-billion in Federal grants and $4.2-billion by localities for new sewage treatment facilities, there had not been improvement in the quality of the nation's waterways.

"In the last 10 years," says David D. Dominick, the youthful, bespectacled Commissioner of the Federal Water Pollution Control Administration, "the quality of the nation's water has probably degenerated."

While it has always been assumed that community water systems could transform even tainted supplies into something harmless and potable, that assurance is wearing thin.

"Our treatment plants," says Dr. C. C. Johnson, head of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's consumer protection division, "are not designed for, nor are they prepared to take the chemical onslaught now coming from our streams."

For evidence, most citizens need look no farther than the nearest river. The only conspicuously unsullied streams in the country are the few that have been insulated in the Federal "Wild Rivers" wilderness preservation program.

The Hudson's lower reaches are filthy. Major rivers like the Ohio, the Mississippi and the Missouri are still heavily polluted. The Detroit River, the Cuyahoga at Cleveland, and the Houston ship canal are essentially industrial, sewers. Lake Erie, in scientists' estimation, is an ecological disaster area. Lake Michigan is heavily contaminated in some areas. Even the clarity of Lake Superior is threatened.

All of these situations and many others are theoretically in the course of improvement under Federal abatement actions. But abatement involves design, engineering and construction—a process measured in years, not months. Polluters haggle endlessly with state and Federal officials over their technical and financial capabilities.

A new industrial facility can, generally speaking, incorporate proper waste-water treatment for no more than 10 per cent of total construction costs. With an old facility, economically marginal already, a big corrective outlay may be a back breaker. This is when the foot-dragging sets in, mainly.

NEED FOR MONEY CITED

Many communities have long since bonded themselves to the limit for public facilities. They plead that they just can't raise the money for the new sewage plant they need.

According to the latest data of the pollution control agency, only some 140 million of the nation's 200 million people are served by any kind of sewer system. The sewage of nearly 7 per cent of those 140 million, including many right in New York City, is discharged "raw," or untreated. With only about 85 million of the nation's people does sewage get the "secondary," or two-stage, treatment now considered minimal.

Yet many states have resisted Federal intervention. Iowa contended last year that it was unconstitutional. Colorado's Gov. John A. Love is on record as saying it would be "traitorous" for states to submit to Federally prescribed water quality standards.

Such attitudes are so prevalent that the Federal states standards program enacted by Congress in 1965 is still bemired, despite repeated official statements that water quality commitments from all 50 states had been "approved."

A recent check with the Pollution Control Agency disclosed that arduous negotiations were still going on with most of the states to bring their stated water quality goals—not accomplishments—to a satisfactory level.

CUTS IT. APPROPRIATIONS

States and cities, on their parts, have been vexed that Federal appropriations for matching-fund subsidies for sewerplant construction over the last three years have run nearly $1-billion short of what Congress originally authorized, and that the Government owes 19 states some $800-million as its share of construction projects approved and started. (The largest such obligation is $382,618,000 to New York.)

As an interim move to outflank the various obstacles to expeditious abatement, Secretary of the Interior Walter J. Hickel last September invoked an unused section of the 1965 water pollution law providing for direct Federal action against individual polluters.

Over bitter protests from the State of Ohio, he gave four steel companies there and the City of Toledo six months to get specified corrective measures under way or face Federal suits.

The action elicited quick compliance. But the maneuver of bypassing state administration was exemplary rather than a serviceable long-term tactic. There are countless thousands of polluters, industrial and municipal, and the Federal Government does not have the machinery to pursue them individually.

Recapitulating the highlights of this travail in a recent interview, Assistant Secretary Klein said: "It was imperative that we get new tools to do the job people are expecting to be done."

The measures now before Congress in effect shrink down to six months the indefinite period of years over which the law now allows meaningful remedial action to be protracted.

If a polluter does not start satisfactory remedial action to be protracted.

If a polluter does not start satisfactory remedial action in six months after due notice and a hearing, the Secretary of the Interior could ask the Department of Justice to bring court action leading to fines of up to $10,000 a day.

In place of the present often tortuous process of establishing that pollution is interstate, the Interior Department would have jurisdiction over any water pollution, even of invisible ground-water.

Communities' financing problems would be eased by creating a new Federal agency to buy their bonds and in turn issue its own bonds with the more marketable Federal imprimatur.

A TACIT COMMITMENT

The matching-grant subsidy program would be continued, on the $4-billion four-year basis, with a tacit commitment from the Nixon Administration to fund Congress' authorizations instead of chopping them with the budgetary cleaver.

President Johnson cut a $700-million authorization for fiscal year 1969 to $214-million and President Nixon last year cut a $1-billion authorization to $214-million, but Congress overrode him and appropriated $800-million.

Thus, regardless how long it takes Congress to broaden interior's policing powers, the subsidy program is on a firmer footing.

How big a dent it will make in the over-all problem remains to be seen. Secretary Udall a year ago estimated basic national pollution control needs through 1973 as totalling nearly $30-billion—$8-billion for sewage treatment plants, over $6-billion for sewer lines, some $6-billion for industrial treatment facilities, and nearly $6-billion for new operating and maintenance costs.

Senator Muskie has suggested that the Federal Government should be spending $12.5-billion in matching-fund grants over the next five years, to stimulate upward of $25-billion in construction rather than the $4-billion in the Nixon program.

Current projections, by whomever, are generally premised on providing only two-stage treatment for sewage—precipitation of gross solids, and neutralizing of most of the other pollutants by biological or chemical action. But this leaves some stubborn residual substances, notably nitrogen and phospohrous—natural fertilizers that propagate undesirable plant growths in waterways, disrupting their entire ecology.

The belief is growing that the only ultimate solution is widespread "tertiary" or three-stage treatment, which will remove practically all adulterants and leave clean, if slightly saline, water.

This cost twice as much as two-stage treatment (including amortization of plant costs), but is already being applied on a small scale in a number of places. Assistant Secretary Klein sees it as essential, for instance, in rehabilitating the Potomac, now overburdened with inadequately treated District of Columbia sewage.

THERMAL POLLUTION

Meanwhile the over-all water pollution problem has been growing in complexity. A new focus of attention is the detergents—of which some 5 billion pounds were sold last year—because they consist of up to 44 per cent of phosphate.

The detergent industry contends that its product is only a secondary source of such troublesome nutrients (human waste being another). But Canada has announced plans to ban phosphate detergents, and a Federal representative recently told an international conference that his agency favored "an immediate reduction of phosphate levels in detergents."

Another growing problem is "thermal" pollution of waterways by heat from industrial cooling water, particularly power plants. Some fish species are blighted by as little as a four-degree chronic alteration of their accustomed milieu.

Thermal pollution will worsen as atomic power plants, which produce more waste heat, replace conventional fossil-fueled plants. The pollution control agency in February instituted its first thermal pollution abatement proceeding, against a Florida electric plant that is heating part of Biscayne . . . degrees, an intolerable temperature for fish and aquatic plants.

Nor do any of the current cost estimates cover two big pollution sources that will have to be controlled to really clean up the nation's waters.

One is agricultural wastes, ranging from manure to fertilizers, which some officials have suggested may be responsible for as much contamination as municipal and industrial wastes. Little has been done about this because it is hard to get at.

The other problem is urban storm-water run-off. In most communities it goes down the same pipe as sewage, and often is nearly as dirty. But the volume at the time of a downpour is more than any sewage plant can handle. So sewage plants customarily "blow the switch," diverting large amounts of both storm water and sewage toward waterways untreated.

The only solution is to separate sewage and storm-water conduits and somehow handle storm water by itself. Commissioner Dominick estimates this alone as a $50-billion problem.

THE UNITED STATES MUST TAKE THE LEAD IN PROTECTING THE POLITICAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN INTERNATIONALLY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to an article entitled "Political Rights of Women Internationally," which was published in the March issue of the National Business Woman magazine. This excellent article on women's rights was written by Mr. Bruno V. Bitker, a prominent Milwaukee lawyer and a tireless fighter for Senate ratification of the human rights treaties. As a member of the President's Commission for Observance of Human Rights Year, Mr. Bitker has spoken out forcefully and eloquently or many occasions for international protection of women's political rights and Senate ratification of the U.N. Convention on the Political Rights of Women.

The end of this month will mark the 17th year since the U.N. convention on women's rights was opened for signature. As Mr. Bitker points out, the inaction of the U.S. Senate in regards to women's rights creates a highly embarrassing and incongruous situation for this country.

The same basic political rights protected by the U.N. treaty are guaranteed by our Federal Constitution and State laws. Senate ratification of this treaty would not alter national or State policies in any way. Senate ratification would, on the other hand, demonstrate to the world that we are concerned with this vital issue. It would reinforce our present national policies and laws, and extend our influence in this area to the international sphere.

The United States must exert its moral leadership in the international protection of the political rights of women. Not to do so, as Mr. Bitker points out, only creates the impression that this country sides with those nations that violate these basic rights.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN INTERNATIONALLY

(Bruno V. Bitker)

It is unbelievable—but it is a fact—that the United States is not one of the nations which has ratified the UN Convention on the Political Rights of Women, approved 18 years ago by the UN General Assembly.

It is unbelievable because the convention deals with fundamental rights already guaranteed by the federal Constitution; because it is not in conflict with state laws, and because it is a part of the accepted standards to which the United States is already committed.

The incongruity of the country's failure to support the convention becomes evident at international conferences. It is always a matter of embarrassment at such meetings when we are charged with failure to adopt this and other human rights treaties. I experienced this personally at the UN International Conference on Human Rights in Tehran in 1968. Although our delegation voted for endorsement of this and other treaties, the inconsistency between our statements and our failure to sign on the dotted line was obvious.

Of the 126 member nations of the UN, only a dozen or so deny women the right to vote and hold office. Our failure to act appears on the surface to give support to that handful of nations rather than to our own constitutional provision of national political equality.

An early obstacle to ratification was the claim that Article 3 of the convention, which covers equality of men and women in "public office," might be construed to include military service. When the United States, acting through our then representative, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, cast its vote for the convention in the General Assembly, it was formally recorded that the U.S. did so with the understanding that Article 3 did not include military service. President Kennedy included a similar understanding when he transmitted the convention to the Senate in 1963. This should suffice to still any doubts on that point.

Numerous official and private witnesses, including BPW, were unanimous for ratification in testimony before a special subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations early in 1967. The full Committee later tabled the convention, however, following opposition by the American Bar Association, on the grounds that the convention was a matter of domestic, not international concern—a contention without merit, according to many legal scholars.

The 1968 U.S. Commission for Observance of International Human Rights Year recommended that the United States ratify the convention.

But the convention remains tabled, although the Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman has stated that it could be taken off the table whenever the Committee so decided.

Thus it is up to organizations like the The National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc., to demand that the matter of the convention be reopened. If sufficient voices are heard either in the Senate or the White House, the matter will get attention. The question is, if we are really serious in our support, should we not back up our words with added deeds?

What better way to observe the 25th anniversary year of the UN than by making sure our voices are heard in the highest councils of our government in behalf of this measure.

If this Administration and this Senate are listening for the silent majority to express itself then let the message go forward from American men and women that the United States commits itself by treaty to supporting the political rights of women throughout the family of nations.

CHAIRMAN CRANSTON REPORTS ON WORK OF THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, as ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I have been privileged to work closely, in a truly bipartisan manner, with the chairman of the subcommittee, the able Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON).

Our subcommittee has, in the past year, reported out six different measures to improve the hospital and medical care available to veterans, and all have been passed by the Senate. Three have been signed into law by the President and three are pending in the House. We have also written the comprehensive veterans education and training bill which passed the Senate 77 to 0 last October and has just been reported out of a conference with the House.

Senator CRANSTON discussed the work of our subcommittee at a recent meeting here in Washington of the American Legion's National Legislative and Rehabilitation Commissions. In his address he outlined both the past accomplishments of the subcommittee under his leadership and the future plans he has for new legislation to improve the VA health care program. I recommend Senator CRANSTON's remarks to all Senators and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD:

There being no objection the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BY SENATOR ALAN CRANSTON

It is a great privilege for me to address you this morning—one year after my maiden voyage—so to speak—as chairman of the Veterans Affairs Subcommittee of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee of the Senate. When I spoke to you a year ago, I had very little to report. But today I am in a position to give you a concrete report on the Subcommittee, and a preview of the activities I plan in the second session of this Congress.

Let me first pay well-deserved tribute to the outstanding efforts of your Washington staff. We have received excellent testimony from Legion witnesses through the help of Herald Stringer, Chuck Mattingly and Terry Wertz, and Ed Golembieski and Austin Kerby have greatly aided us on rehabilitation and economic matters.

I also want to thank your California State Director of Rehabilitation, Lou Sloneker, who testified so ably at our Subcommittee medical hearings in Los Angeles. All of these gentlemen have given me valuable counsel and assistance, and I am deeply appreciative.

On the cooperation theme, I wish to emphasize the excellent bipartisan help of Senator Richard Schweiker of Pennsylvania, the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee, and Senator Ralph Yarborough, who is both the ranking majority member and, of course, the chairman of the full Labor and Public Welfare Committee. All the legislation we have reported from Subcommittee has been acted on unanimously and I plan to do all I can to continue this bipartisan approach.

This cooperation extends beyond our own committee to include Senator Herman Talmadge of Georgia, chairman of the Veterans Legislation Subcommittee of the Finance Committee, and Congressman Olin E. Teague of Texas, chairman of the House Veterans Affairs Committee. I will speak more about the great work of these gentlemen later.

Now to the work accomplished thus far during the 91st Congress.

The Subcommittee has conducted 12 days of hearings, involving over one hundred witnesses. We have considered 19 bills. The Senate has already passed six improving and expanding hospital and medical care. Three have been signed into law:

H.R. 2768—to provide unlimited care in community nursing homes for veterans hospitalized with service-connected conditions;

H.R. 3130—to authorize outpatient care for the non-service-connected disabilities of a totally and permanently disabled veteran;

H.R. 9334—to improve and expand VA aid to state veterans' homes and hospitals.

Three others are pending in the House:

H.R. 693—dealing with the requirements for admission to VA hospitals and domiciliaries and with drugs, medicines and medical care for the most severely disabled;

H.R. 9634—providing needed administrative authorities for the VA;

S. 1279—creating a rebuttable presumption of service-connection for the disabilities of former prisoners of war and certain other veterans whose military medical records are destroyed.
